SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

AT the opening of 1899, almost the last year of the century, we unite with our readers in thankfulness to God for the great mercies He has bestowed upon us all, not only during the past year but during the previous years; and we heartily and prayerfully desire for them, as for ourselves, a blessed and, in the highest sense, a prosperous year.

THE CHRISTIAN, under its previous name THE REVIVAL, owed its origin to the times of refreshing of 1859; its first number was issued on July 30 of that year. From then until now it has largely owed its world-wide circulation and its increasing influence to the hearty co-operation of its readers None could so effectively accomplish these ends as those who were in continual contact with it; and we have pleasure in acknowledging our indebtedness to our friends for the interest they have always shown, and for its evident results.

While, however, some of the elders who remember 1859 remain unto this present day, the majority are fallen asleep. But there are very many still with us who have vivid recollection of the visits of Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey to this country, and of their fruitful labours, as well as those of other evangelists in the United States and in Great Britain. We need not dwell upon the publicity continuously given by THE CHRISTIAN to all these movements of the Divine Spirit, more than to say that it has been and still is being used of God to contribute largely to the spread of his work.

We are assured by appreciative letters of thanks and cheer, which were never received so frequently as now, that this interest and co-operation undergo no diminution; and we are thereby encouraged to ask the increased aid of our friends. Would it not be easy for each to obtain another subscriber among his or her acquaintance? When it is remembered that for a penny a week, or post free for 6s. 7d. a year, a fellow Christian may be kept informed of Gospel effort in all lands, are there not many who could confer this weekly recurring present on those who may not hitherto have known the paper?

We are sending the current issue of THE CHRISTIAN, with the first number of THE REVIVAL, to many thousands of ministers of the Gospel in the Church of England and the various Nonconformist bodies. Will our readers pray that this may tend to increase the present revival of evangelistic effort in all the churches?

A correspondent in Scotland writes as follows:—"There is a strong desire and no little prayer in different parts of Scotland for a revival of religion. The latest indication of this fact is the formation of a prayer union among the ministers of the Free Church with this end in view. At the noon prayer-meeting in Edinburgh much prayer is being offered for the same thing, and many in the city are feeling the need for the Lord to make bare his arm."

We commend to the earnest attention of our readers, and especially those who have healthy ambitions in life, the biographical sketch of the late Lady Beauchamp on page 17. Such an heroic career is all too rare among us; yet it serves to show what God can do through one that is really consecrated to his will. It is by such choice souls that the Spirit of the Lord will work. How many will "rise up and call her blessed" will never be known on earth; but let those who are stirred with desire for revival in themselves and in the world be stimulated by her example, to its emulation.

In common with most the other newspapers of this country we gladly referred to and commented on the article in The Quiver, which purported to give "Recollections of a Maid of Honour" to the Queen, with special bearing on Her Majesty's views of international peace. The truth of the narrative has, however, been authoritatively contradicted, and we can but express our regret at being misled in the matter. Such weight is deservedly attached to any utterance of the Queen that writers ought to be doubly careful in verifying statements that attribute to Her Majesty expressions of opinion on current events.

"Read the Bible—continuously, repeatedly, independently, prayerfully." Result, "remarkable spiritual awakening." Such is the summing up of the very interesting article on "Systematic Bible Study," given on page 19. The failure to-day lies in the fact that so many people will not read the Bible for themselves. Prof. W. W. White will commence in London a series of practical Bible studies on the 16th inst., of which full particulars will appear in our next issue. May the results be as encouraging as in the case cited above.

THE usual "good cheer" in the shape of material comforts was distributed among London poor, seamen, and others by the many Christian friends working among them. At these gatherings, the Gospel is always lovingly set forth and pressed on the attention of the guests. Our space does not permit of our giving details of these interesting gatherings.

The daily papers are unanimous in pronouncing this Christmas-tide one of the happiest, from a social point of view, known for many years. Everywhere signs of contentment and prosperity were visible; and there was an unusual absence of those indications of distress and abject poverty which have thrown their dark shadow across the rejoicings of the time. As is usual, however, during periods of social well-being, there were abundant signs of the drinking habits of the working classes, though comparatively few cases of absolute drunkenness found their way into the magistrates' courts. We do not seem able as a nation to enjoy the blessings of unqualified prosperity without revealing the taint of self-indulgence, which has mingled with our blood as a race.

The year closed in a hush of peace all over the world, and the relations between the civilised countries are fairly cordial. It is, therefore, a thousand pities that certain journalists who have the run of some leading newspapers are getting up a virulent Anti-Russian Crusade, with a view, apparently, of defeating the objects of the peace rescript of the Emperor. The task they have put before themselves is not a very difficult one, for it is always easy to sow seeds of suspicion and enmity between two nations. It is, however, a thoroughly discreditable thing to do. If these powerful countries could but be made to understand each other, not only might prolonged peace be secured, but the best interests of the nations would be served.

If the old adage, "Happy is the people that has no history," the world at large has been happy during the last few weeks. The newspapers have been sore put to it to find anything sensational in the way of copy, and instead of the latest reports from the battle-field, or the doubtful interest of "pars" about causes célèbres, have had to fall back on "special articles" of the most innocuous type. This is indeed a welcome change after the perpetual excitements of the past year. It is to be hoped that the unhealthy prominence given to foreign relations will give place to the old-fashioned interest in domestic affairs, and that the attention of statesmen and reformers will be turned to the questions that make for peace between employers and employés, to the perfecting of our school system, to the amelioration of the conditions of child and women labour, and other reforms that have long been awaiting attention. 1898 has been devoted to "foreign politics"; let us hope and pray that 1899 may be absorbed in matters that belong to our peace and welfare at home.

The Italian Government has performed a wise as well as merciful act in closing the year by an amnesty to a large majority of those imprisoned since last summer, owing to the part they took in the political disturbances, which at one time looked to become an organised rebellion. Over 3,000 prisoners will benefit by this act of grace. Most of these were driven into the movement by despair at the ruinous taxation necessitated by the militarism under which Italy groans. Others were the mere tools of the Jesuits, who are more than suspected to be at the bottom of the movement, their aim being to overthrow the existing dynasty in the intervals of the Romish Church. The amnesty will bring joy into thousands of poverty-stricken homes. The causes of the discontent which led to the riots, however, will remain so long as Italy aspires to the honours of a first-class Power, and aspires to a standing army whose expenses sap at the root of the nation's welfare.

The infatuation with which nations copy each other's evil customs is one of the strangest phenomena of history. Some person, seeing what he regards as a good feature of a custom, and overlooking many other vital aspects of it, will urge his fellow-countrymen to try the new thing. It was thus that the British nation was urged to adopt the Continental system of regulating vice, when the nations of the Continent themselves were sick and weary of a plan that had failed at all points. Similarly, just when the nations of Europe are wearying of their military burdens, longing for relief and liberty, we are told that—

An organisation for the purpose of promoting the teaching of military drill to all lads between the ages of thirteen and eighteen is in course of formation in England.

Mrs. Crawford writes from Paris:—

The soldier and the reservist now hate the army. The most bitter hatred and contempt are felt by young bourgeois who have gone through the army mill. Millions of the French would vote for disarmament.

Why, then, should our lads be either coaxed or driven, after their day's work is done, into the drill-yard? All this means conscription eventually, however it may be sought to hide the fact.

A war correspondent, writing home from the Soudan during the recent campaign, said:—"If the Soudan's thirst could be sent home in capsules, it would make a man's fortune in a single evening." The irony of the situation was, that there was so much thirst there, and such limitless means of supply here. Desire and possession were far apart. That is the perpetual problem of life—how to make supply square with demand. Christ alone has solved this problem for the soul. Even when our earthly desires are for the time quenched, the means of satisfaction fail or fall.

"Everyone that drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up into eternal life." (John iv. 13, 14.)

The Divine sources of life go with us everywhere; they never fail, nor run dry; they are within us a part of the very constitution of the redeemed love that enjoys them.

It is significant to find a theological professor entering on his tenure of office, as Professor Patrick has done in assuming the chair of Biblical Criticism and Antiquities in the University of Edinburgh, with a lecture on "The Conservative Reaction in New Testament Criticism." When this chair was founded in 1846, the theory of Baur was predominant on the continent of Europe. The old-fashioned ideas as to the dates, authorship, and relations of the New Testament books to each other were all challenged, and any inclination to cling to their early date "branded as an infallible index of intellectual narrowness." After half a century of bitter and exhaustive controversy, the "new movement" has been consigned to the limbo of outworn theories, and the earlier traditional dates and points of view have been reinstated, never more to be questioned by anyone with a scholar's reputation to maintain.

The controversy has vastly enlarged our knowledge of the first Christian century. The human life and death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ have been more intensely real and vivid to thousands of readers of the Gospels. The circumstances and difficulties of the early Churches, to meet which the Epistles were, in the first instance, addressed, have been brought out of their obscurity, and we are enabled to see how marvellously their universal message speaks through the temporary occasions that gave them birth. The New Testament, as a whole, has emerged from the furnace of conflict unscathed, without smell of burning clinging to its undying pages. And the blessed Gospel, of which it is the inspired channel, has proved itself indestructible and eternal. The scholar, as well as the simple and devout, may rest his faith upon it with unfaltering trust.

It is very gratifying to learn from an article in the Homiletic Review on "The Development of the Ministry" that, notwithstanding all the drawbacks under which the coloured people of the South have laboured, and still labour, the future is encouraging. Great progress has been made, and "forces are actively at work that cannot fail to work immense advantage." The writer believes that there are abundant and excellent opportunities for the training of coloured ministers. Any coloured young man of good character and ambition, with fair abilities, can obtain a good theological training. Indeed, they enjoy the privilege of using the most largely endowed theological seminary, one under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The warm sympathies of English Christians, especially of these who took their side in the great anti-slavery struggle, must be with these our brethren.

There are two elements in preaching important to spiritual results—exposition and application. This generation lacks the former quite as much as the latter. The average sermon is a series of platitudes hung upon a text, with which they may or may not have any direct connection. There is great need for the exposition of the Word itself, for the opening up of its meaning, the confirming and illustrating of its truths. This may not always be "popular" or "interesting," but it is necessary.

Yet it is not all. The preacher must be direct; he must begin to wrestle with souls, determined to conquer. Then his whole nature will be moved, and latent powers—imagination, passion, will, indignation, tenderness—will spring into active exercise and reinforce the reason. No advocate in human causes contents himself with simply explaining the law; he has a judge and jury to convince, a case to win, a man to be convicted or acquitted. Audiences in churches need to be rebuked for their sins rather than allowed to slumber through an argument. They have to be warned, entreated, persuaded, plied with all the forces at the preacher's command; and all this is to be done in the power of the Holy Spirit.

It is a question about which there ought not to be two opinions as to whether ministers of the Gospel should be shareholders in brewing and distilling companies. Seeing as we do on all sides the evils, moral and physical, that result from the drink traffic, how can those who have given their lives to save the souls of their fellow-men quietly receive gain from such a trade? In Scotland there has been amongst temperance organisations a determination to bring this question to the front. The result being that

The denunciation of any participation in liquor profits by ministers of the Gospel has been so pronounced that those who had shares in any of the companies have, for the most part, sold them out.

We wish that Christians generally would follow their spiritual leaders in this respect, and have nothing to do with profits earned in the "trade."

According to the testimony of Mr. J. T. Moffat, a son of the great missionary, who retains much of his father's deep interest in the future of South Africa, there is a decided set-back in the treatment of these races by the white man of late years. Speaking from long and intimate knowledge of the situation, he dates the change from the time when the influence of the Transvaal began to spread, the natives there being treated by the Boers as hardly human beings at all. This attitude has infected the whole of South Africa to-day; and the battle of the native will have to be fought over again. The apprenticeship system he denounces as indistinguishable in many ways from slavery, and is fast breaking down under the sheer force of circumstances. It is important to give prominence to these facts in this country, since the pressure of home opinion is the truest safeguard of the Colony. It is a calamity that the principle of just and equal treatment to all subjects—which professedly lies at the root of British rule—should be contradicted in any of our great dependencies.

Mrs. Neethling writes us from Stellenbosch, S.A.:—"In the last number of Fakkel ('Torch'), the organ of the Free State Church, which I opened this morning, I found an item which I shall be glad if you can make use of in your 'Notes and Comments.' All God's people must rejoice when even such a partial victory is secured, especially when we call to mind the ridicule with which the Cape Times reported the meeting of the 'Volksraad' Free State Council, when the Bill for the Abolition of Sunday News was first introduced—some time ago."

The following is the paragraph above referred to:—"Our readers will rejoice to hear that on the Wurburg line, the principal branch line in the Free State, no trains are run on Sunday. Since November 1 the traffic by goods train on Sundays has been greatly reduced on the main line. After eight o'clock on Sunday morning, not a single goods train arrives at Bloemfontein by way of Norval's Pont. Between Bloemfontein and Norval's Pont there are thus no goods trains on Sunday. Between Bloemfontein and the Vaal River only one train runs on Sunday, namely one for the transporting of live stock. This is great cause for gratitude, and calls for more prayer. Much has been gained, but still far from everything. The loading and unloading of live stock or any other goods on Sunday must be prohibited at all the stations in the Free State. We are glad to know that the traffic manager will do all in his power to reduce the number of Sunday trains as much as possible."

The Bishop of Hereford has consented to serve on the General Committee of the International Crusade of Peace. Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., has accepted the chairmanship of the Labour Committee. Larger offices are to be taken in Norfolk Street.

The Look Upward.

A New Year's Motto.

BY REV. H. C. G. MOULE, D.D.*

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord which made heaven and earth."—Ps. cxxi. 1-2.

HERE at once we have a powerful message. Read in the sunlight of the Gospel, it speaks straight to the Christian's heart. The Hebrew word "help," expressly means a help which is not mere rescue nor mere protection, but the gift of strength. We do indeed need protection. We are in awful need, if we are standing outside of Christ, of rescue from under the imminent thundercloud of the guilt of sin and the wrath of God. But we need more. We have to live, to walk, to witness; we have to do and serve if we belong to our King. And so we need help in the form of strength; a girding of the soul, an enabling of the will. And, for all this, too, we must look out and up. We shall never produce such help from within ourselves, nor shall we ever conjure it up from circumstances. What we need must come purely and altogether from the Lord that made heaven and earth.

Are we conscious, in stern earnest, of such needs? Then let us look straight at some of the glorious mountains which are the symbols and the signals of the Lord's faithfulness and of his presence. Look first at the literal geographic mountains; recall those hills of Judea, with the city which still sits in its grey, forlorn majesty upon that ancient throne. There is still the Mount Zion; I have traversed it myself. It was on Mount Zion, in all reasonable likelihood, that the Son of Man, before He suffered, spoke his last words of everlasting comfort and good hope. It was the scene of the last Paschal discourse and of the institution of the precious Supper, so full of the promises of God.

Then there is that other mountain, the "green hill far away," the place where the Lamb was slain, where the Lord poured out his soul a sacrifice for sin. Then there is Mount Olivet, from one of whose ridges or crests the Lord ascended after the resurrection to his throne, carrying up with Him to heaven all the interests of his people, and showering down upon them from heaven all the fulness of his Spirit.

Then we look from Jerusalem northwards, towards Galilee, and the mind's eye can see another hill, the mount on which Jesus spoke his great Sermon of holiness and blessing to his faithful ones. And we recall along with this the unnamed mountain in Galilee where the disciples met Him after the resurrection, and He told them that all power was given to Him in heaven and earth, and that they were to go and tell the world of Him, and that He was with them alway until the end.

Shall we make use of the Psalmist's example? Shall we keep our eyes toward the mountains, and toward the Lord they point to? What is your need just now? Is it the need of a conscience that has not yet found peace? Do you want the assurance that your sins are forgiven you for his Name's sake? Do not look within for it. Do not look around for it. "Lift up your eyes unto the hills." Make haste to Calvary, and on the way there visit the slopes of Mount Olivet, where grow the trees of Gethsemane. Contemplate there the agony of the Lord where He already tasted the tremendous cup which He drank to the dregs the next noontide on the Cross. There is the answer to your need. Not only look but rest upon that hill.

Are you conscious of the awful power of sin, even though you have the merciful assurance of the Divine forgiveness of it? Go to Mount Moriah, the hill of the Temple. There stood the Lord on that last great day of the feast and said, "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink; out of him shall flow rivers of living waters." There can be, there shall be, such a flow into your needing soul of the power of the Holy One, such a presence of Christ in your heart, by the Holy Ghost, as shall make the old invincible temptation fall paralysed beneath your feet.

Or do you sorely need help under some deep sorrow, some long-continued care, perhaps some sickness, of hope deferred for one over whose soul you yearn? Or is it some grief of the more open kind—a precious life trembling in the balance, some shadow of death cast by bereavement over all your days? Go to the mountains again. Look up to that wonderful Olivet, where the Lord tasted the depths of grief, and drank the cup which was not only the cup of wrath, but the cup of woe, till nothing was left in it; and it was drained to be filled again with the comforts which come only through "the Man of Sorrows, acquainted with grief." You will not go there to Him in vain. Do not wait till the sky clears and the sun shines and try to find Him then. His chosen moment to prove to you all that He is is the hour of grief itself, which He tasted for you beforehand on the mountains, whence your help shall come.

The Light of the World.

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

"I AM the Light." Then, how very easily entreated He must be! The light needs no coercion—no persuasion to come near to us. We need not shout to the light; the light only seeks an opening, and on getting it will immediately enter in. The good Lord only waits for an open mind and heart. "If any man open the door, I will come in."

"I am the Light."—Then, how difficult it is to drive Him away! If we wish to shut the light out of our rooms we must not only close the windows and doors, but we must seal up every keyhole and every chink and crevice, or some urgent ray will pierce its way in. The gracious, long-suffering Lord is not easily driven away. He thrusts Himself in upon us wherever there is the smallest opening. "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed"—even through that small opening—He will come in and work wonders.

"I am the Light."—Then, how impartial He must be! The light falls upon the rich man's orchids, and also blesses the poor man's box of mignonette. It floods the majestic cathedral; it fills the humble chapel on the lonely moor; it steals through the chinks of a gipsy's tent. "I am the Light." Jesus blesses the widow with two mites, and also Zaccheus, "chief among the publicans, and rich." He makes a friend of Peter, an unlearned fisherman, and of Nicodemus, "a ruler of the Jews." There is no respect of persons with God.

"Truly, the light is sweet."
"Awake! and Christ shall give thee light."
"Come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord."

An Appeal to Ministers.

FROM a letter of an esteemed correspondent in Scotland we quote the following:—

"Dear Sir,—For about thirty years I have read THE CHRISTIAN week by week, and I have often admired its strong good sense, its soundness in the faith, and its evangelical fervour. I have been impressed by the 'Suggestive Readings' which appeared in the issue of December 1, and it leads me to trouble you with a practical proposal.

"There can be no doubt that the preaching of the present day is largely to blame for the prevailing apathy regarding Divine things. How shall ministers of the Gospel be brought to preach as for eternity?

"A journal originating in the great spiritual awakening of forty years ago may very well appeal to ministerial brethren to remember the exceedingly solemn claims of their high calling as ambassadors for Christ, whose chief business and duty it is to beseech men to be reconciled to God.

"I feel assured that if ministers would resolve that, throughout 1899, they would seek to preach to the conscience, we should have, long before its close, abundant cause to rejoice in the advance of the Kingdom of our blessed Lord."

Semper Idem.

"Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, yea and for ever."—Heb. xiii., 8.

OUT of the mist of years,
And vanishing hosts of Time,
One gracious Form in glory rears
A countenance sublime;
Age cannot mar its youth,
Nor distance dim its grace;
O happy they who, day by day,
Live with that love-lit Face;

Amid the clash of creeds,
The dreary, weary quest
Of those who seek and never find
For toilworn souls a rest;
One Message, clear and calm,
Falls from the darkling sky,
And those who hear, have no more fear,
Whether they live or die.

Through Mem'ry's haunted hall,
Flit ghostly shadows drear,
And whisp'ring voices faintly call,
Of long-lost friends once near.
One Friend alone abides—
Though Time itself grow grey,
The aureole of his holy love,
Shall never fade away.

Ah, Christ! In this new year
To Thee we turn and plead
For Truth, and Love, and Light, and Power,
For Thou hast all we need.
Thy Love—it fills the earth,
Thy truth illumes the sky.
Redeeming grace flows from Thy face,
O Saviour-King on high!

The Bible in Austria.

IN a communication to The Times, dated December 30, the Vienna correspondent of that journal says:—"The colportage of the Protestant Bible in Lower Austria has hitherto been authorised by special licences issued from the Stadtholder's office and renewable annually. Some of these expire on January 1 and others on April 1. The renewal of the former appears to have been refused. On inquiry being made as to whether this decision would not be reversed, little hope was held out to the applicants, who were told that they would perhaps be allowed to sell the Roman Catholic Bible—namely, the Van Ess edition.

"The sale of the Protestant Bible in Austria has not hitherto contributed in any perceptible degree to proselytism. The licences for its colportage would seem to constitute a harmless privilege not in any way calculated to encroach upon the sphere of the Roman Church. It is therefore to be hoped that the Stadtholder's office will see its way to renew the licences in question, which cannot conceivably affect the interests of the State."

Suggestive Readings.

"ALL THINGS ARE YOURS."

IN order to effective participation in the Revival which we believe is coming, and which in measure is already come, it is essential that we should be of one accord, in one place, as at Pentecost, of one accord, of one mind, as the Philippians were exhorted to be.

This cannot mean that all should think exactly alike, or have attained to the same degree of development or illumination. But it must mean that all have one common object—to love Him and to be like Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. It must also mean a willing obedience to his Word, and a diligent searching of the Scriptures comparing one part with another.

One question underlies the exercises of many hearts. Is the work of salvation complete and finished on God's part, or is there more for Him to give, dependent upon our faith, or prayer, or obedience? If this question can be answered scripturally to the satisfaction of inquiring hearts, it will set many at rest.

We preach to sinners a full, free and eternal salvation in Christ.

Nothing either great or small—nothing, sinner, no;
Jesus did it, did it all, long, long ago.
When He from his lofty throne stooped to do and die,
Everything was fully done, hearken to his cry:
"It is finished," yes, indeed, finished every jot.
Sinner, this is all you need. Tell me, is it not?

"God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son." Not offered, but gave. To the whole sinful world—to every individual sinner—God gave his Son, who is the Word, in whom God spoke out Himself, who was with God and was God, who is the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The sinner may neglect, refuse, reject, tread under foot the Son of God, count the blood of the Covenant a common thing, and do despite unto the Spirit of grace, but this does not alter the fact that God gave to the world He loved his only-begotten Son, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which it is the office of the Spirit of grace to reveal to as many as receive Him and become sons of God.

In accordance with this the Apostle assures the saints, the believers in Christ Jesus, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places (or heavenly things—surely both are meant) IN CHRIST (Eph. i. 1-14). "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and in Him ye are made full (complete), Who is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

But, alas! we do not all enjoy every spiritual blessing. Some know that they are forgiven sinners, but they have little sense of justification, still less of sonship and heirship, and less still of the loving bond-service which qualifies for receiving revelations and for seeing the King's face (Rev. i. 1; xxii. 34).

Many, like Martha, serve; some enjoy communion, like Lazarus, who was one of them that sat at the table with Him; but few, like Mary, render service lowlier than that of Martha, and yet enjoy a fellowship more intimate than that of Lazarus, lavishing the costly spikenard of heart-love upon his feet, his lowest and lowliest members, wiping them with the hair of her bowed head, filling not only the earthly house, but the house above, with the odour of that very precious ointment.

Yet all that Mary had, Martha and Lazarus possessed also. As Tersteegen sang:

Jesus' Name, Thou Pearl Divine,
Precious art Thou still to me;
Treasure which I choose for mine,
All I want is found in Thee:

Peace and power and holiness,
Life and rest and blessedness;
This dear Name, for ever new,
Doth my soul with joy bedew.

Martha possessed Him as truly as did Mary. "Yea, Lord, I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God that cometh into the world." This her confession came, like that of Simon Peter, not from flesh and blood, but by revelations from the Father in heaven. And Jesus loved Martha, as well as her sister and Lazarus. But Martha had not found her place at Jesus' feet, nor heard his word, as Mary had, and so was not as spiritually enriched as Mary was.

Both had the same Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who is the fulness of the Godhead bodily; but Mary had, as Martha had not, made Him and the treasures of wisdom and knowledge in Him the object, the study, the meditation of her life. Both possessed Christ, the casket; but Mary knew more of what the casket contained—the unsearchable riches of Christ.

There is no blessing on earth or in heaven, in time or in eternity, which is not made ours from the moment we are saved with the everlasting salvation, by grace through faith. Its blessedness comes into actual experience and enjoyment, not by any new act or gift of God, but by our own appropriation, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, of that which is already ours in God's unspeakable gift, the Son of his love.

The land of Canaan was given without qualification to Abraham's seed. Some never saw it, but died in the wilderness; and others who entered the land never entered into rest, because rest does not depend on circumstances, but on believing and on ceasing from our own works.

To fulfil the purpose of the giver, every gift must be accepted. The good land and large, flowing with milk and honey, was God's free gift to all his people; but only that which they took out of the hands of the Amorites was in actual enjoyment their own. (See Joshua i. 2-3.) M.

Prayer and Praise.

WE may judge of the state of our hearts by the earnestness of our prayers. You cannot make a rich man beg like a poor man; you cannot make a man that is full cry for food like one that is hungry. No more will a man who has a good opinion of himself, cry for mercy like one who feels that he is poor and needy. The symptoms of spiritual decline are like those which attend the decay of bodily health. It generally commences with loss of appetite and a disrelish for spiritual food—prayer, reading the Scriptures and devotional books. Whenever you perceive these symptoms, be alarmed, for your spiritual health is in danger. Apply immediately to the great Physician for a cure.

No one needs to be told that the surest method to obtain new favours from an earthy benefactor is to be thankful for those which he has already bestowed. It is the same with respect to our heavenly Benefactor. At the dedication of Solomon's Temple many prayers were made, and many sacrifices offered, without any token of the Divine acceptance. But when singers and players on instruments began as one to make one sound to be heard, in praising and thanking the Lord, saying, "For He is good, for his mercy endureth for ever," then the glory of the Lord descended and filled the Temple. The reason why praise and thanksgiving thus prevail with God is that they, above all other duties, glorify Him. "Whoso offereth praise," saith He "glorifieth Me;" and those who thus honour Him, He will honour. Dr. Edward Payson.

THIS week we enclose as a gratis supplement the first number of THE REVIVAL, new issue, for which we bespeak the attentive consideration of our readers, and our request that they will help us to the extent of their ability by ordering copies for distribution at the prices stated thereon.

The first issue will be 100,000, and in order to make it known parcels will be sent to Pastors, Evangelists, Superintendents of Missions, Sabbath-school Teachers, Tract Distributors, and others interested, at the cost of the postage only, which will be at the rate of one penny for every eight copies. For terms for quantities, see p. 1 of specimen copy enclosed.

We hope that all our readers will co-operate in this endeavour.

THE REVIVAL will be continued monthly for the present year.

I am glad to see at page 11 of THE CHRISTIAN of December 29 a reference to the Revival as of continuous date, '59—'99. It has been too much the custom to refer to this great work of the Holy Spirit as of 1859-60, whereas the principal labours in the Gospel at the present day are carried on by the converts of those and the immediately following years.

Not only those eminent servants of the Lord named by Mr. George Hatton, but many others, both men and women, went forth preaching the Gospel to the heathen at home and abroad. These included working-men, artisans, noblemen, naval and military officers, educated gentlemen, lawyers and others, who, without seeking or waiting for university honours or episcopal ordination, went everywhere preaching the Word.

Perhaps one reason why the work is not more encouraging of late years may be that there has not been that hearty union in prayer and praise which prevailed at the earlier period. Perhaps, also, this great Revival has not been duly remembered and ascribed to the work of the Holy Spirit.

Among all the many popular writings of recent years, how little has been said of that great Revival! How soon the interest of the people of God seemed to become absorbed in sectarian matters!

If those who witnessed God's marvellous works of 1859-60 in Ireland, Scotland, and England (not to allude now to America) had recorded them, and preached on them more, 'telling to their children the works God did in their day; showing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord and his strength, and his wonderful works that He hath done,' we might perhaps now be witnessing still greater marvels.

In those days almost all the secular newspapers, both dailies and weeklies, were more or less full of the records of the remarkable manifestation of the Spirit.

THE CHRISTIAN, under its original title of The Revival, of course, was full of most interesting narratives. From that, and the secular papers of forty years ago, might be even now compiled a most valuable testimony, if some able writer should consider the object worthy of the labour it would involve.

Such a work would indeed be "news" to the present and the rising generation, and would not only be popular, but would I believe, be owned and greatly blessed of God. Forty years ago I delivered a lecture on this subject to a Young Men's Christian Association, but am now an invalid in my 84th year.

SUNDAY, January 8, 1899.

Exodus xxvii.

THE chapter begins with the brazen altar and ends with beaten oil for the light. The one symbolises Calvary, the other Pentecost; for oil is the perpetual emblem of the Holy Spirit throughout Scripture. Jesus must pass through the death of the Cross, before He can shed forth the Pentecostal gift, to enable his Church to give an unwaning testimony to the world.

Between these we have the regulations for the court of the Tabernacle, with its hangings and screens. There must be separation between God's priests and the world; and it is inevitable that much of their work should be hidden from the prying curiosity of the world. "Ye are dead," says the Apostle, "and your life is hid with Christ in God." Only when He is manifested shall we be manifested with Him in glory. How little can the world understand our hopes and fears, our motives and aims, and joy when He lifts upon us the light of his face, or our sorrows when we feel to have failed in our testimony!

What a graphic delineation is given therefore, in this chapter, of our position and work! As a royal priesthood, we show forth the Lord's death till He come; saved ourselves through the death of the cross, we live to proclaim it; we minister within the curtained court; we order the holy lamp from evening to morning, till the day break and the shadows flee away.

MONDAY, January 9.

Exodus xxviii.

Seeing that we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, let us study the nature of his high-priestly intercession and ministry as they are reflected here.

He is our Brother. "Bring thou near Aaron thy brother." "Thou shalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother." This repeated emphasis reminds us of the blessed truth, that it behoved Jesus in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God. How close is the tie of brotherhood!

Our Names are dear to Him. On the stones of the shoulderpieces the names of the children of Israel were engraved with the work of an engraver in stone; six of the names on the one stone, and six on the other, according to their birth. Then, again, each of the twelve stones in Aaron's breastplate bore the name of one of the tribes; thus, twice over, Aaron bore the names of the children of Israel, when he went into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. How evidently are we taught that Jesus knows us by name, that He represents us, and that we have a distinct and vivid identity in Him!

His steps are marked by Holiness, Fruitfulness, and Music. Aaron bore on his forehead the plate of gold, on which was engraven "Holiness to the Lord"; while pomegranates and bells adorned the skirt of his robe, as though to accentuate the thought that the High Priest must be holy in character, and the creator of fruit and joy. Let us ask Him to produce these characteristics in ourselves. Let it not be forgotten that He also bears the oracle of judgment on his breast. The Urim and Thummim, stones of judgment, glisten there, that He may solve our hard questions and direct our way.

TUESDAY, January 10.

Exodus xxix.

This elaborate ceremonial reminds us by force of contrast that our High Priest is without sin, and needed not to offer for Himself when He entered on his sacred work; though there was every need to offer for the sins of the people, and for his sons who were to be associated with Him in the holy priesthood.

Have we known the spiritual counterparts of these rites? First, we must lay our hands on the head of the sin-offering, whose blood is poured out at the base of the altar to make an atonement. In other words, we never get beyond the need of pleading the atoning death of Jesus Christ as a propitiation. Next, we must identify ourselves with Jesus in his consecration to the work to which the Father has called Him. We must not let our vows of consecration lapse, but live up to their fullest limit, constantly using them as the line and plummet by which to test ourselves. In addition, we must bring our gifts to God, and wave them in his holy presence for a sweet savour.

What privileges are ours! Aaron and his sons were sanctified to minister unto God; and He will set apart us also to Himself. He promised to meet with his people and dwell among them, and He will not do less for us, since He says, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God." Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He shall dwell among them, and wipe away all tears from their eyes; only let us not forget the morning and evening lamb of burnt-offering. As the day breaks, and when evening studs the sky with stars, let us present ourselves in his holy presence.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Exodus xxx.

It seems late in the story of the Tabernacle that the incense altar should be only mentioned now; but it is not wholly unsuitable that it should come last, because it represents intercessory prayer, the crown and climax of the religious life. When Christ had finished his work on earth, He went to the right hand of God to make intercession for us, and it is of his precious merit and prevalent prayer for us that the incense speaks, which was made after the art of the perfumer, sweet and holy, seasoned with salt. The prayers and praises of the saints are mingled with the much incense with which He perfumes them, and so they are acceptable to God.

It is very touching to notice that this altar of incense needed purification. Israel was liable to sin in the holiest exercises, and our prayers need atonement, even the holiest and most unselfish of them. "Forgive us, our Father, for the sins of our holy things, for the sake of the blood that was shed."

The same lesson was taught in the provision of the laver, in which the sons of Aaron were required to wash as they entered on their sacred duties. Even they, holy as their daily functions were, were required to put away their daily sins. In the sense in which our Lord used the words, they were washed, but they needed continually to wash hands and feet that they might be clean every whit. Let us not forget that, however sacred our duties may be, we need to recur incessantly to the blood of Jesus, which cleanseth from sin of which we may not be aware. The yearly payment of the shekel was in harmony with all this. Every son of Israel was on the same level in this respect—the rich with the poor, the saintliest and the rebellious. There was no difference, because all alike need to be redeemed, purchased and accepted on the ground of Atonement.

THURSDAY, January 12.

Exodus xxxi.

Whenever there is special work to be done, God will find and endow the men who are to do it. "I have called. . . . I have filled. . . . I have appointed. . . . I have put wisdom in all that are wisehearted." There is room for every one in the service of God, and to every one is given his specific and particular work. There are talents allotted to us all, and for those talents there is an appropriate sphere. Let us ask God to bring us to the work which He has prepared for us, according to the words of the Apostle, "Created unto good works, which God has before prepared that we should walk in them." The talent for the sphere; the sphere for the talent; and the call of God linking each to each.

But amid all our work for God, there should be Sabbath-keeping. In this chapter, the two are closely conjoined. The first half deals with strenuous endeavour; the second with quiet rest. Neither is perfect apart from the other. Work demanding rest; rest breathing its spirit through work.

It is said in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "He that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works." It is a difficult lesson for us all. We are full of our own works, our schemes and plans, our ways of getting the world right. We attempt to make the Tabernacle after our own pattern, instead of waiting for God's. But when the spirit of rest enters us, all this is altered. We cease from our own works. We take the way of Chirst, which was always compliance with his Father's purpose, and find rest unto our souls. Under the Old Covenant work led up to rest; under the New the week begins with the rest-day.

FRIDAY, January 13.

Exodus xxxii.

Moses stood in the breach, as Mediator, and herein is a living and true a type of the Lord Jesus. Aaron, the saintly priest, fails, Moses stands. Jesus combines the office of Aaron, without his failure, and the mediating grace of Moses, without his limitations.

Moses' prayer. There are three or four notes in it. He reminds God of the redeeming grace that brought about the Exodus, his great power and mighty hand—would He not complete what He had begun! He reminds God of the comments that Pharaoh and the Egyptians might make, to the disparagement of the Divine character. He reminds God also of the Covenant. Here is an argument which never fails. In the darkest hours, let us go back to the Covenant, into which God has entered with us in Jesus Christ, and say, "Remember the Covenant."

Moses in action. He remonstrates with Aaron for not having restrained the people, destroys the calf, designates Levi as the minister of Divine vengeance, and casts the tables from his hands. There was no weak compromise or condoning of wrong. And though Jesus pleads for us, He will not hesitate to chastise us, or to make us drink of the bitter results of our transgressions. Never forget that forgiven souls may yet have to drink the water on which the dust of their molten calves has been strewn.

SATURDAY, January 14.

Exodus xxxiii.

Thus do holy souls hold converse with God. They speak with God face to face, as a man speaketh with his friend. This is how their faces come to shine. But this holy familiarity is only possible to those who stand on the ground of the finished work of Atonement. There is no such standing-place as this. Nowhere else can the face of a sinful man meet the face of God without fear or shame. We must enter the tent of meeting, where the blood has been shed and sprinkled, ere the pillar of cloud will descend and Jehovah will speak to us.

Notice how the Lord speaks to Moses (1, 17, 20, 21). Moses speaks to the Lord (12, 15, 18). There is colloquy, and interchange of thought and word. When God bids us do a thing, we may dare to reason with Him and say, "Whom wilt Thou send with me?" It is grateful to God, when his servants come to a stand, and refuse to take another step unless they are assured that He goes beside.

What a marvellous strength it must have given to Moses when God said, "I know thee by name, and thou hast found grace in my sight." Yet there is a sense in which He says as much to every true-hearted, obedient believer in Jesus, and if we will claim it of Him, He will make all his goodness pass before us, He will proclaim and unfold his nature, He will put us into the cleft of the rock, and cover us with his hand.

Glimpses of Romanism.

I.—The Pope's True Position.

By Rev. A. ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

IT is very difficult for people in England to realize the true position the Pope holds in the Roman Catholic Church. In popular imagination he is invested with sovereign dignity and autocratic power. As a matter of fact he has neither the one nor the other. To take the question of power first—of that he has about as much as a slave could have, for he is a slave. He is entirely under the control of the Black Pope, alias the Jesuits. They absolutely regulate for him all he says and all he does.

In illustrating this fact to me Count Campello, who was a great friend of the last Pope, Pio Nono, drew a circle and said, "Within that circle he is free; if he crosses it he is a dead man." That is to say, in strictly private affairs he has a certain amount of freedom, but the moment he dares to act for himself in public matters outside the will of the Jesuits, he runs the risk of being poisoned. The poisoned cup, like the sword of Damocles, ever threatens his life. I remember once mentioning that fact at a public meeting in London, when a lady, at its close, stopped behind and said, "I saw what people said was an attempt to poison Pio Nono. After drinking the wine when celebrating the Mass he changed colour and seemed to stagger, after which he was borne out of St. Peter's." He might have been seized with sudden illness, but popular rumour said the wine was mixed.

The world knows that Pio Nono at first professed a liberal policy, that Italy expected him to pursue that policy, and that suddenly he wheeled round and, turning his back on his profession, became a thorough ultramontane and the enemy of the young kingdom of Italy; going so far as not only to call in a foreign enemy—the French (who keep Pope Leo on his throne to-day)—to fight against the Italians, but ordering his guards, when his cause was utterly hopeless, at the end of September, 1870, not to refrain from shooting down the soldiers of Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi, then besieging Rome. I give that as one illustration in popular belief of the working of the poisoned cup. People have got used to the knowledge of these things in Italy, but it must give every honest man a shock, and cause him to recoil with detestation from the Papal Church, when he learns that that is the position of its visible head, and one who styles himself the vicegerent of Jesus Christ.

I do not wonder when I am told by priests themselves that many of them are atheists; nor am I surprised that in Italy most of the morality, education, industry, and religion of the land are found outside the Papal Church. About the Pope's personal appearance I do not care to speak. Zola, in his "Rome," tells us that even in dress he is not unlike the poor, snuff-besprinkled priests one sees in the streets of Rome, and that it is difficult to get him, when he is giving an audience, to put on a clean white surplice. I can quite believe it; and yet this is the man whom so many nowadays in England look up to as their spiritual chief, and this is the so-called Catholic and Apostolic Church with which they would fain connect themselves. The folly and infatuation of their conduct is inexplicable. And then there follows this sad consequence—they become like their head and church, and not only cease to be Christians, but cease to be Englishmen. Nothing seems to me so utterly to debase human nature — eradicating from it all Divine principle and moral sense — as Popery.

Protestantism in the 16th Century.

By MARGARET A. ROLLESTON.

SOMETIME ago, a writer in these pages pointed out that, though the world owes a great debt to Luther, yet his influence on German Protestantism has not been altogether for good. The very greatness of the man has tended to produce stagnation in the Church he helped to organise. Evangelical Christianity has not suffered from such a drawback in England. Our Reformers were good men, some scholars, some great preachers, but not one of them combined the keen intellectual, moral and spiritual greatness of the German Reformer. Consequently we are not familiar with the lives of the men to whom we owe so much for freeing this country from the bondage of Rome; and attempts are in the present day frequently made to minimise the change effected in the 16th century on the National Church, by declaring that all that the English Reformers then achieved was emancipation from the rule of the Pope, but not repudiation of the doctrines distinctive of the Romish Church. In other words, it is asserted that the Reformation in England was not Protestant; it freed the Church of Popery, but not of Catholicism.

In order to test the truth of this statement, we ought first to be ourselves clear as to what the principles of the 16th century Reformation were; and secondly, acquaint ourselves with the lives and opinions of the so-called English Reformers, in order that we may know whether the name Protestant or Catholic more accurately describes them. Thus we shall be able to judge what the changes, which undoubtedly did take place in the English Church, meant to the persons principally responsible for bringing them about.

Protestant as distinct from Catholic Christianity has laid stress upon three doctrines:—

1. The supremacy of the Bible as the guide for the Christian.
2. Justification by faith.
3. The sanctity of home life and natural joys.

THE SUPREMACY OF THE BIBLE.

During the Middle Ages the Bible was practically a sealed book, and the place it should have held was usurped by the authority of the Church. It is easy to understand how this came about. Comparatively few persons could read, printing was unknown, the multiplication of a book difficult; and consequently the unlearned and poor would have to depend more than at present upon oral teaching. A temptation was thus placed in the way of the teachers to magnify their own importance. How can a man understand God's truth as revealed in the Bible without a teacher? The answer must indeed be that such an achievement is impossible; but having granted that, it does not necessarily follow that the Church is the sole teacher of Divine truth. To assert that God's Holy Spirit only speaks through the Church is to forget, (1) that the Church is composed of fallible mortals, and has at times been eminently corrupt; (2) that the Holy Spirit is given to all who ask, and his work is to lead men into all truth.

During the middle ages the clergy, as personifying the Church, usurped the place of guide to the human conscience, and as a result many evils and superstitions crept into the belief of Christendom. It is hardly necessary to do more than allude to the terrible ignorance and superstition prevailing towards the close of the so-called Ages of Faith. The worship of the saints had largely taken the place of the worship of God, trust was placed in the performance of good works, religious rites had undue value put upon them, and many a truly pious soul was bound in the chain of slavish fear. Out of this bondage the great Reformation leaders on the Continent were freed by the reading of the Bible; and Luther, even before he definitely broke with Rome, pointed his pupils to the Scriptures rather than to the Church as the exponent of the knowledge of the will of God.

In tracing the lives of English reformers we shall find a similar part played by the Bible in the work of emancipation, and indeed so great has been its influence that D'Aubigné, the great historian of the Reformation, has declared that in England, even more than on the Continent, the Reformation was effected by the Word of God. If such be the case, as the study of the lives of the Reformers will prove, it would, indeed, be astonishing if the Reformed Church in England did not place the authority of the Bible above that of the Church.

It is from this principle of the supremacy of the Scripture that the doctrine of the right of private judgment is deduced. If each man has the right to read the Bible for himself, we cannot quarrel with him if he, believing himself to be taught of God, draws from his reading a different conclusion than that which we do. But, together with the right of private judgment, the Protestant holds the doctrine of the human fallibility of that same judgment, and that it is only as a man comes under the guidance of the Holy Spirit in all things that he is led into all truth.

(To be concluded.)

Protestant Notes.

THE adjourned meeting of Bishops to further consider Ritual Controversies will be held at the Church House on Tuesday, January 17.

. . . . .

From the religious standpoint, the year 1898 will be memorable among other things for the acute form in which the great Ritualistic problem came to the front. After half a century of stealthy and insensible progress, it suddenly unmasked its real aims and unfolded its hidden strength. The net result of the bitter controversy has been threefold:—(1) it has proved the alarming extent to which the movement has permeated the Church of England with Romish teaching and symbolism; (2) the helplessness of the State to control its extravagances; (3) the internal lack of discipline which exists in the church itself.

A Welsh National Protestant League has been formed "to declare and defend the principles of Protestantism, and to expose the aims and errors of Romanism and Ritualism." The first meeting was held a few days ago at Cardiff, under the presidency of Mr. Clifford J. Cory. Owing to systematic disturbances at Protestant meetings in Cardiff, a deputation of influential townsmen lately sought an interview with the Watch Committee, but were not heard. As a consequence, a town's meeting has been held for the public assertion of the right and sanctity of freedom of speech. The meeting was largely attended, and passed a resolution re-appointing the deputation to wait upon the Watch Committee for the purpose of urging the just claims of Protestant gatherings upon the protecting care of the police.

. . . . .

The progress of Protestantism in France is constantly being illustrated by reports in our columns. During recent years the evangelical faith has gained foothold in regions where it has had no representation since the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. During 1897 twelve new Reformed places of worship were inaugurated, with schools for religious instruction attached in each case. The French papers of the past few weeks have recorded the consecration of Temples in Dijon, Bourg-en-Bresse, La Bergerie (Charente Inférieure), and Batignolles (Paris). In the case of Dijon, the Town Council gave the site. One of principal acts of "consecration" in the Reformed Church is the placing of a Bible in the pulpit. God raise up a succession of faithful exponents of the Holy Book! The Protestant cause is rallying temperance workers in France; and in the distracting Dreyfus affair Protestants have from the first demanded "revision."

. . . . .

A correspondent writes:—"There is still in Rome an institution known as the Congregation of the Holy Inquisition, with prefect, secretary, consultors, and inquisitors, offices which, according to old custom, are left in great part to the Order of Dominicans. There is yet the Palace of the Holy Office, with its prisons, where simple priests, under condemnation of the holy tribunal, voluntarily undergo their sentences. Also there are all the instruments and appointments necessary for a renewal of the times of Galileo and Giordano Bruno, should the moral and political conditions of the nations permit of it. There are also, in a corner of the Vatican, beyond the reach of the curious, the archives of the Holy Office. The writer was once passing this quarter in company with a monsignor, and he asked if he might enter the chamber. Although a priest himself, he was denied the privilege, being told, in fact, that were he to do such a thing without permission of the secretary of the Holy Office, he would at once be excommunicated. Such an answer was a surprise. It is not easy to reconcile such a fear of publicity, or consequent inspection of documents, with Rome's claims as to the righteousness of the acts of the Inquisition as affecting the persecutions and burnings of past days."

Obituary.

MR. ROBERT McBURNEY.

THE well-known general secretary of the New York Association entered his rest on December 27. He had been in poor health for some months past, but the end seems to have come somewhat suddenly. For very many years he occupied a place in the foremost rank of workers for young men in America, took a leading part in the development of association organisation throughout the American continent, and had been a prominent figure at National and International Conferences, and in all movements for the extension of association effort during the past quarter of a century. He will be greatly missed by his fellow workers.

MR. PHILIP GOUGH.

This servant of Christ and gospel preacher, who for twenty-two years proclaimed with great simplicity and earnestness the Gospel of God to the tramps who assembled in Gray's Yard, Duke Street, W., entered into rest on Saturday, December 24, at Redhill, Surrey, in his seventy-third year.

His earnest care for souls, especially the most outcast and neglected, was exceedingly great and heartfelt. Truly he was, through grace, a friend of sinners, and the more degraded they were the more his zeal and love towards them abounded, and the deeper was his desire to win them for the Saviour.

God graciously gave him from time to time to see the fruit of his labours; and in some instances cases of conversion, which took place years before, became manifest, and gave him great joy.

The tramps, of whom sometimes as many as 500 were gathered together twice upon the Lord's Day, were very dear to his heart. The time, however, came when his health became so enfeebled and his sufferings so great that he was compelled, with deep sorrow, to give up this work.

He was, emphatically, a preacher to the outcast, and seemed never to have a desire to preach to any well-educated or fashionable congregation, although he was thankful that others were led by God to such work.

Another work of his, in which he was engaged for fourteen years, was with that most excellent and exceedingly useful society known as "The Rescue Society for Women and Children." His sympathy was deeply engaged by the work, whether in visitation, committee meetings, or preaching at the Homes of the Society.

MR. C. J. RODGERS.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has received intelligence of the sudden death of Mr. Chas. J. Rodgers, their representative at Lahore. Previous to this appointment, Mr. Rodgers was for over twenty years Principal of the Amritsar Training College of the Christian Vernacular Education Society, and during that time served for five years on the Indian Archæological Survey. He was a fine exponent of Urdu and Persian, and a well-known authority on numismatics.

New Guinea.—In a recent letter, Rev. James Chalmers said: "Here we have been opening a chapel which cost £250. The people paid for it themselves; they celebrated the opening for ten days, and during those ten days they entertained 500 of their fellow natives, and on the closing day they had a banquet for 1,000 people. The whole entertainment cost over £200. They paid it all themselves. A few years ago these men were savages and cannibals."

Towards the Sunrise.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

CERTAINLY Port Said is the worst place I have ever visited, filled with unblushing vice. They say it is marvellously improved since a British official was stationed here; what it must have been previously is inconceivable.

A very mixed population, the dregs of all the nationalites bordering on the Mediterranean, but specially Egyptians, Syrians, and Greeks—the latter demoralising all the rest. We disembark, and under the kind guidance of Mr. Locke, of the Sailors' Rest, perambulate the town, visit some Christian schools, and enjoy the refreshment of a little meeting for praise, prayer, and the exposition of the Word.

The next morning we enter the Canal, on our left a vast plain of light-coloured level sand, extending from the canal to the borders of Palestine—the natural roadway between Egypt and the Land of Promise, traversed by armies and individuals in all ages, by Joseph's brethren before they knew him; by Joseph and Mary, with their precious Child, and by the eunuch of Candace. On the horizon, several times during the day, we are deceived by the evanescent beauty of the mirage.

On the other side of the Canal, the great salt lake Menzaleh, covering in some part with its salt waters what was once the land of Goshen. Flocks of white birds are the principal objects of interest; and as we pass further into the country we see from time to time a solitary Arab on his camel, or an Arab village, or a string of camels. But as the sun goes down a melancholy steals over us; all is so desolate, lonesome, weird and waste. Oh! these great deserts of the world, how small is human life compared with their immensity, how short our space contrasted with their vast vacancy!

All night we travel through the canal, twice grazing the side of a passing ship, lying up at intervals to let another go by, traversing the salt lakes and within near proximity of the town of Ismailia, our great electric search-lights scanning the way that our vessel takes.

On more than one of the evenings a little party of us gathered about the Bible. On board is quite a large band of Christians; many missionaries returning to their spheres, and several young civilians entering on their life-work with the fixed intention of doing the will of God.

On the right, notice that range of mountains, at right angles to the water, running far away into the land of Egypt; this is the range which arrested the march of the Israelites on that memorable night from which dates their national history. When the scouts that followed their march brought tidings to Pharaoh that they had taken the route which must conduct them to this wall of rock, he rejoiced with savage glee, crying, "They are entangled in the land, the mountains have shut them in." And the enemy said, "I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil." That low-lying plain on this side of the mountains must have been the one on which the panic-stricken hosts encamped, in full view of Pharaoh's march, while Moses cried unto the Lord.

Last night the search-lights of the great vessels proceeding through the canal produced extraordinary effects. It seemed as though they could cast a beam of white light for two or three miles at least. But an earlier search-light was that which the Angel of the Lord cast across the sea to illumine Israel's pathway through the depths, when He moved from the front of the host to the rear, and gave light by night to Israel, and the blackness of midnight to Egypt.

Through these waters the hosts must have passed. Here the waves reared their crests on either side like walls. This broad expanse of water is the greatest baptistery in the world, in which a whole nation was baptised unto Moses, "in the cloud and in the sea." It was indeed a grave, for here, whilst Israel was baptised into freedom and the first beginnings of national life, the Egyptian hosts, following them, were drowned. They sank like lead in these mighty waters.

Now turn to the left. Parallel to the coast, at a distance of perhaps twenty miles, runs a line of hills. Between those hills and the margin of the water is the wilderness of Shur. Here the ransomed hosts burst into the hallelujah chorus. I seem to almost hear the clear treble voices of Miriam and the women as they sing out the chorus of redemption. All down that coast the shores were strewn with the bodies of Egypt's mighty men. There the people went three days without water. Yonder are "the wells of Moses," perhaps the site of Marah; and further south an oasis that may have been Elim; and further still the heaped-up mountains that cluster around the mighty Sinai.

What a contrast between these two shores. On the one side slavery, on the other freedom; here the luxurious and comforts of comparative civilisation, there the rocky desert pathway; here the type of the soul which enjoys the pleasures of sin for a season, there of one which chooses the reproach of Christ, submits to the guidance of the pillar of cloud, is content to be accounted as a pilgrim and stranger, having no abiding place here, but seeking one to come.

All day we have been sailing down the Gulf of Suez, land—one should rather say mountains—on either side, the expanse of water, some fifteen to twenty miles across. The sun is shining brilliantly; but there is no great need as yet to do more than lay aside the winter overcoat, and this must be resumed at sundown.

All day one object has filled the eye and ministered to the imagination. Of what else could we think than of the mighty scenes transacted within that clustered mountain-range on our left, along which we have been travelling some 150 miles in length? It seemed almost sacrilegious to find the young men get up sports and a tug-of-war, whilst most of the passengers were drowsing over light literature, when we were within sight of the Mount of God, once wreathed in cloud and tempest, and trembling beneath the Majesty of the Divine Glory.

The afternoon sunlight struck full upon the Sinaitic range, rising sheer from a plain of sand; our vessel was quite ten miles away, but in the clear air all was vividly distinct. We could descry the entire range of mountains from north to south—their colour red sandstone, but in this gorgeous sunshine, pink; their heights, varying from 3,500ft. to 8,000ft. Long strata-like clouds lay softly on the summits, casting deep shadows, and in a few cases a cumulus crowned the highest peaks. Not a trace of snow, or verdure, or water, or life.

Presently the sun set, and the light, faded from pink to lilac, and from lilac to dark purple, and the clouds darkened with night.

Further on, we reach the point where the Gulf of Akaba enters the Red Sea; at the end of this lay Ezion-geber, Solomon's Liverpool, and we try to imagine his sailors and Hiram's returning up this grand highway from India laden with peacocks, apes, ivory, and gold.

What a marvellous school was this in which God gathered his people to teach them his law, and to form a rabble of slaves into a nation of freemen, of priests and kings, for his own possession, and for the enrichment and blessing of mankind.

THE LATE

Rev. H. M. Williamson, D.D.,

Belfast.

THIS well-known veteran evangelist and pastor has been suddenly summoned to the land "whose green turf hides no grave." He had been ailing for about three weeks, but had considerably rallied, and spoke of paying a visit to his daughter in Glasgow. On Thursday, December 29, he rose, dressed, and was engaged in writing a letter, when a sudden attack of weakness seized him, and in a few minutes the long life of happy laborious Gospel service had ended, and the great spiritual harvest man had entered upon the saints' everlasting rest.

Little more than a month ago he sat, with a representative of this journal, on the platform of the large hall in connection with the Shankill Road Mission, Belfast, entering heartily into all the inaugural proceedings, and himself taking part in them. This proved to be almost his latest public appearance.

For the last twenty-five or thirty years he has been the most outstanding Gospel preacher in Ireland—a kind of evangelical primate—strong, simple-minded, fearless; and the passion for aggressive soul-winning work burning brightly in him to the end. Our recollection of this master in Israel goes back for more than a quarter of a century. In the early seventies Dr. Williamson was a great spiritual power. He held meetings at that time in conjunction with Mr. James Barton, of Dundalk, Mr. Henry Moorhouse, and others, which were much owned of God. His words had a Pentecostal edge and point to them which simply went through an audience like spiritual lightning. People have turned pale under his solemn, searching sentences; and as he unfolded the heart-guilt of veneered professors, strong men have trembled where they sat, and either bowed in brokenness of spirit or stamped out of the meeting, mad at the too clear and conscience-smiting exposure of sin.

On these occasions Mrs. Williamson sometimes accompanied her husband, and occasionally sang one of the older revival hymns, like "What's the News," or some of those familiar in the Huntly gatherings.

He often talked brightly, too, of those earlier triumphs of the Cross, and especially his open air meetings with Duncan Matheson. He has amused more than one tea table by the recital of Duncan's device for advertising their Gospel campaign in a village drowned with drink. Placing Mr. Williamson on a chair, he began knocking at the doors of the villagers shouting as he went, "Come awa' out, come awa' out, the Gospel is come to the town." When the people looked out they say the tall commanding figure of the Huntly pastor perched upon a chair. Though trying to flesh and blood, the plan succeeded in gathering, as he said, with God's blessing, a large meeting.

It was in the year 1874, however, that Dr. Williamson's enlarged opportunity for service in this favourite field came to him. The visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to the North of Ireland stirred the community to an extent not witnessed since '59. There was a large movement to the Cross. Into this blessed work the Fisherwick Place rector entered with characteristic energy.

When it was hinted to him on one occasion that some very staid people were afraid he was going too far, and entering too warmly into the work of the American revivalists, he replied with one of Duncan Matheson's stories. A young convert came to the indefatigable evangelist and said, "The people tell me that I'm mad." "Run and tell them that I said you were to bite everybody you met." The good man wanted everybody to be alive and alert to the things of God.

At this time a work of grace began in Bangor, a well-known watering place near to Belfast. Mr. Williamson worked with Mr. Moody all day, and went to the sea-side resort at night. Here the arm of the Lord was made bare. One of the most striking features of the preacher's evangelistic gifts lay in his power to subject to the keenest analysis the motives and lives of his hearers. His dissecting knife was absolutely merciless. Some of his messages to communicants who had never been savingly changed were so solemn and subduing that people sat in their seats some nights almost afraid to move. One memorable address comes back at the bidding of memory upon "And they rowed hard to bring it to the land, but they could not." The vain struggles of mere professors represented by the toilsome tugging at the labouring oar was most powerfully depicted, and the lesson taught that some secret sin in the heart prevented land being reached and peace secured. Hoary sinners, though not many, were found mingling in happy Gospel song with the younger people whose hearts God had touched at this time of spiritual refreshing.

He was a man of much prayer. He was constantly getting the friends of the work on their knees. He has often said to the present writer when rising to speak, "Now then, now then, sharpen your sword first," by which he meant "Pray before you speak." When rising himself to address an audience he would often say to his comrades in the holy war, "Keep looking to God all the time. Pray! Pray!" Thus, the God-given messages of those days were simply a triumphal chariot upon which Christ rode into the hearts of sinners.

From photograph by Mr. Hembry, Belfast.

He had, too, a most unique experience in dealing with inquiring ones. His great tenderness and tact made him a most welcome worker amongst the seekers. We have often seen him move about through an aftermeeting very much like a surgeon picking his way among the wounded on a battlefield. Indeed, he sometimes said, to induce greater prayerfulness, "Remember that the meeting to-night is simply a battle-ground as between heaven and hell." "A good many wounded ones to-night," he would say on leaving a meeting where the Holy Ghost had been convicting deeply of sin. On one occasion, when a bright young man waited behind and began to converse rather glibly, he said, "If you're wounded at all it is only a flesh wound."

At this period he simply lifted aloft and swept the country with the fiery cross of a free and full salvation through the blood of Jesus.

While his sermons were strong on the sin side, they were also strong on the side of free grace. He had a blessed God-given art of making people utterly ashamed of their rejection of Jesus Christ, and many a sinner went away sorrowful at any rate at his strange, sad behaviour. People came to seek counsel at his hands regarding spiritual things from all parts of the country, and cheerfully did he give much time to this unseen service for his Lord and Master.

One of his life-long friends, Mr. William Young, J.P., of Fenaghy, near Ballymena, had him staying at his home about a dozen years ago. Walking one day over the grounds, his eye caught a large field sloping upwards towards the public road. He quickly said, "What a fine field for a big open-air gathering!" Thus it came to pass that he was led to repeat in the North of Ireland what Matheson and he had so admirably carried out at Huntly. He took the keenest delight in making arrangements for these large gospel gatherings, which attracted considerable attention over the country, and brought Rev. John McNeill and other prominent evangelists into contact with a North of Ireland audience. He presided at these services, and amongst his former comrades in this blessed work he had the joy of welcoming Mr. Reginald Radcliffe.

He preached the old gospel in its freeness and fulness, and had no new-fangled notions to proclaim. He was very impatient of what is known as the higher criticism. He used to say, "I notice in all these new theories that by making little of sin the sinner is led to take sides with himself against God." "I have always found, however," he would add, "that a sinner never makes any headway to the Cross until he takes sides with God and against himself." He loved and faithfully preached the old gospel to the last, and when he saw sinners coming to the Saviour his eye sparkled with a brightness which told of the joy within. His memory, through grace, will long remain fresh and fragrant in the North of Ireland, as of one who knew the power of the gospel in his own heart, and who loved to proclaim it far and near.

HENRY MONTGOMERY.

Japanese Jottings.

By Rev. Geo. C. NEEDHAM.

THIS is peculiarly a land of surprises. One is not allowed to glide into a sublimated quietism. Nature is ever on the move. Typhoons, floods and earthquakes are the chief disturbers of the peace. The first two are, however, only occasional; while the last are ever on the shake—the average number more than one a day. Our last experience was not less anxious than the first. Between times one may forget earthquakes, but when they are on there is no chance of being oblivious. To feel your house suddenly lifted and as quickly dropped, then heaved from side to side like a ship on a swelling ocean, and finally, as if Nature were irritated and sought revenge, pushed and pulled and twisted and shaken until ceilings crack and timbers creak and floors sink beneath you. In a moment all is over, but you wait in nervous anxiety for a second like visitation. There may be but one shock, or there may be a succession of them. The earthquake cometh without sound of wind or splash of rain, and anon departeth with noiseless tread. It is a silent force in its approach and departure, and is cruellest of all destructive phenomena in that it soundeth no alarm of approach. One dear missionary and his noble wife carry scars on head and body from devastations wrought by this gigantic power. And yet they and others continue in their work in the midst of dangers, holding forth the word of life to the millions of heathen exposed to the terrors of the coming judgment day. This is consecration indeed.

Japan is a land of extremes. It is also kaleidoscopic. Few books, if any, describe the real Japan. The face of the country has its delightful features and its disappointing prospects. Her people are attractive and repulsive, her government is unstable, her commercial morality unreliable. She is progressing, but with uncertain step. Her politicians are without a strong leader, while they fatten on the labours of an industrious people. Their religions are being discarded as worthless for salvation, while their temples are crowded with petitioners for material prosperity.

The enlightened missionary understands her complaint, and is applying the remedy. Every department of Christian work is producing results. The evangelistic, the educational, the philanthropic, and the circulation of Biblical literature are silent forces, producing radical results in spiritual regeneration. And because this coming of new life is personal and not national, the sneer of the traveller is known by his supercilious query, "What have the missionaries done in thirty years for Japan?"

It has been my great privilege to spend an hour with one of Japan's former greatest of statesmen. He is now old and retired, but he watches with patriotic interest the political game going on. He admitted there was no leading man at the helm, and when reference was made to Mr. Gladstone, I asked, "Can a heathen country produce such a man?" Frankly he said, "No." This gentleman was willing I should pray with him, and, having done so, and pointed him to Christ as an all-sufficient Saviour, he thanked me with many words of generous gratitude. He is a learned and humane man, and I ask prayer on his behalf.

THE LATE

Hon. Lady Beauchamp.

A DESCRIPTION is given in Ezekiel i. 9, of the living creatures which the Prophet saw in his vision, and one of their striking characteristics is that—"They turned not when they went; they went every one straight forward." It would be difficult to find any one sentence which more clearly defined the leading force in Lady Beauchamp's life. It was her constancy, first to her God and his interests, and then to her friends and to all connected with her, which made her such a tower of strength.

She did not consider herself gifted for speaking, and was unwilling to take a leading or public part in religious movements, for her self-depreciation was extreme; but from her childhood till the last scene of her life on earth, overlooking the Havre Harbour, she "turned not," but in the strength, and by the grace of her Saviour, "went straight forward."

Lady Beauchamp was the daughter of Lord Radstock, and the second of his three children, all of whom were converted in early life, largely through the influence of their mother—a true Christian as well as a woman of force and intelligence. The work of grace thus begun in the hearts of the two sisters, Elizabeth and Caroline, owed under God its further development to their brother, the present Lord Radstock, who became a great blessing both to his mother and sisters.

Religious life in London fifty years ago was very different from what it is to-day, and for young ladies to forego society for any kind of religious work was an undreamt of thing. Caroline, therefore, as a matter of course, had to go into society, though of a religious sort; but the influence of worldly surroundings in no sense carried her away.

It was at this critical time in her soul's history that she came under the influence and teaching of Rev. Montagu Villiers, afterwards Bishop of Durham; she attended his church and received great strength and help from his outspoken utterances on separation from the world.

Though little can be known of these early years, yet it was doubtless at this time that God revealed Himself to her soul, and her heart became more and more set on following her Saviour. In these years, and increasingly as time went on, her Bible became her guide, and when she was able to say, "Thus saith the Lord," all further discussion was useless.

In 1852 came her marriage with Sir Thomas Proctor Beauchamp, of Langley Park, Norfolk—a marriage ideal as well in its happiness as in its true union of aim and purpose. Both served and loved the same Master; both had but one desire, that they and all they had might be used in his service; and each was helped and inspired by the influence of the other.

From the very beginning of their married life they took a decided stand, and though the first nine years were principally spent in London, and her time much engrossed in her household and family cares, yet Lady Beauchamp was nevertheless recognised as caring only for the things of God, and most of her spare time was spent in the district appointed to her by Bishop Pelham, then rector of Marylebone.

In 1861 Sir Thomas and Lady Beauchamp moved to Langley Park, their country seat in Norfolk. Here, again, the same steady, unswerving purpose prevailed, for without a thought of "what people would say," or "their duty to society," they laid their home, their time, and all, at the feet of their Master.

And God accepted the offering, for this home became a centre of light and blessing, which spread through the entire county. Everyone quickly learned that Langley differed from most other large houses, not in its hospitality or comfort, but because Christ was in very deed the Head of the household, and his claims and interests were given the first place. The late Mr. Reginald Radcliffe was the first speaker invited from London to hold meetings there, and in his coming the initial spark to the wonderful blaze of the Norfolk Revival was kindled. Sir Thomas and Lady Beauchamp, however, were not interested in the spiritual welfare of the poor alone, but they arranged drawing-room meetings, and many of the neighbours and county friends were brought in. Notably among these was the late W. Jary, Esq., of Burlingham, and his sisters, and they, in their turn, became centres of blessing.

Space will not allow us to tell of all who visited Langley in those days. Joshua Poole, Lord Radstock, Brownlow North, the Scotch Fishermen, converted Gipsies—any and all who had been made the means of blessing in other places—were invited to hold meetings in Langley and the neighbouring villages.

Here, too, the first great Whit-Monday tea was held. A huge tent was erected in the park; thousands flocked from all parts of the county, and seven or eight separate meetings were in full swing at the same time.

One of the most striking features in Lady Beauchamp's character was her balance of mind; she never allowed one duty, however important, to interfere with the discharge of another, and therefore, amid all this deeply interesting work, the claims of her home and children were never overlooked, but the influence of her sunny happy nature pervaded everything. It was her delight to have her children with her. She had that quality, so invaluable for the head of a large household, the power of not being fretted by small worries and interruptions, and she could write or talk undisturbed by the voices and presence of her children.

It was her custom, in days when her nine sons and daughters represented three separate gradations of knowledge, to have three sets of Bible readings with them daily, one for the elder, one for the medium, and one for the babies of her flock. "One feels," says one of her daughters, "how healthy and wholesome was our bringing up; there was nothing forced or unreal, we saw what God was to our parents, and we received our impressions as much from their lives as from their words."

Lady Beauchamp carried this same spirit into every detail of her home, and it was her rule to have prayer every Monday morning with her housekeeper, while many of the servants date their conversion from the time spent at Langley.

In the villages around, Lady Beauchamp was a constant and unwearied visitor, distributing her help and charity, not by deputy, but according to her own knowledge of the actual need and worth of the case. "I can see the carriage now," says her daughter, "driving round and round, waiting for her to finish her pile of letters, and then she would start, surrounded with soup cans, bedrests, books, blankets, cushions, and every imaginable gift for the poor."

But we are lingering too long over this happy country life, which ended in 1874 in the crushing blows which left her, in one short year, motherless and a widow. It is striking, before we turn from the Langley days, to notice that it was here that the first Oxford meetings were decided upon, of which Keswick is an outcome. Dr. Pierson, in the "Story of Keswick," says:—"The details of the Oxford Convention were settled during a mission week in August, 1874, at Langley Park, the seat of the late Sir Thomas Beauchamp, who shortly afterwards passed from an earnest life of service to an eternity of reward. Having received great blessing himself in a similar meeting the previous year, he again generously gathered about forty clergymen, and many others, for five days' waiting upon God for consecration and prayer."

Immediately at the close of these meetings the fatal illness from which Sir Thomas had been suffering for the last six months became acute, and only six weeks later Lady Beauchamp was left alone. But if God's grace was magnified in her during her days of happiness, the calm, trustful resignation was even more wonderful in the time of her deep grief. No heavy mournful trappings were allowed at the grave side. The pall was of white, with the words "Washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb" worked upon it in scarlet letters. Her voice rose clear and strong in the hymn sung round the open grave, and yet twenty-two years of unbroken and perfect happiness had just ended, and she stood a widow—with nine children about her, the youngest but seven years old.

Who can be surprised that more than one at that funeral sought, and sought not vainly, the same power and grace that could keep her in perfect peace at such a time?

After six more years spent at Langley, until the marriage of her son, Sir Reginald Beauchamp, Lady Beauchamp settled finally in London.

Here interests quickly gathered round her, and 3, Cromwell Road, became just such a centre in London as Langley had been in Norfolk.

Lady Beauchamp was, however, a strong enemy to spasmodic effort, and she undertook three special weekly duties which were never neglected or laid aside for any pressing claims. These were her visits to the Brompton Infirmary, the Cancer Hospital, and to a low dancing-saloon in Ratcliff Highway, from which she seldom returned till midnight or later. All that was accomplished at the latter place will never be known this side of the grave, for she spoke unwillingly of her own doings, and the visits to the music hall were, as a rule, paid alone. But we know she talked personally to the drunken sailors and girls, distributed her books and tracts, and never shrank from the jeering and scorn with which she was often received.

The owner of the place was finally so greatly impressed that he more than once put the hall at her disposal for a meeting. On one occasion she was dealing with some of the crowd, when the band struck up "Safe in the arms of Jesus" in valse time.

Inexpressibly pained, Lady Beauchamp sent up a message to the effect that unless the air was at once changed she must leave the hall. Down hastened the manager, with deep regret expressed on his face. He was indeed distressed at having offended her ladyship; nothing was farther from his desire—in fact, he had himself desired the band to play that special tune, as he thought by that means he would be working with her.

As with Langley, so with her London house, every part of it was consecrated to God's work. Meetings were held in the drawing room for the furtherance of God's work in all parts of the world, a weekly Bible class for police took place in her dining room, and when a large gang of navvies was at work in the neighbourhood the servants' hall was thrown open to them daily, and they were provided with coffee in the dinner hour, allowed to smoke, and after a short, bright meeting books and tracts were given to them. Through this evidence of practical Christianity some of their number were definitely converted and many helped.

Besides this, Lady Beauchamp went further, for she not only opened her home for meetings of all sorts, but many a prodigal son or daughter found refuge and wise motherly help and counsel beneath her roof. One such case, the scapegrace son of a Swedish gentleman, was on the point of committing suicide from despair when Lady Beauchamp came across him in Ratcliff Highway. She took him to Cromwell Road, and this act of Christ-like charity proved to be the turning point in his life, for after this he returned to Sweden with new hope and courage, married, and went finally to Rio, where he found regular work.

Nor were her patience and love exhausted after the first or second discouragement, the Lord had breathed into her heart too much of his own spirit for that. One man helped by her went again utterly to the bad, and returned to Cromwell Road in the last stage of destitution. Again the house was opened to him, and again he was put on his feet and has been in regular work since.

Women prodigals, too—ah, how many has she not loved and sheltered!—some educated, some of the lowest, many most disheartening and ungrateful; but God's grace in her gave her faith and hope even for those for whom others would despair.

It was a great joy to her to see many of her children, naturally and without any force or pressure, sharing in her work, and following in her steps; in fact, her one desire for her whole family was that they should love and serve her God. She reckoned it an intense privilege to be able to offer up her fourth son as a missionary to the heart of China, and none but those who knew her best would understand how deeply and continuously she felt his absence, for she never dwelt upon the sacrifice, but alluded to him and to his life-work with the most radiant smile.

The foreign work which was to engross more and more of her time and attention began in a very small way. In 1882 some Russian friends at Honfleur found a wonderful opening for God's word, and they wrote begging that she would come over to help them.

Her answer was a decided "No." She had never taken meetings, and her hands were full with her London duties. Once again they wrote pleading that she would pray over the matter, and not decide hastily.

After much and earnest prayer, she decided to go for a time to France, and several were converted in the meetings held at Honfleur. After a few months, the captain of a trading ship exclaimed, "It is very well to preach to the sailors, but no places are open to them except cafés and bad houses."

This passing comment it was which decided the renting of suitable premises for a Sailors' Rest and Home at Honfleur, and a godly manager was secured. Many wonderful cases of conversion were seen here. An attempt to work a home like that at Honfleur was begun at Havre; but after a few months it was on the point of being abandoned as a failure, when the Scandinavian pastor begged that, before the home was finally closed, Lady Beauchamp would lend her manager from Honfleur to try what could be done.

She agreed, and this manager, an earnest Christian man, went in. He dedicated one small room to a meeting-hall. God honoured and blessed the work, and all thought of closing was quickly at an end, and very soon larger premises were secured.

In this way, without her seeking it, the Master placed these two Sailors' Homes specially into his servant's hands. And since 1889 Lady Beauchamp gave her life for the French, English and Scandinavian sailors in these two ports. From Langley, or from Cromwell Road, to the Sailors' Home at Havre, situated in the very centre of the worst slums of the town, and right on the quay, seems a long step down, and yet her face was as bright and her manner as cheerful as she sat night after night among a crowd of sailors, many of them drunk, as when of old she received her friends in her own drawing-room.

"I have had a lesson I shall never forget," said an English minister, after visiting the Sailors' Rest. "Even the sight of the place and its surroundings made me almost shrink back in disgust. I have never felt so humbled before."

But there was none of the martyr about Lady Beauchamp; God had blessed her with a nature frank, transparent, truthful to a fault, and she disliked nothing more than an assumption of saintliness, and yet few exercised so much personal self-denial.

To her it was the most natural thing in the world that the sailors should call her "Mother," and she would sit at the organ playing for them hour after hour, till within a few weeks of the end.

To watch her there alone, without any of her family, sometimes for months together at the homes, made all who knew her wonder at the grace which kept her serene and bright, even gay, amidst such surroundings.

One duty, and one only, did she consider of sufficient importance to take her from her post, and that was the sickness or need of any of her own family. Each month, latterly, she went to Southsea to visit and cheer her only sister, laid aside from active service for the Lord, and she never omitted a long weekly letter to each of her children abroad.

God had given her a heart singularly wide and large in its interests and capacity, for race, creed, nationality, colour, caste, or station in life mattered not, if there was one she had the opportunity of helping,

The homes were entirely for British and Scandinavian sailors; but some French soldiers, who liked the quiet of the place, came also, and for these she commenced Bible readings. As an outcome of this the French Protestant ladies in Havre have opened special reading rooms for French soldiers, at which there is now an attendance of from sixty to one hundred per day.

"You help the sailors, Madame, but you do nothing for us poor charbonniers." So said a coal-carrier to her one day as she went on board a ship laden with books and Testaments. These charbonniers are the very dregs of the population; but not long after, a little bi-weekly meeting was specially organised for them, a restaurant and night-shelter provided, and at this some of the worst were converted.

As an outcome of her labours in these two ports, numbers of the bad houses have been closed, while the home at Havre became the centre for all the Christians, and innumerable lesser efforts sprang directly or indirectly from her influence. There is not space to mention the work among the Bretons and how it was helped by her. One instance among many is the temperance coffee barrows, which now can be found all over the quays for dock labourers, for Lady Beauchamp was a staunch and earnest life-abstainer. God called her home from the very centre of her work. Her love for it was sustained to the last. Careless as ever of her own comforts and condition, she noticed from her bed the mast of an outgoing ship slowly leaving the quays. Too weak to speak, she motioned to one of her children to bend down, and whispered, "Has a bag of books been sent on board?"

Why do we dwell on these details? Not for any human glory or praise, but that others may with us give thanks to God for the work of grace which He began, continued and ended in her soul.

Reaching the Masses.

FOR the third year in succession the thousand churches associated with the West Midland Federation of Evangelical Free Churches, and scattered over 400 towns and villages in Warwickshire, Worcestershire, South Staffordshire, and Shropshire, are engaged in the simultaneous visitation of every house in their respective parishes, for the distribution of a "greeting" from the churches to the inmates, accompanied with the announcement of their services and an invitation to attend public worship and to send their children to the Sunday school.

Three hundred and sixty-nine thousand two hundred houses are thus to be visited by 12,800 visitors, each of whom receives a beautiful "Motto Card," setting forth, by a selection of texts, the motives and inspiration of this great crusade—"The love of Christ constraineth us."

The "greeting" this year consists of a cardboard back, six pages, each having two months' calendar at the head, with portrait and autograph of the writer of the little homily on a text, all selected with special reference to the beautiful picture of Mr. Holman Hunt, "I am the Light of the World," which forms the frontispiece. The writers contributing are Revs. Dr. Clifford, J. H. Jowett, M.A., W. E. Blomfield, B.A., B.D. (Coventry), Dr. Ferguson (Willenhall), Thomas Allen (Handsworth Wesleyan College), and W. Ewing (Convener of the Presbyterian Jewish Committee). Mr. Jowett's contribution appears on p. 11 of our present issue.

Man's Value.—A man becomes the more worthless to God in proportion as he is more precious to himself; and so much the more precious to God as he is, for God's sake, increasingly worthless in his own eyes. "God regardeth the lowly, but knoweth the proud afar off."—Gregory the Great.

Systematic Bible Study.

IN response to a request, Mr. W. R. Newell, of the Bible Institute, Chicago, sends to The Sunday School Times of Philadelphia an account of the Bible-study movement inaugurated by Mr. Moody in Chicago. Some extracts from it will be found helpful in view of the coming series of classes in London by Prof. W. W. White. The writer says:—

"About two years ago, Mr. Moody, in a conversation regarding the religious conditions and opportunities in Chicago, said to me: 'I wish you would begin a popular evening Bible class in our Institute lecture-room, and carry it on this winter. I feel sure there are a great many young people living in this part of the city whom we can engage in Bible study if we set about it aright. Our regular Institute students have enough Bible study in their daily lectures, but there are hundreds of Christian people in this city who are not doing systematic Bible study just because no opportunity has offered itself. I am confident that such a class would be a success.' When I reminded him that such efforts had been made in the institute before and had failed, he replied, in his unanswerable fashion: 'Well, the reason was that an attempt was made to carry on a rigid course of lectures, two or three nights in the week, and, if a student lost one evening, he soon grew discouraged and dropped out of line. Try it one night a week, with a simple, popular lesson.'

"We had with us, at that time, Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, who has been very much used of God in New England in arousing interest in Bible study. I went to him and said: 'Dr. Gray, will you give to a popular audience in the Moody Church the lecture you delivered recently to our students on "How to Master the English Bible"?' Said he, 'Certainly.' Announcements were sent out, and Thursday evening found about eight hundred people gathered in the church. In the course of his lecture, Dr. Gray gave five simple rules that set forth his method:

1. Read the book to be studied.

2. Read it continuously; that is, at a single reading.

3. Read it repeatedly.

4. Read it independently; that is, aside from all helps, however good.

5. Read it prayerfully.

"As the speaker proceeded, I saw that his words went right to the hearts of the people, and I felt that they were eager to take up such a simple plan of study, if only they were rightly directed in it. When Dr. Gray had finished, I asked all those who were ready to pledge themselves, as before God, faithfully to undertake the course of study described, to arise. About four hundred responded.

"Next Thursday evening our Institute lecture-room began to fill up long before the appointed hour with the most enthusiastic people I ever saw. The very atmosphere was surcharged with 'Genesis.' I could only praise God, who had brought us to the simple method of 'searching out in the book of the Lord and reading.' I saw that the great secret of teaching the Word of God lay in inducing people to read and reread and read yet again in the simplest manner, the lesson assigned to them.

"This weekly class was attended most remarkably all winter. Nothing could keep the most of them from the Thursday night Bible class, inclement weather, outside attractions, and even ill-health, proving unavailing. In fact, some of the gayer young people, who had not entered the class, complained that they could not carry on their Thursday evening church socials at all because of the Bible class.

"When Mr. Moody returned to Chicago in the spring, he was more than delighted with the interest the class had shown in the Bible study. After consulting on the subject, we determined to organize two other classes: one on the West Side, and one on the South, in two very prominent churches in these parts of the city.

"When the second lesson of the regular classes opened, I found that God had given us upwards of four thousand members, instead of the three thousand that we had asked for. The enthusiasm in all the classes was similar to that which had been manifested in the class the year before. The faithfulness in attendance was even more remarkable in some instances. The financial burden of carrying on the classes was reduced to a very simple thing indeed by the ready response of those whose hearts were being blessed in the study.

"Our course ran from October through April. The classes began at the Book of Genesis, and finished through the Second Book of Samuel. There were members in the classes who at the close of the course could give the contents of every chapter studied. The spiritual lives of hundreds of the members were transformed. Stories of most and blessing from the simple but constant reading of the Word required in the classes were constantly reaching me, and, indeed, are yet coming almost daily. Time previously spent in reading light, trashy matter was now given with the utmost delight to poring over the Word of God. In some instances members of these classes themselves began other classes, and so the work was spread. Cities and towns in the vicinity of Chicago began to write to us, asking us to send them teachers, or to come out personally and inaugurate similar movements in their midst.

"There are two secrets of the success of this movement which, I am firmly persuaded, practically explain it all. First, specific, believing prayer offered in its behalf. Second, the simple, patient reading and re-reading of the blessed Word of God that was constantly demanded, and faithfully fulfilled, by the members of the classes."

"Treasures of Darkness."

Isaiah xlv., 3.

Oh, the treasures of the darkness!
Hidden treasures richly stored
In the deep and secret places of the Lord.
Wondrous things thy Father keepeth
In his heart of love for thee;
If thou seek them, thou shalt find them verily.

Oh, the whispers of the darkness,
Where his still small Voice is heard;
Listen, listen thro' the silence for each word.
Wondrous things the Master telleth
In the hushed and solemn night;
Listen till He bids thee speak them in the light.

Oh, the secrets of the darkness!
Oh, the secrets of the Lord!
Oh, the secrets of his presence and his word!
Wondrous things the Spirit showeth,
Where the clouds and shadows fall.
If thou seek them thou shalt find them, read them all.

There is music in the darkness;
Sweetest songs are "songs of night."
'Tis at eventide God sendeth fairest light.
Thou shalt find Him in the darkness,
With the clouds about his face,
Saying, "Child, this is thy Father's secret place."

Plymouth.

A Memorial Church has lately been erected at Almora, India, to perpetuate the name and work of the late Dr. Budden of the London Missionary Society, a pioneer worker in the North-West Provinces.

The Chinese Bible Women's Mission supports sixteen native Bible women in China, four cots in the Hangchow and Foochow hospitals, and a day school at Ningpo. It is desired to increase the number of Bible women to a hundred. At a recent meeting held in London, on behalf of the mission, Rev. W. E. Burroughs said that a native Bible woman can be supported for four guineas a year. At the meeting, addresses were given by Miss Wells and Mr. C. T. Studd. These may be found in the January number of The Lamp of China, the quarterly organ of the mission, which can be had of the publishers of this paper.

"Christ's First Miracle."—John ii., 1-11.

Golden Text.—"And his disciples believed on Him."—John ii., 1-11.

CANA, of Galilee, is about nine miles to the N.E. of Nazareth. It was the home of Nathanael. It was here, too, that Jesus Christ spoke the word which healed the nobleman's son. The marriage feast lasted for several days, and was the occasion of great rejoicing and festivity.

CHRIST AT THE FEAST.

Christianity does not destroy pleasure, but encourages and hallows it. We must make our amusements pure by bringing Christ into them.

Christ made the guests happy, and no doubt enhanced his own enjoyment by doing a service. This is the high road to happiness. Teacher might illustrate this by referring to the Christmas parties. If young people were all the time casting about for some means whereby they could increase the comfort and enjoyment of others, they themselves would be much happier. Feasts are spoiled by the envy, jealously, and selfishness.

CHRIST AND SMALL THINGS.

A great man at a feast cannot be expected to worry himself as to whether the potatoes are cooked. We argue like that about Jesus. He is so great, how can he care for the small troubles and temptations of our life. Lesson shows that nothing is beneath his notice, or his willingness and power to help.

Oh! what praise we often forfeit,
Oh! what needless pain we bear,
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer.

CHRIST AND HIS MOTHER (3-5).

Jesus was loving and obedient to his earthly parents. See the story of his visit to the Doctors in the Temple. He was not ashamed of her when he grew into manhood, and she was the subject of one of his last utterances while on the Cross.

Teacher should impress the duty and privelege of present obedience, and when they get older, honour of parents. The promise is still literally fulfilled (Eph. vi). The words in verse 4 are really words of endearment—although they sound harsh to us—indicating that Jesus was willing to aid, but He Himself must decide the time. He had his own purposes to fulfil which many could not understand. But verse 5 shows that the mother understood.

WATER INTO WINE (6-10).

The water pots were stone jars, and there was some wine probably in them already, but it was running short, and Christ told them to refill the vessels with water, and then to pour it out. When they had obeyed Him, the wine was better than that which they had drunk at the beginning of the feast.

The Lesson is that where Christ is, the common things of life are transformed, and their value increased. Tears of grief, if shed in the presence of Christ, become transmuted into pearls. Sickness, if borne for Jesus' sake, becomes a means of grace. The work of our life may be a blessing, and the workshop a temple if Jesus be there.

HIS GLORY (11).

We have to win glory, work hard for the praise of men. But glory resided in Jesus, He only needed to manifest it.

Illustration.—When Ulysses returned from the Trojan war, his relatives and friends did not and could not recognise him. He had been scarred and exposed so much that his appearance had changed. How could he prove his identity? He had left a huge bow at home, which none could wield but himself. He called for this—and the strong bow yielded to the force of his powerful arm. He manifested his strength to them, and his friends believed on him.

So Christ manifested his glory—"Who is this that the winds and the sea obey Him?"

HIS DISCIPLE BELOVED.

The wonders of God's power in Nature may not adequaiely convince an unbeliever. But the disciple who already believes in God will find evidence of his grace and goodness everywhere. Faith transcends reason at the start. It is the blind, unreasoning trust of the child in its father; but as the days go by, that faith is fed by numerous acts, so that we believe with greater intensity day by day.

Young People.

A Happy New Year.

I AM afraid that before this can reach you you will have begun to treat New Year's wishes as "stale news," so many days will have passed since you received them from your friends. But as this is our first issue for 1899, you must let my helpers and myself add ours very heartily to those that have already been showered upon you.

I fancy some of you are rather glad that, owing to Christmas falling as it did, we had to omit one of the Bible Searchers; and admitted to the Prize Competition those who had been correct eight times out of eleven, instead of nine out of twelve, as we had done hitherto. At any rate I notice that a larger number were eligible than ever before, though I know that this is partly due to the steady increase in our membership quarter by quarter.

We are now beginning our fourth year, and I am very much encouraged to see that some of you have been my faithful little friends from the very beginning. I expect though, if I could only see you, that "little" is hardly an appropriate term, as you will be growing into quite big boys and girls by now. But I hope you will be my life-long friends, however big you may be; and that when you find the "Young People's Page" is not old enough for you, you will find the rest of the paper interesting; and will not only read that, but also introduce your younger friends to the page that you have, I trust, found helpful to yourselves.

You have been wished a "Happy New Year;" but do not let the happiness pass away as the year grows older. Some of you were made happy with what you found in your stockings and elsewhere at Christmas, but that happiness passes away. Here is another "find" that will bring a happiness, which will last: "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom," and, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Will you try and keep these two texts in your mind during this year?

Of course, it does not mean that you must have "old heads on young shoulders;" but that, just as Jesus showed his love to little children, to a girl of twelve, to a healthy country lad, and to a widow's only son, so there is no age at which He cannot be attractive to young people and teach them to do what is wise and right.

I am sure the very youngest of you has learned already that wrongdoing ends in trouble and sadness; even if it is not found out, it makes you afraid to meet those whom you love best. Ask Jesus to forgive all your sins—to make you love Him, because He has first loved you; to help you to be wise in the best sense; then you will find happiness, not only in this first week of January, but the whole year through. Let us pray for one another that it may be so. Uncle Tom.

"Be Ye also Ready."

THE motto for one of the regiments of the British army is "Ready, aye, Ready," and the words on one of the volunteer depôts, written large, is "Always Ready." That is the state of preparedness for every true soldier. Once there was a Saxon king who was so constantly unprepared for the frequent attacks the Danes made on our poor country, that he became known as Ethelred "the Unready." To be unprepared for battle is always to court defeat. The best prepared army is generally the most victorious.

There are some boys and girls who are never prepared for school—never ready with their lessons and often late. They are almost always in a hurry at the last minute. They are like a man at college who was generally late, and his friends said of him that he had "three hands—a right hand, a left hand, and a little behind hand."

There was once a boy at school of whom his master said he was never ready for anything but his meals, so he often got into trouble because his work was never done at the right time. Lord Bacon said everyone prepares for some events; the wise man prepares for all.

If people are going abroad they make careful preparation, and are ready for the ship to sail, because there is some uncertainty about the exact minute the vessel will start. We make great preparation for a wedding or a holiday. We like to be ready to receive our friends when we know they are coming.

Wise people are prepared for a rainy day. If the man whose house was robbed only knew at what hour the thief would have come, he would have watched and made ready for his reception. There was once a family who went regularly to service on Sunday evening; they laid the supper and got all ready for their return, and locked up the house before going to church. One night, in the winter, they came back to find the supper all eaten and the silver all gone, and on the empty table these words were written on a scrap of paper, "Watch as well as pray."

Now, if we would be ready for all that may come to us, those words give us the secret of true preparation. If we would be ready for all peril and temptation, we must watch as well as pray. We know that there are dangers and evils we shall have to meet in life—some we cannot escape, some we must fight; but there are many we may prevent with care and forethought. If we always pay ready money, we shall never incur the troubles that comes from debt; if we do without strong drink, we shall never bring upon ourselves the calamities of intemperance.

When the soldier takes this for his motto, "Always ready," it means that he is prepared for anything. He is ready to obey all orders, all the commands from headquarters he will fulfil, and he will answer all the calls of the bugle.

He is ready for service at home or abroad; wherever the colours go the troops must follow. The service may be long and arduous, it may involve waiting and failure, sentinel's duty, or guarding the baggage; whatever the work required from the true soldier, he must do it.

He is ready for sacrifice. There is much to be given up, many comforts to be denied, privation and hardship to be endured. If called into action, suffering and even death may be faced. The true soldier must be prepared for weariness and fatigue, perils and dangers; he must be always prepared to meet the enemy.

There are more terrible foes than armed warriors, worse thieves than pickpockets and housebreakers. There are enemies of character, robbers who would spoil our good name, who would take from us truth and mercy, who would injure a good conscience and steal away our purity and honour. And when honour and character are gone, the best capital we have in life is lost. It is against these foes and theives we must be ever ready to guard the door of our lips, our desires and our hearts.

If we would be "always ready," we must "watch and pray" constantly. Only as we "watch and pray" shall we be prepared for all work and service, for all foes and perils, for rest or for duty. Those who are prepared to meet temptation will be ready for the thief or the enemy, and therefore strong to resist. Those who are most awake to the evil that besets them, and are most busy and earnest in Christian work, will be found most ready for the Master's call to any post, however humble, or to the higher service of his kingdom.

Watch as if on that alone
Hung the issues of the day;
Pray that help may be sent down—
Watch and pray.

If we "watch and pray," we shall be ready not only to fight our foes and ward off temptation we shall be ready with kinds words and good deeds. We shall be prepared for all God's will concerning us, we shall hearken to his voice, and do his commandment. If we are ready in little things to be and do what He would have us, then we shall be quite prepared when He asks some great thing of us. And those who are willing to do great things for God make themselves meet for the larger service by always being fit for the smaller.

If we "watch and pray," every opportunity to do good or speak a word for Christ is a privilege, and if we are always waiting to serve the Saviour, we shall be always ready to live for Him, and be prepared to go to Him. For those are most prepared to die who are most ready to live.

May we be like the one who has sung this beautiful verse; and if we are, then we shall be "always ready" for his coming.

So I am watching quietly every day;
Whenever the sun shines brightly I arise and say,
"Surely it is the shining of his face;"
And when a shadow falls across the window of my room
When I am working my appointed task,
I lift my head to watch the door and ask
"If He is come."

"The Christian" Bible Searcher.

RULES.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.

(2) Those received later, in the one following. But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the Competition appears.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped (1d.) and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

A Prize Competition is given the last week of March, June, September, and December. To be eligible every child must have been correct nine times during the preceding twelve weeks.

Those whose 10th or 18th birthdays occur during the quarter may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age

Bible Searcher (No. 157).

Give Chapter and Verse.

1. What two feasts mentioned in Matthew were the guests not ready to attend?

2. What did Peter say he was ready to do (Luke)?

3. What was Paul ready for (Acts)?

4. In what things are we to be ready (a, Titus; and b, I. Peter)?

5. In Psalm lxxxvi. what do we read about the word "ready"?

6. Whom did Joab tell not to run, because he had no tidings ready (II. Samuel)?

A Seaside House of Rest.—Rev. C. L. Williams, of Christ Church, Ramsgate, writes: It seems a pity that for want of knowledge, a "Home" which is so thoroughly appreciated in the summer that we have hard work to meet the numbers that flock to us, should it so empty at a time when we in Ramsgate are rejoicing in God's sunlight, while London is visited by fog and gloom. Ours is not a convalescent Home, and we cannot undertake cases needing nursing, but a bright sympathetic, home-like Christian atmosphere within, to match the brightness without, is our aim. The Institution is not self-supporting, and needs help supplementary to the small sum charged to inmates.

Children in Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

THE Poor Children's Holiday Association and Rescue Agency, founded some few years ago, chiefly through the exertions of the Countess of Carlisle, had in its earlier stages the work of "Children's Holidays" to the country and seaside as its main object. This important branch of the work is still carried on, and during last summer no fewer than 8,207 children were dealt with by the fresh-air schemes, which embrace "a day in the country for every poor child in Newcastle and district," also "three weeks in the country for the invalid and delicate." The rescue work embraces a Samaritan Clothing Boot and Food Depot, whereby 4,773 needy and starving little ones were clothed and fed. Rescue work on the streets at night is also carried on with excellent results. An "Open-all-Night Shelter" provides for the homeless and destitute. Two rescue homes for boys and girls undertake the training of the cases reclaimed. Boys are apprenticed to trades, girls are trained for domestic service.

The "Street Vendors' Club," another branch of the work, has as its object the raising of its members to a nobler standing and view of life. A commodious club-house is provided for their use, in which various forms of recreation are indulged in. A labour bureau assists them into situations. Sunday services, bands of hope, and savings' banks are very well patronised by the children.

The rescue work is carried on in co-operation with the other institutions, forty-six were transferred to other homes last year, sixty-six were restored to their own homes. In all 14,008 cases were dealt with last year.

The Secretary is Mr. J. H. Watson, 140, Sidney Grove, Newcastle-on-Tyne, from whom the newly-issued narrative of work can be had on application.

London Blind.

UNDER the auspices of the Indigent Blind Visiting Society, a series of meetings have been held in the interest of the sightless men and women of London. The people were gathered in nine centres—Kennington, Stratford, Bow, Shoreditch, Pimlico, Pentonville, Marylebone, Holborn, and Bermondsey—and in all 3,297 attended. On all occasions tea was provided for the blind and their guides, and subsequently Gospel addresses were delivered by ministers and others. Moreover, the blind attendants received a shilling each, and in many cases tickets for coals; while their guides were presented with a good book. All expenses in the mission were borne by a kind friend of the society, and the organisation was carried through by Mr. W. Mead (himself blind), superintendent of the East London Branch. The workers were cheered by hearing of many cases of decision for Christ.

Among Whitechapel Jews.

FOR thirty-seven years Mr. Herman Ehrlich has been witnessing for Christ among the Jews of Whitechapel; and he is still at the wrk, with the Hebrew Conference Hall in Old Montague Street as the centre of operations. In his latest report our aged friend says:—

"The trials and persecutions that I had to endure at the beginning of my ministry were so great that the injuries which I sustained at the hands of my brethren I shall bear with me when I appear before my Lord; yet I can look back with joy that even my trials have been turned into blessings.

"Last year was full of opportunities of sowing the good seed among the many Jews that came to our peaceful shores from all parts of the world, and their astonishment was great when they found that the Christians of this country had such a warm heart for them. I feel that if ever there was a great need for testimony to be borne for the truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord, it is now; for there is great unrest on every hand, not only among the Jews, but among all the nations of the earth.

"The Zionist Movement has taken hold upon the Jews in a most miraculous way. At a recent meeting of the Zionites in the East End over six thousand Jews met together to hear something of the land of their fathers, and the enthusiasm displayed was most thrilling. An aged Jew cried out, 'Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.'"

Mr. Ehrlich sees that Jewish history is beginning a new chapter. His little report tells of devoted effort, in which the women and children are not overlooked. Copies of the booklet may be had from him at 95, King Edward-road, South Hackney, N.E.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle.

ON Sunday the congregation of the Metropolitan Tabernacle assembled at their old meeting place for the first time since the famous church was destroyed by fire on April 21. The congregation did not find their temple entirely rebuilt. In fact, only the basement floor has been made fit for use, a comparatively small part of the work to be done, but one which has cost £7,866, although nothing has been spent except on the severely useful. The new hall holds nearly 2,000 persons, and was full on Sunday morning. It is, of course, too low for a gallery, and that peculiarity also prevents it from being flooded with light through the windows. There is no inconvenience, however, as the hall is well illuminated by electricity. Taken on the whole, the congregation were able to assure themselves that if they had not yet got a church as stately and spacious as before, they had one of which there was no need to be ashamed.

The service was conducted by Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, aided by Rev. C. B. Sawday. It was coloured throughout by rejoicing over the partial restoration of the beloved building. Mr. Spurgeon made a series of announcements, summing them up in the remark that the church was about to get back as far as possible to the old state of things. One intimation to be particularly noted—so Mr. Spurgeon suggested—was that on February 8, his mother would, she hoped, attend in this building to receive gifts to the rebuilding fund. He feared, however, that she would not be able to be here for more than two hours. Turning to his sermon, the Pastor took as his text the verse beginning "Sing unto the Lord a new song," words specially fitting to the present occasion, when they not only hailed the opening of another year but rejoiced at the completion of the first instalment of their new building. This church had passed through vicissitudes the like of which few others had known, but the Lord had kept its members united—nay, bound them together more strongly than before. Their hearts had been opened, their hands and their purses too. They would need much of this practical generosity for many a long day. This new hall was but a stepping-stone, yet it was a happy omen, telling that God would not leave his servants in the middle of the river.

Carrubbers Close Mission.

SOME eight hundred people came together at Carrubbers Close, Edinburgh, to a Watch Night Service. This meeting was of an extremely interesting and spiritual nature. The Gospel Temperance Section of this Mission, in order to provide greater accommodation for their increasing audiences at the Watch Night Service, this time engaged the Assembly Hall. Those attending numbered over two thousand, and the proceedings lasted from 8 p.m. to midnight.

This gathering was especially interesting from the fact that it was also the semi-jubilee of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's first visit to Scotland. There was also the presence of the Fisk University Jubilee Singers.

At one part of the meeting, Professor SIMPSON moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting, representative of Christian life and work in Edinburgh, hereby express gratitude to God for the spiritual blessing vouchsafed to this city twenty-five years ago in connection with the labours of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and resolve to convey to these honoured and beloved brethren cordial New Year's greetings, and the earnest desire for their continued spiritual prosperity."

Rev. G. WILSON, in seconding the resolution, referred to his connection as a young minister with the work. He spoke of the great number of sterling conversions among all classes as the result of the mission.

A letter was read from Mr. Moody, in which he expressed his joy at hearing from time to time of the work being carried on all these years. He had never forgotten the Christian fellowship and blessing given at that time in answer to prayer. The need for the Gospel is as great as ever, and he prayed that 1899 might exceed and surpass all previous years in the presence and power of God being seen in the work carried on.

Mr. SIMS closed the meeting with a solemn address on "Watchman, what of the night?" Professor Simpson sent a cablegram to Mr. Moody expressive of good wishes for 1899.

Sailors in East London.

IT is gratifying to hear of good work still in progress in connection with the Seamen's Christian Friend Society's operations at Limehouse. Week after week sailors are finding blessing at the meetings. Among three men who lately found peace through believing was a Roman Catholic, who said he had never trusted the priest's power to forgive, while he had observed that nothing came from that quarter without payment. The following week this man led a fellow-sailor to the Mission House and induced him to sign the pledge.

At another meeting a fine-looking fellow said: "On the Sunday night when I was brought to this chapel I was mad with drink. I would have sold my soul for another glass of grog. When a young man asked me in, I said, 'Can it do me any good to go in there?' I didn't believe it would. I thought there was no hope for me. I thank God I listened to good advice and came. If you ask me what has made the change in me, I answer it is not by signing the pledge, but I fell on my knees and asked God, for Christ's sake, to forgive me and deliver me, and He has done it."

Rev. E. J. Hill (secretary of the society) tells us that his journal is full of cases of interest, showing how men have found liberty and salvation through the work. The last report is a very readable pamphlet, giving particulars of varied effort, attended with prosperity of the highest order. In addition to the London centre, there are stations in many places along the coast. It is sad to learn that much anxiety is experienced through the lack of adequate support. On this point full particulars may be had by addressing Mr. Hill at 255, Burdett Road, Limehouse, E.

Jews and Christmas.

FOR several years past the Barbican Mission to the Jews has organised a special evangelistic meeting for Christmas Eve; and in spite of the deep-rooted prejudice of the Hebrew people against religious inquiry at such a time, the attendance has grown with the process of years. The meeting this year was held in the chapel at 262, Commercial Road, E., and there was a congregation of between 150 and 170, young and old, representing various orders and classes. It was pleasing to note the zest with which the men sang Christian hymns, and to observe the attention with which they followed the service of prayer and testimony, in which part was taken by Prediger C. T. Lipshytz (superintendent), Rev. C. Greise (assistant missionary), and Mr. Herman Ehrlich, whose work among the Jews of East London during thirty-seven years has gained for him universal respect.

A Note of Thanks.

DEAR SIR,—As the year draws to a close and one is reminded of the rapid flight of time, permit me, through your columns, to express again my gratitude to the kind friend who has for over a quarter of a century given me the great privilege of perusing THE CHRISTIAN every week. I do not know how I could now get along without it. Its "Daily Homily" has furnished me with many a theme for pulpit utterance, and stimulated many a thought; while its news, notes, and expository and other articles have, during all these years, kept me in touch with the work of the Lord, in the home land, and, in a measure, in all lands.

It gladdens my heart to see the same handwriting on the address from week to week, and I send through you my congratulations to my friend of so many years; and I wish her all the blessings of the new covenant during the coming year.

ROBERT LENNIE.

Mount Forest, Ontario,
December 20.

[The foregoing is a sample of letters of grateful thanks that frequently reach us. It will serve as a word of encouragement, we trust, to the many readers who forward their copies of the paper to friends in distant lands.—ED.]

The Slanderer does harm to three persons at once: to him of whom he says the ill; to him to whom he says it; and, most of all, to himself in saying it.—Basil the Great.

Evangelistic.

Mrs. Baeyertz in Reading.

IN response to an invitation of the Women's United Prayer Union, Mrs. Baeyertz conducted a ten days' mission in Reading. On the first Sunday the P.S.A.'s gave up their usual services that all might have an opportunity of being present. It was a privilege to hear the Gospel as it fell from the consecrated lips of a Hebrew Christian, and we felt from the first service God's power and presence. The afternoon Bible readings were a marked feature of the mission. They were largely attended, and we hear of Christians on all sides who have been quickened into fuller life.

It is impossible to tabulate God's work, but of those who passed through the inquiry room a large number professed to receive Christ. Mrs. Baeyertz's method is to bring the seekers into contact with God's Word. S. Fewster.

Callander, Scotland.

THE good work always going on in the Mission Hall in Callander is again specially interesting. A fortnight's mission, conducted by Mr. Canning, of the Evangelisation Society, has lately come to a close, and much blessing to many souls has been the happy result. Mr. Canning's addresses were of the most awakening character, and very bold and startling were his denunciations of hollow profession and mere formalism. This kind of faithful, scriptural preaching is much needed in these days of "smooth" prophesying and cries of "Peace, peace, when there is no peace." As a result, many were angry, but many yielded, and the hearts of the workers were made glad as night after night souls were added to the family of God.

Mr. Canning's daily addresses to the young people were of a remarkable character. Each evening the children came in large numbers and gave rapt attention as, from the object lessons, he vividly described through Eyegate, the precious truths of the Gospel, and many young hearts yielded to the Saviour's claims.

Evangelists' Movements.

Mr. G. W. Clegg has been working for some weeks at Boscastle, Cornwall, with large attendances and many evident tokens of God's reviving and converting power.

Mr. D. L. Moody has recently concluded a mission campaign in Colorado; there have been many signs accompanying and following the preaching of the Word.

The recent mission conducted by Mr. Henry Thorne at Littlehampton Congregational Church has been a time of much blessing. Many have been led to decision, and many others to a fuller consecration.

Gipsy Smith, of Buckhurst Hill, has been giving Gospel addresses and tales of his gipsy life, accompanied by lantern views, in the Lower Winchendon and Hardwick Mission Halls, Bucks. The attendances at both places was very good, and the visiting from house to house much appreciated.

We praise God for what He hath wrought during the month of evangelistic meetings conducted by Messrs. Richardson and Burns of the "Faith Mission." The meetings were fairly well attended, the interest deepening as they continued. Believers received blessing from the very commencement, and many testified at the close to having entered on a new era in their Christian experience. Backsliders have also been restored, and, best of all, joy has been in heaven over many repentant sinners; some long prayed for have yielded to Jesus, and others groping in doubt and uncertainty have entered the clear light of the Gospel. A good work has also been done among boys. Annie N. Herd, Sec.

Salvation Army Social Work.

SOME of the results of General Booth's labours on behalf of his friends, the submerged tenth, are well expressed in the recently issued annual report of Salvation Army Social Work, entitled "Personal Impressions of Work in Darkest England," by Bramwell Booth.

General Booth, in a few introductory remarks, says:—

"All the institutions and agencies brought into existence at the inception of the Darkest England Scheme, and others which have been inaugurated since, are making a large measure of progress in the work for which they were designed. I say progress, because I neither look upon any of them as already perfect, nor expect to do so. Experience of the actual difficulties and problems of the undertaking to which we have set ourselves has proved our best teacher, and will yet prove a better still. But there they are, and being what they are, I think it must be felt that they constitute a great fact in the moral and social influences of the day, and prove that the work commenced amid much fear and trembling, and in the face of much misapprehension, has prospered, and is proving its value to the community in a hundred different forms."

The magnitude of the work is amply demonstrated, and the advances are none the less to be valued because, it appears, most of them have been made outside Great Britain. Indeed, the international character of the work may be taken as one of its chief recommendations. In many parts of the world, and especially in those dominated by the Anglo-Saxon, the social work is being rapidly developed.

Mr. Bramwell Booth, disclaiming the intention to publish an orthodox "report," elects rather to deal with social difficulties from a Salvation Army point of view. He roundly denounces the drink traffic and the Poor-law, observing with regard to the workhouse:—

"Families are separated, often, alas! never to be reunited. The work provided is generally either useless or degrading, or both, or, worse still, no real work is provided at all. The decent poor are compelled to live with the coarse and vicious, with tramps and thieves and the morally leprous of both sexes. The atmosphere of many workhouses reeks with blasphemy, and hatred, and uncleanness. And, as if to make the absurdity of the position equal to its cruelty, a man cannot leave the House to take a job unless he takes his wife and family with him!"

Ex-criminals have a chapter to themselves. Mr. Booth quotes the well known "Ballad of Reading Gaol," and asserts that, since nobody will employ a known ex-criminal, "those of us who know anything about it know very well, when we hear the judge sentence a young man to six months' imprisonment, that the immense probability is that it is equivalent to sentencing him to spend the greater part of the rest of his life in jail. It is, in many cases, like inoculating him with the germs of some fatal disease, or branding him for all time."

About thirty-five per cent. of the ex-criminals dealt with by the Army are, it is stated, started in definite employment as satisfactory cases.

As to the women's work—"During 1898 we have had in full work in this country, with doors of welcome wide open, Women's Homes, through which 1,970 women have passed, all but 222 of them to start again in life with honest labour and new hope. The Women's Shelters of one class or another have provided 201,613 beds, 206,349 meals, and restored to friends, &c., 309 women. The Maternity Hospital has cared for 175 women and their infants, setting the lonely mothers on their way again to virtue and faith."

The donations received during the year amounted in this country to £17,297; in addition to which, grace-before-meat collecting boxes, held by Salvationists and friends, yielded no less a sum than £10,500.

The Week of Prayer.

THE annual meetings convened by the council of the Evangelical Alliance, in connection with the Week of Universal Prayer, were inaugurated on Monday last by gatherings in many parts of the Metropolis.

The subjects for the day were Confession and Thanksgiving—confession for grace received in vain, unity disregarded for diversity condemned, love denied, reciprocal duties forgotten, ordinances perverted, profession exceeding reality, non-spiritual worship, un-Christlike living, prophecy neglected, the Jew contemned, open missionary doors unentered, and the Holy Ghost forgotten; while thanksgiving was to be offered for mighty movements of the Holy Spirit in many lands, for Divine overruling of human policy for missionary successes, better days for persecuted believers, and for the great awakening of Jews, at home and abroad, to seek after Jesus.

At Exeter Hall Colonel Wellesley Robinson, after reading the 51st Psalm, briefly remarked on the desirability of making that initial meeting the occasion of deep heart-searching and direct petition. After several friends had engaged in prayer for the spiritual enlightenment of God's people, Rev. F. S. Webster expressed the general hope and anticipation which he had frequently found of a great revival. It was, therefore, greatly to be desired that we should arrive at a clear understanding of the conditions upon which the Lord promised to "revive us again."

Turning to I Samuel 4, and the cry "Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines?" the speaker pointed out that of old the children of Israel were promised victory, but on being routed their reply was not a humble turning to repentance, but a shout "Let us fetch the Ark." So, in place of waiting upon the Lord and seeking an enduement of power, we say "Let us have prayer meetings, a convention, a revival." All available means of evangelistic effort are desirable, but let their adoption be preceded by confession of sin. Enthusiasm is no substitute for righteousness; we may have beautiful forms of worship and orthodox faith, but if our lives are unclean there will be no blessing.

Reviewing some of the chief characteristic sins of the time, infidelity of heart, gambling, and Sabbath breaking, the speaker passed to the practical question "What is to be done?" He urged the putting away of sin, and illustrating his words by a reference to I. Samuel 6, noted that all was well when the Lord was in the midst; the Philistines, although probably anticipating a repetition of victory, fled before the thunders of God.

After pointedly applying the lessons to the hearts of his hearers, the speaker engaged in prayer that the Almighty would be pleased to search our church life, delivering from all that is carnal, and as regarded our personal experience, save from selfish indulgence and unbelief.

Centenary Hall.

The meetings at the Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate Street, E.C., represent an effort to encourage united prayer in the centre of commercial activity. They do not command a large attendance, but they are occasions on which men leave engrossing concerns and shake themselves from City bondage for an hour. Business interests and general convenience, are, for a while, set at nought, and waiting upon God and seeking his will take their place.

The meeting on Monday was presided over by Mr. A. Albert Head, who gave a brief address based on Isaiah xliii. 18-26. The New Year is, he showed, a favourable opportunity for retrospect and resolve; as, however, we pray for God's blessing—as we anticipate "the new thing" which He is willing to give us—we must comply with the conditions of confession and putting Him in remembrance. "I give waters in the wilderness and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen." This blessed promise, and its accompanying declaration of forgiveness of transgressions, were made the subject of timely remark. Confession and thanksgiving followed, several of the company leading.

Another "Century" Fund.—Following the example of the Wesleyans and the Congregationalists, the committee of the Baptist Union have resolved to recommend the formation of a special fund of a quarter of a million pounds. This fund is intended to be devoted to various pressing objects, such as country evangelisation, the augmentation of small stipends, the erection of a Church House, &c. It is proposed to open the fund on May 7, and to close it on March 31, 1901.

India and the Gospel.

WRITING with reference to the work of Mrs. Harriett Urmston and Rev. James Smith of Delhi, concerning whom sketches recently appeared in our columns, Major Conran says:—

"Serious reflections have been awakened in my mind regarding our Indian Empire and its government. Mr. Rudyard Kipling has struck a note in his verses 'Lest we forget' that has ever since been sounding in my ears. Lord Curzon, in one of his late speeches, remarked that our principle of rule in India has not been that of acquiring wealth, &c. Would that we could say it was from no mere earthly motive! Those most acquainted with our history in India must confess that pride of power and earthly ambition have ever formed the ruling principle and stimulant to duty in all classes. Allowing the lawfulness of such motives, must we not add, 'These things you should have done, and not have left the others undone.'

"Allowing that the prejudice against missionaries personally has ceased, can we admit that their work has assumed its proper place and estimation in the hearts of our countrymen? Has 'the offence of the Cross' ceased? On the contrary, has not the success which God has been pleased to bestow on our earthly duties in governing India, tended to increase our pride and self-importance, if not actually to increase our opposition to the evangelisation of India?

"Mrs. Urmston, when I had the privilege of her acquaintance in 1852, in Peshawar, was regarded as one of that distinct party of which Sir Herbert Edwardes was the leader; but she had to pass through the baptism of the Mutiny to develop her higher qualities and prepare the whole European population for that higher Christian character befitting the race raised up to prepare the way of the Lord by ruling a heathen empire. It was after getting recruited in body and soul by a visit to England that she was brought at last into that is experienced by Christians in India that follow the Lord fully. As Mr. Smith, at Delhi, was amongst the natives, so was Mrs. Urmston at Rawal Pindi and Murree amongst our own people. Finding her sphere for full consecration to the Lord, her fruit was abundant. Others, too, may have enjoyed a harvest, and even some females have been thus favoured of God; but 'if other daughters have done virtuously, she has excelled them all.'

"As frequently in missionary work in India, success has been attained through the upper classes. Thus Mrs. Urmston was not only blessed to the conversion of private soldiers, themselves esteemed by the natives as the aristocracy of the country, but to the officers of the "crack" cavalry regiments. This was a novel aspect in India, where even in the "Revivals," few and far between, the conversion of a solitary officer here and there was all that was ever known. Her converts too, possessed the character of our "Revival" converts at home nowadays—apostolic in their suddenness and conformity to the Gospel standard. What are we taught by these things?

"Are our Indian cantonments the hopeless subjects we've been accustomed to regard them? Is the standard of religion recognised in this country unsuitable to our soldiers in India? This seems of late to be the principle acted on by Indian authorities. But so far is this from being the case, that in the instances, though rare in India, previous to the modern theories, the Christian men in the ranks have been of exceptional quality, and sought for as agents in missionary work. There is another view of religion in India, of a wider and more absorbing quality, dealing with the gigantic idolatrous system of India, which embraces every sphere of earthly action. It was dominant in all the political systems of the country, until we had conquered them by force of arms; but it still works unhindered in the secret recesses of domestic life and in the most familiar habits of the people—in caste, food, and in social habits, and works out terrible effects in the form of pestilence, epidemics, and other forms of evil, of which India has ever been the seed-bed.

"Though we may have conquered temporarily the political powers, so long as we neglect the mother evil of idolatry, we shall never rule India. Thuggee, Suttee, infanticism, and cannibalism are all liable to recrudescence so long as the Gospel is rejected and God's truth opposed and dishonoured. The 'Revivals' of these days, however they may offend the super-sensitive feelings of our high civilisation by their sensationalism, excitement, and consequent eccentricities, are the only form of evangelisation suitable to the degraded masses."

Personalia.

Mr. J. Neech, evangelist, Lincoln, has been laid aside a month with pneumonia. He is slowly recovering, but it will be some time before he can resume his work. He will be glad to have the prayers of friends.

Rev. Charles Williams, pastor of Cannon Street Baptist Church, Accrington, has received a cheque for £1,000 from Mr. William Haworth, J.P., and his sister, Miss Haworth, members of the congregation, "as a mark of affection, and in recognition of many services."

Deacon Abraham, of the Nestorian Mission Orphanages, in Oroomiah, Persia, expects to be in England next week, and will hold meetings as he may be requested on behalf of the mission. Address inquiries to Mr. Henry Tasker, Brookside, Andover, Hants.

Rev. F. Whitfield, of Hastings, announces his impending resignation of the charge of St. Mary's Church, of which he has been vicar for nearly a quarter of a century. Failing health and strength are the cause of his retirement, which will be regretted by many who have valued his good work and his consistent fidelity to evangelical truth.

From Dr. Baedeker.

ON board steamer going to Samsoon, December 16, 1898.—Hitherto, the Lord has helped us, we are in good health, and being carried forward in rest and peace, hoping to arrive in Samsoon to-morrow morning to spend Sunday, and thence to go to Marsovan, and wherever further we may be guided. We had a good fruitful time at Smyrna, and also at Broussa, visiting the orphanages and preaching in the churches. After our time in Asia Minor we both longed to get once more to Transcaucasia to visit the prisons, and to do what we can for the banished brethren. Our next address for letters will be Hotel London, Tiflis. We are wonderfully favoured with fine weather up to this present day, but we know that on the Black Sea a storm may spring up any day. It is good to trust in the Lord, He is so good!

We shall try and see Sarkissian at Shamagar. I was pleased with what I saw at the orphanages at Bebek, Smyrna and Broussa, the children are very responsive to love, and very affectionate where their affection is drawn out. Many of them seem to be especially gifted, and all are very attentive to what is taught them. They have learnt in an incredibly short time order and obedience, and hearing them sing German or English hymns, one can hardly believe that they are children gathered from the desolated homes in the Interior, whose parents have been brutally massacred. They show great facility in learning languages, in some homes they are being taught in German, in others in English, in one at Broussa in French; their own mother tongue, Armenian, being also kept up. Some of the girls have already passed examinations, and are engaged as governesses and teachers. Many of them will eventually form a very useful portion of the population of Europe.—Yours affectionately,

F. W. Baedeker.

Church Missionary Society.—In April next, in connection with the centenary of the C.M.S., thanksgiving services are to be held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and St. Saviour's, Southwark. Special meetings are arranged for Exeter Hall and the Albert Hall, and one novel feature of the celebration is to be a meeting at which representatives of other missionary organisations, including those of Nonconformity, will tell of what their respective societies are doing in the foreign field. The London gatherings will be followed by similar meetings in various cities and towns throughout the country.

A Happy Reunion.—An enjoyable event recently took place at Sudbury Hall Girls' Home, Wembley, one of the eight homes belonging to the National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children. A great number of young women, now in domestic service, accepted the invitation to spend a pleasant time at their old home, and a very happy reunion took place. A number of money prizes and useful articles were presented to old girls who had kept situations with good characters for various periods. Rev. J. W. Silvester, vicar of Wembley, and Rev. Thomas Turner, vicar of St. Saviour's, Fitzroy Square, gave short addresses to the girls.

Gray's Yard Ragged Church.

THE annual New Year's breakfast for six hundred destitute men and women was given on Sunday morning last.

From an early hour numbers of the fortunate possessors of tickets gathered in the capacious and homely premises in the dingy district immediately behind lordly Oxford Street.

The great crowd of guests, filling both the large hall and the spacious lower room, constituted a piteous spectacle. Every imaginable class of London misery seemed to be represented—from the shock-headed youth, palpably almost imbecile, to the grey-headed man, striving to conceal his raggedness by sitting behind a pillar, but unable to hide the grim marks of alcohol on his bleary countenance. The assembly represented human misery in all its dreadful stages. Many were obviously shirtless, but, under the convincing influence of the mission and its workers, they buttoned up their ragged coats and turned up the collars, or wrapped round their bare throats wisps of comforter or cotton rag. Indeed, there was certainly a general effort, not wanting in pathos, to attain respectability; mud spots were flicked off and faces given a dry polish, while one of the most intellectual looking even brushed his ancient greenish "bowler" with an old nail brush prior to depositing the precious hat gear safely between his knees.

As the crowd passed shiveringly in from the force of the biting gale, each person was supplied with bread and jam and steaming coffee. All warmed into sociability in the capacious hall, and one could not but note with satisfaction the absence of anything like a professional "whining" spirit. These were not the conventional cadgers of the gutter, but men and women, poverty stricken and sinful, if you will, but yet evidently scenting not only a good meal but encouragement and aid into a better life.

The meeting which followed was presided over by the Hon. Granville Waldegrave, who, in a few well chosen words, pointed out that happiness consisted not in riches, but in the saving presence of the Lord Jesus Christ. After Miss Ada Habershon had sung an appealing solo, which brought tears to many eyes, Dr. Schofield delivered the gospel message in plain terms, with many interesting anecdotes and illustrations.

Subsequently came the distribution to each needy individual of a large meat pie of particularly appetising appearance, and a remarkably good plum cake, while the lady workers, headed by the Hon. Mrs. Fraser, poured out the tea and coffee. Many made a good meal on the spot, while others with wives and families dependent on them elected to retain at any rate the major portion of their eatables, for home consumption, but one and all responded heartily to the chairman's hearty New Year wishes, and departed with a cheerier countenance to encounter the problems of 1899. Neatly bound gospels, presented by Mrs. John Morley, were given away on leaving.

As to the general work of the church, which has been a centre of light and help for many years, the fourpenny lodging-house, the soup kitchen, boys' brigade, girls' club, and many other branches of this useful institution are in a more thriving condition than ever.

Requests for Prayers.

For blessing on Mr. George Clarke's mission at Ipswich, January 15 to 20.

For blessing on a mission at Deptford, January 8 to 15, to be conducted by Mr. Hy. Hall, late Royal Artillery, Staff-Sergeant Guthrie, and others.

For blessing on a mission in Westbourne Presbyterian Church, Belfast, January 1 to 13, conducted by Mr. Wm. Thompson, jun.

For blessing on a three weeks' mission at the Wesleyan Church, Ashton, Cornwall, by Mr. G. W. Clegg.

That journeying mercies may be granted to a temperance worker on his way to Australia, and that health and strength may be restored.

For much blessing on a gospel mission being conducted in the Metropolitan Hall, Dublin, by Rev. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast.

For blessing on a mission at Dundee commencing January 8, conducted by Mr. Wycliffe Pascoe, of the Evangelisation Society.

The Last Night of 1898.—The committee of the Midnight Meeting movement held meetings at the close of last year at Islington, Notting Hill, Borough, King's Cross, Paddington and Lambeth. Many very young girls came in, notably at Notting Hill. The committee rejoice in being able to point to cases of rescue as a result of the effort.

Venice and St. Mark's.

IN point of historical association Venice has charms peculiarly its own; and in thinking of Venice, one cannot but recall the cathedral church of St. Mark, the glory of the city which was once so widely and deservedly designated "the Queen of the Adriatic." The stones of Venice have been made to preach many a sermon in art and ethics, on beauty and goodness. At length these stones are delivering messages on the faith of past generations, and teaching lessons which our forefathers learned by dearly-bought experience. These messages and lessons, so grand in meaning and timely in deliverance, are set forth in The Bible of St. Mark: St. Mark's Church—the Altar and Throne of Venice. By Alexander Robertson, D.D. (George Allen).

We congratulate the author on a piece of work altogether worthy of the pen that wrote "Fra Paolo Sarpi" and "Through the Dolomites." Sumptuous illustration — over eighty highly finished reproductions from photography—places the work in a class all too rare; excellence of arrangement invests the book with a character often lacking in pages requiring to be at once precise as to matter and readable as to manner. In a word, St. Mark's Church, with its façade and doorways, its walls and domes, its marbles and mosaics, is the Bible of St. Mark, and by its sculptures and inscriptions we learn much of the religion and life of the old Venetians.

So far as needful, Dr. Robertson sketches the history of St. Mark's, and shows the relation of the Doge to the religion of the commonwealth—a relation of supremacy. In fact, he says "on these two principles, preserved and exhibited in St. Mark's Church—an open Bible, and absolute freedom from priestly domination—rested, to a large extent, the stability and prosperity of the old Republic of Venice, as on them rest, to a large extent, the stability and prosperity of England to-day." Religiously, the church is an open Bible—no mariolatry, no saint worship, but Jesus Christ everywhere and alone, outside and in. The present edifice dates from the eleventh century, and the pious labours of by-gone generations are to-day guarded with befitting jealousy, and as far as possible maintained in their original form and beauty.

Dr. Robertson deals first with the marvellous Façade; then with the Old Testament scenes represented in the Atrium; and thirdly, with the New Testament as inscribed in the Interior. Mosaics and sculptures found in other parts of the building are dealt with in an appendix of great wealth. Christ is the Keystone of every arch of every door by which the church is entered; the subject of all the bas-reliefs above these doorways; the subject of all the mosaics of the upper tier of arches; also the subject of all the sculptures that decorate the arches. The mosaic over the inner door above the main entrance is in full harmony with this. The central figure represents Christ in a sitting posture, robed in royal purple and blue, and behind his head the golden disc marked with the shadow of the cross; and the Greek monogram for "Jesus Christ." At his right hand is Mary, with, as usual, a simple circlet of gold behind her head, her monogram (Greek for "Mother of the Son of God"), and her hands raised in prayer. On Christ's left hand is St. Mark, in a like attitude of worship, also with a similar nimbus.

Thus adored, Christ has his right hand raised in the act of blessing, whilst his left hand holds a Bible on his knee. The outspread pages of the book, turned towards the spectator, bear in large letters the words from the Old Italic version: "I am the door; by Me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and find pasture." The significance of this selection needs not to be pointed out; as Dr. Robertson remarks, the words "proclaim the feeding and the folding of the flock, safety and sustenance, protection and provision for every man, and for all men, in Jesus Christ alone, independent of all else besides." On the red marble arch that frames this mosaic are the words: "I am the Gate of Life; O my members, enter by Me;" and on a band of the same material; crossing the church, the inscription: "Who He was, and for what purpose, and at what price He redeemed thee, and why He did this for thee, and gave thee all things—consider!"

The political bearing of the spiritual supremacy of the Doge is most important. The Republic realised the utter impossibility of maintaining national and individual freedom where Papists have a free hand. Therefore, though the Church was Catholic it was local, and free from Papal domination. Banishing ecclesiastics from state offices, Venice was wise in thus conserving its rights and liberties; and during long centuries it enjoyed, intellectually and commercially, the fruit of its enlightened policy. Dr. Robertson does well to bring these matters before the people of Great Britain at the present time. The King of Italy has shown a high sense of his labours by creating him Cavaliere of the Order of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus. This book is one which art students are sure to find suggestive. In view of its exceptional interest and importance—the first systematic interpretation of the sculptures and mosaics of St. Mark's—we heartily commend it to the attention of Christian people of refined taste and Evangelical affections.

About Books.

ST. LUKE AS HISTORIAN.

Years ago Professor W. M. Ramsay, of Aberdeen, shared with other "advanced" scholars doubts as to the reliability of St. Luke as an historian. He has for some time past overcome these doubts, and is now a champion whose works have won high esteem for erudition and thought. His new book is entitled Was Christ born in Bethlehem? and he does not ask the question to imply uncertainty of view on his own part, but in order to give to the world a singularly valuable study on the credibility of St. Luke. From the point of view of the historian, Luke ii. 1-4 is a crucial passage in the third Gospel. Dr. Ramsay has found, in recent discoveries in Egypt, evidences of the system of periodic enrolments implied in the passage; and it would be difficult more fully to establish the truth of the circumstances with which the Evangelist connects the miraculous event narrated in the opening chapters of his gospel. Accordingly, Dr. Ramsay maintains, against destructive critics, that Luke was "a great historian, who wrote good Greek of the first century kind." This judgment is invested with special force as coming from one who has done much to clear away doubts raised regarding St. Luke's other work—the Acts of the Apostles. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

DANIEL THE PROPHET.

In The Book of Daniel from the Christian Standpoint, Rev. John Kennedy, M.A., D.D., makes a welcome contribution to a controversy which is being diligently pursued by rationalistic writers. We are glad to note a useful departure in this addition to the "Bible Student's Library" series. Leaving the narrow field of disputation about names and words, Dr. Kennedy examines the claims of the book on more general grounds, bringing to view internal and external evidences, and allowing for the whole in the result. Accordingly, he begins with the personal testimony of our Lord, recollecting, as he intimates in the preface, that modern assaults have originated in rationalistic tendencies, and that the older assailants of the book aimed at discrediting the entire fabric and authority of Old Testament prophecy.

Dr. Kennedy examines with care pre-Christian and later references to Daniel, and studies the book chapter by chapter. He devotes special sections to Daniel's theology and his doctrine concerning the Messiah; and is careful to deal with the published opinions of Dean Farrar and Dr. Driver. He argues that the latter, to be consistent, should be a defender of the book. Rev. Hugh M. Mackenzie, editor of the Babylonian and Oriental Record, writes a supplemental chapter on alleged historical difficulties, and there are two useful appendices—one on our Lord's intimate knowledge of Old Testament Scripture; and another (by Mr. James Kennedy, late Bengal Civil Service) on the connection of Babylon with other nations, eastern and western, illustrative of various passages in the Book of Daniel. Embellished with several full page illustrations from the monuments of the period, this is an excellent work, and will, we trust, be brought under the notice of those who think Daniel is properly and finally abandoned to the degradation of the critics' den. (6s. Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

The name of C. H. Spurgeon is still a very prominent one on the title-page of The Sword and Trowel (3d. Passmore & Alabaster) though in the current issue there are contributions from Mrs. Spurgeon and "Pastor Tom." A beautifully reproduced view of the interior of the Tabernacle before the fire is given as a gratis supplement.

The January issue of Uncle Ben's Budget, a Protestant magazine for boys and girls, contain a timely sketch, entitled "The Story of the Reformation Retold." (1d. W. Wileman).

Part 21 of Cassell and Co.'s sixpenny serial, The Queen's Empire, gives selected views of some of the most striking natural scenery in different parts of Her Majesty's dominions. Peril and Patriotism (same publishers, 6d.) furnishes a very highly spiced monthly dish of brave and intrepid deeds.

Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co. have issued a cheap edition (2s.) of Charles Sheldon's well known Crucifixion of Philip Strong. Issued by the same firm is a well got-up volume of verse entitled Songs of Hope and Love (2s. 6d.) by F. W. Pitt, which are fluent, of religious tone, and have the advantage of a kindly word of recommendation by Rev. Charles Fox.

White Hyacinths and Other Poems. (2s. 6d. Marshall Brothers.) To find a new volume of religious verse free from feebleness of expression and halting rhyme is in itself a fact worthy of note, but Lucy A. Bennett's graceful poems far transcend mere passableness; they manifest all the spirituality, deep thought, and polished style which we have come to expect from the gifted authoress.

A volume of sermons presenting various aspects of one theme is The Father's Hand: Hints for Life and Service. By Rev. Adam Philip, M.A., minister of the Free Church, Longforgan. (3s. 6d. Stockwell & Co.) The general subject is God's work in nature and grace; its features and character from different points of view. Thirteen in number, the discourses are good reading, and replete with suggestion for preachers.

The Secret of Achievement, by O. S. Marden. (3s. 6d. T. Nelson & Sons.) Into this bulky compilation is compressed an amazing amount of good and stimulating counsel on true nobility of life, and the supreme worth of high character. Many writers of weight and note are quoted, and the volume is adorned by portraits of eminent persons, such as Washington, Gladstone, Lincoln, Gough, Carlyle, Moody, &c. A capital book for a present to thoughtful young people of both sexes.

The latest issue in the second series of "Helps Heavenward" is Visions of Sin, by James Hope Moulton, M.A. (2s. C. H. Kelly.) A solemn subject is dealt with in an impressive manner. The "visions" are presented by the lives and doings of Achan and Saul among Old Testament characters, and by the records of Judas, Caiaphas, Herod Antipas, and Pilate in New Testament story. This latter section is the more fruitful. Preachers will find strong thoughts in this book, which will, we trust, have many readers.

A pretty book of excerpts in prose and poetry is thus described on its title page: The More Excellent Way; Words of the Wise on the Life of Love: A Sequence of Meditations, compiled by the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton Gell. (3s. 6d. Henry Frowde.) Printed in colours and appealing for selection for presentation purposes, this book is in some degree an expansion of a section of the well-known "Cloud of Witness." The varied aspects of love are presented as they have appeared to the poets and writers of all ages.

Canon Burbidge's Half-hours with Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress has been issued in a second edition at a low price (3s. net) by Mr. C. J. Thynne. The treatment is popular and helpful. Thirty-one in number, the chapters were originally delivered as lectures; and workers contemplating a course of talks on this ever-attractive and timely subject, will find Canon Burbidge's pages very suggestive. To read the great allegory with the assistance of this book will count for as much as several perusals of the "Progress" by itself.

Thy Keeper, by Rev. H. C. G. Moule, D.D. (1s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) These four sermons, on Psalm cxxi., are samples of the very finest of the wheat laid up in God's great garner of truth. There is here more real unveiling of the deeper meanings of the passage than one often finds in whole tomes of sermonic literature. Dr. Moule is perhaps the greatest living expositor of the comforting and strengthening aspects of the Divine character, and in this little volume we

IT is too early to pronounce a final judgment in detail on the quality and prospects of the Free Church Catechism published last week for the use of churches and schools everywhere. It is, however, significant that such a summary of the doctrine should be called for at all in these days, and more significant still that a sufficiently broad basis of theological agreement should have been discovered among the evangelical denominations. Two years ago ten representatives of the four great Nonconformist bodies were deputed to draft such a catechism; this was revised by another committee of double the number; and, finally, each of the fifty-two definitions was adopted without a dissentient vote.

Of course, sectarian differences are necessarily ignored in the resultant definitions, and this makes some of them read somewhat ambiguously; but it will be found that no great doctrine is omitted, and the whole result testifies to the substantial agreement of the chief thinkers in our Free Churches on the fundamental doctrines of the Christian Faith.

Several summonses have been taken out lately against prosperous firms for wrongful description of goods sold. This is an important matter, not only as between seller and buyer, but also as between employers and their employés. It is one of the greatest hindrances that religion has to face among young people in business houses. On this ground, if on no other, Christian purchasers may render great service to the cause of the Gospel by taking steps to convince employers that they will lose instead of gain custom by adopting nefarious methods of conducting their business. It is shameful that the moral sense of an entire staff should be sacrificed for the sake of enriching either proprietors or shareholders, as the case may be. See also Mr. Aitken's article (p. 15).

The sentiment of Mrs. Randall Davidson, wife of the Bishop of Winchester, expressed in opening a girls' club at Aldershot, commends itself to all Christian workers; she wished the club to be bright and beautiful, and that the girls coming to it might have just as much fun and pleasure as in their own homes. "Goodness was so often made deadly dull." It is easy for bright, natural, unconventional souls to avoid the dulness, and to give the pleasure without running the risk of frivolity. Much depends on temperament, much on common sense, but most upon the guiding and inspiring Spirit of God.

A touching story has just been published of a poor widow whose son had, in a moment of foolishness, enlisted. She had been consequently reduced to want, as he was the breadwinner of the family. The mother prayed that some means might be found of restoring her son. As she prayed it seemed as if she heard a voice distinctly saying, "Write to the Queen." She immediately did so, and was presently overjoyed to receive a letter from headquarters informing her that her son would be relieved on condition of signing an undertaking that he would support his mother. We note that some journalists make light of this charming little incident. The fact, however, remains, and can be matched from the experience of thousands of devout believers, who could tell even stranger experiences of directly answered prayers. The answers are none the less real because they have come along the line of natural causes.

A publication of more than ordinary interest is issued this week. It is "An Examination and an Appeal," by Rev. Arnold Foster, of the China portions of the Report of the Commission on Opium, and concerning it. It has been truly said that "either Mr. Foster's premises are irrelevant and his inferences futile, or we have here a matter touching to the quick the conscience and the honour of the nation." Public attention is called to this "Examination" by a preface signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Carlisle, Derry, Liverpool, Norwich, and Rochester, Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Dr. Handley Moule, Revs. F. B. Meyer, H. E. Fox, and about 130 other well-known men.

Mr. Foster's own preface deserves special attention. It should do much to open the eyes of those who have not yet realised the gravity of the opium question. We hope to give it in a succeeding issue. Mr. Foster's "Examination" is a masterly production, and we heartily join with those who have united in calling attention to it. It may be purchased, either directly, or through any bookseller, from King & Son, 2 & 4, Gt. Smith St., Westminster. 6d.

It will ever redound to the dignity and good name of the American authorities that in the formal transfer of the government of Cuba out of the hands of the Spaniards, the victors carefully refrained from act or word that would needlessly wound the susceptibilities of the vanquished people. Indeed, everything possible was done to soften the blow, and to promote kindliness of feeling between the two nations so recently at war. This is in striking contrast with the older methods of war, in which the conqueror lost no opportunity of wounding the crushed heart he had overcome. So far as war can be freed from barbarism, and its effects alleviated, this was done in the recent struggle. And better feeling will arise between America and Spain now the conflict is ended, than was otherwise possible. Meanwhile, the United States have to win their laurels as a colonising Power.

A very interesting function took place last week at Omdurman, when Lord Cromer and Lord Kitchener announced the outlines of the policy to be followed out by the latter in his future administration of the Soudan. The Arab Sheikhs and notables listened eagerly to promises relating to equal justice and good government, to religious liberty, to fair taxation, and to freedom from all the forms of oppression, greed, and cruelty from which they have suffered during the last fifteen years. Their amazement in listening to the address, and their joy at looking forward to the enjoyment of privileges and rights possessed by the poorest British subjects the world over, were pathetic.

Reference was made to the question of religious liberty as follows:—

> The Queen and her Christian subjects are devotedly attached to their own religion, but they also know how to respect the religion of others. The Queen rules over a larger number of Moslem subjects than any Sovereign in the world, and they live contented under her beneficent rule. Their religion and religious customs are strongly respected. You may feel sure that the same principle will be adopted in the Soudan. There will be no interference whatever in your religion.

The refusal of the secular arm to interfere with religious beliefs in our new dependency is the opportunity of the missionary and philanthropist. Christianity is not dependent on political prestige for its work in the world; it meets error and sin, sorrow and shame, with the good news of Divine love to men. Much will depend on the missionary fervour and enthusiasm of those who believe in its power to save and bless. And now that the heavy hand of fanaticism and despotism has been lifted from the Soudan, it is the first duty of the churches and of missionary societies to see that the Gospel is presented to these poor oppressed people in all its power and persuasiveness. To fail at this crisis would be to be false to the great commission of the Saviour to evangelise all nations in his name.

An evening paper in calling attention to the scheme of the C.M.S. for the evangelisation of the Soudan, says that no doubt the Nonconformists are also preparing a plan of campaign; and Cardinal Vaughan has made a special appeal for contributions to a Roman Catholic mission in the conquered territory. Says our contemporary:—

> This looks as if the same scramble might happen again as occurred on the part of these different missionary agencies for Uganda.

It is all very well to say that the different missionary bodies should have their own spheres of influence, but the Romish Church claims to go everywhere, and to have a right to every soul. Such arrogance has ever caused trouble, and always will.

Mr. G. W. E. Russell's defence of lay readers in the Established Church in an interview reported in Church Bells, gives prominence to a movement which is likely to play a not inconsiderable part in the future. He considers that the burden of preaching rests too heavily on the clergy, and it will be one of the purposes of lay readers to ease this burden. Afternoon services for working men will furnish the opportunity for this exercise of the gift of speech at services formed on the model of the P.S.A. The institution of this lay order will, if wisely directed, let loose some splendid spiritual energy hitherto largely unused in the English Church, and will furnish opportunities for useful service to a number of devout believers who have not, so far, had adequate openings for their talents.

We are glad to find that the question of Temperance Hotels is under consideration by the National Temperance Federation Committee. This movement has hung fire throughout the country, in spite of the real need that exists for such institutions. The reason is not far to seek. "Licensed hotels" are planned on a generous scale; no money is spared to make them comfortable and attractive to their customers. Temperance hotels, on the other hand, are often lacking both in cleanliness and good management. Those who start them are prone to take for granted that teetotalers are less exacting in their demands for comfort and elegance than "moderate drinkers"; and, as a result, they speedily lose their best customers If only a fresh start were made, and thorough, efficient temperance hotels were planted in convenient localities, and on a scale that could vie with the best licensed houses, there are thousands who would give them the preference, and help them to success.

"Historical Revivals."

THE old and endearing word "Revival" is coming again into general use, and is heard more frequently every day. An evidence of this is found in the fact that the United Presbyterian Magazine commences the year with the first of a series of historic sketches of revivals, by Rev. William Dickie, M.A., Glasgow. The first of these relates to the revivals in Stewarton and Shotts, 1625-30. The following are extracts from this interesting and edifying paper:—

A series of sketches of great Historical Revivals should be welcomed at the present hour by all earnest Christians. For a long time we have been trudging along the levels and flats in grey weather and many are wearying for the mountain and the sun. We know that Revivals cannot be produced to order, and that the men needed for originating and guiding these great spiritual movements must be chosen vessels; but in dreary and despondent days we may remember, like David, "the years of the right hand of the Most High," and assume the attitude of expectation. The anticipation of spiritual refreshment is the best preparation for enjoying it. The sight of the feast brings the appetite. The study of Revivals may create the desire for revival; and, in this case, desire and satisfaction are simultaneous.

For what is a Revival? The old name for it brings out the idea. It used to be called a "General Attention." When an individual gives attention to divine things, and makes his spiritual condition his chief business for a season, his conversion is almost inevitable. The Gospel and the soul are so adapted to each other that, if you remove for a time all worldly distractions and interventions, they declare their elective affinities and embrace each other. In the same way, when there is a "general attention" to divine things on the part of a community, so that the Gospel gets a chance of asserting its claims, a Revival is certain.

The Revival in Stewarton was the outcome of the preaching and personality of the Rev. David Dickson, minister of Irvine, a man of remarkable character and attainments.

The trials through which he had passed made him a student of conscience, and he became, like many of the other ministers of his time, pre-eminently a preacher to the conscience. His words had new weight: for people felt his experience behind his preaching. Crowds gathered around him, even from across the borders. Families settled in Irvine in order to enjoy his ministry. He started a service on Mondays, the Irvine market-day, and the country folk attended church as eagerly as market. A "general attention" had set in.

David Dickson endeavoured to deal with the consciences which he awakened. After preaching, those who were in distress of soul usually repaired to his house, where he spent hours in "answering in their cases." Sometimes several scores waited upon his counsel. Occasionally the excitement ran into excess, but Dickson and those who assisted him were enabled "to act so prudent a part, as Satan's design was much disappointed, and solid, serious, in the West of Scotland about this time." As might be expected, the superfine and the profane looked askance upon the movement. The terrors of conscience and the joys of salvation were symptoms which excited ridicule. The "Stewarton sickness," the "daft folk of Stewarton," summed up their interpretation of things.

In Fleming's "Fulfilling of the Scriptures," we have a glimpse of scenes which the prosaic worldlings could not understand: "Few Sabbaths did pass without some evidently converted, or some convincing proofs of the power of God accompanying his Word; yea, that many were so choked and taken by the heart that, through terror, the Spirit in such a measure convincing them of sin, in hearing of the Word, they have been made to fall over, and thus carried out of the church; who after proved most

SOLID AND LIVELY CHRISTIANS."

Robert Blair tells us that he preached often to the Stewarton people in his college vacation, and that he profited more by them than they did by him. The Countess of Eglinton, who had much sympathy with evangelical truth, prevailed upon her lord to forego his hunting and hawking for some days in order to confer with some of Dickson's converts, and he protested "that he never spake with the like of them, and wondered at the wisdom they manifested in their speech." David Dickson was great among the many great men of that day. He was a scholar of wide repute, and became Professor of Theology in Glasgow, then in Edinburgh, though he often "sighed for the sandy hillocks of Irvine," and missed what he called "his books"—the hearts of his simple folk—"books" which he studied with untiring zeal.

A London merchant, who had visited Scotland about this time, characterised three great preachers whom he had heard. The first was Mr. Blair: "That man showed me the majesty of God. I afterwards heard a little fair man preach (Mr. Rutherford), and that man showed me the loveliness of Christ. Then I came and heard at Irvine a well-favoured, proper old man with a long beard, and that man showed me all my heart."

DICKSON'S STYLE OF PREACHING

differed from that which prevailed in his day. He did not venture upon a long series of sermons on short texts. He took a goodly portion of Scripture, and broke it up in a simple unnatural fashion. "God's bairns," he would say "should get a good blaud of his own bread." He did not parade his learning and purchase the admiration of his hearers by Latin quotations or vexing exegesis: "The cook should bring them no meat but what they can eat." To a youth aspiring to the ministry he gave this impressive advice, "Oh, study God well, and your own heart"—branches of study too often neglected in the whirl and

BUZZ OF MINISTERIAL LIFE.

Altogether, one cannot marvel that a man of such learning, piety, and zeal should have headed a Revival in a time when the cause of Christ was the common topic of conversation. When the same positive presentation of Christ and the same appeal to the conscience are made, conversions will be more common in our churches, and Revivals will break out in Pentecostal blessings throughout the land.

The Shotts Revival is intimately connected with John Livingston, "worthy, famous John Livingston," a man of rare fervency, guilelessness, and courage. When writing his memoirs during his banishment in Holland, he says:—"I do not remember any particular time of conversion, or that I was much cast down or lifted up. I do remember one night in the Dean of Kilmarnock, having been most of the day before in company with some of the people of Stewarton, who were under rare and sad exercises of mind, I lay down in some heaviness that I had never had experience of any such thing. That night, in the midst of my sleep, there came upon me such a that, if it had increased a small degree higher, or continued a minute longer, I had been in as dreadful a condition as ever living man was in; but it was instantly removed, and I thought it was said to me within my heart, 'See what a fool thou art to desire the thing thou couldst not endure.'"

When we examine the peculiar power of Livingston as a preacher, we discover the same qualities as we find in Dickson and in many other preachers of his time—simplicity, directness, heart-searching, Christ-magnifying. He also was a preacher to the conscience, but "melting of heart" was his peculiar characteristic. His ministry in Ireland was greatly blessed, not only in Killinchie, where he was settled, but in the many places which he visited at Communions and on other special occasions. Once in Ireland he had great liberty—in Holywood, at a Communion season, when a thousand people were converted. The veneration and affection of his Irish converts and friends were attested afterwards by the fact that, when he was settled as minister in Stranraer, it was no uncommon thing to have five hundred of them across from Ireland.

His usual preparation for preaching was to choose his text, then to meditate in his chamber or in the fields for four or five hours, and afterwards to write a few notes, leaving the enlargement to the time of the delivery. What he says of pulpit preparation is true still: "I found that much studying did not so much help in preaching as the getting of my heart brought to a spiritual disposition; yea, sometimes I thought the hunger of the hearers helped me more than my own preparation. Many a time I found that which was suggested to me in the delivery was more refreshful to myself and edifying to the hearers than what I had premeditated." Then he notes the preacher's experience that usually accompanies this style of preaching: "I was often much deserted and cast down in preaching, and sometimes tolerably assisted. I never preached a sermon that I would be in earnest to see again in writ but two. And both those times I had spent the whole night before in conference and prayer with some Christians."

The Duty of Confessing Christ.

BY REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK, D.D.

AMONG the many thousands who read THE CHRISTIAN, in all probability there are a great many who have not as yet openly confessed Christ by uniting with his Church. Many such, we doubt not, have experienced Christ's regenerating grace, and are really connected with Him by faith; but for some reason, they hold back from confessing Him, in the way of his appointment, by actual union with his people. If you, who are now reading these lines, are among such, let me point out that your neglect in this matter—assuming that you are a believer in Christ, and have accepted Him as your Saviour—is both a wrong to Christ and to his cause, and a serious source of spiritual loss to you. If one generation only were to pass and all Christians neglect this duty, the Church as a visible, valuable, aggressive organisation would be blotted out of the world. Each individual believer is also a great loser by neglecting to meet Christ's requirement that he shall confess Him before men, unite with his people, observe his divinely instituted sacraments, and identify himself with the visible organisation that is pushing forward his work in the world. There are why, if you are a Christian, you ought to make an open avowal of the fact.

One is that simple honesty requires it. If in your heart of hearts you know that you are depending on Christ for salvation, and are trying to serve Him day by day, then, when your friends in the Church stand inviting your avowal, it is your duty frankly to say, "Yes, I am with you as a fellow disciple of Christ. I am trying to serve Him, too."

Confession is a duty also, because God asks it. No duty is made plainer in God's Word. "Whosoever shall confess Me before men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in heaven." "Come ye out from among them and be ye separate." "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Here faith and confession are bracketed as kindred duties.

Moreover, not to confess is, practically to deny. Even your best friends wait for you to confess Christ before they place you confidently among his followers. They may hope that you are a Christian, but they wait for you to avow your faith before they can be sure of it. You are liable to be counted among those who are ashamed of Christ until you openly avow Christ.

Simple justice also demands your confession. When a man has wronged you publicly, it is not sufficient for him to retract in secret. So the non-confessor's injury to the cause of Christ is public. His want of confidence or allegiance is open; therefore, when he changes his mind and becomes a Christian, he should openly acknowledge Christ, in order that the wrong he has done, so far as possible, may be righted.

Your confession is required also by the commonest principles of loyalty. A soldier of the army must enlist, take the oath of allegiance, wear the uniform, follow the colours, obey his officers, and make it plain which side he is on.

Love and gratitude should move you to a frank and open acknowledgment of Christ as your Saviour. Has He cleansed you from your leprosy of sin? Then return to give Him thanks. Has He opened your blind eyes? Then follow Him in the way. Have you touched the hem of his garment? Then come and confess that healing virtue has been received. A soldier asked a surgeon who bound up his wounds to tell him his name. He replied, "Oh, never mind about that." "But," said the man, "I want to tell my wife and my children who it was that saved me." When Christ comes to us, binding up our broken hearts, healing our wounded spirits, and saving our dying souls, do you not think it is as little as we can do to tell others what He has done for us? Love for our Saviour, and love and gratitude for our salvation, ought to lead us to confess Christ

PROMPTLY AND EVERYWHERE.

Confess Him also because of the joy that will come into your soul with the act of obedience, and because of the blessing that will surely come to others through it. I have heard of a boy who was reading Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." He asked his mother which of the characters she liked best. She said: "Why, Christian, I suppose; he is the hero of the story." "Well, mamma," said he, "I like Christiana best; for when Christian started, he went alone; but when Christiana started, she took the children with her!" What a blessed fact it is, and how well we all know it, that when mothers start on the Christian life they take the children with them! But something of this same influence depends upon us all. No one can tell, young or old, how wide his influence, or how much good to others may depend on his making a prompt and open stand for Christ.

For these and many other reasons we would urge the duty, if you are a Christian, of avowing it. Humbly and yet bravely come out and make open acknowledgment of Christ by uniting yourself to his people. It is a plain duty you owe both to Him and to them. In the act of obeying Him you will help his Church and cause, bring joy to the hearts of your Christian friends, and gain great spiritual strength and benefit to yourself. Do the duty. Do it without delay.

Rochester, N.Y.

The Riviera.

DEAR SIR,—As one who has had a long and close acquaintance with the Riviera, I feel I must send a few lines to endorse what was recently said in THE CHRISTIAN as to the need for workers at Cannes. The need is certainly very great, and not only at Cannes, but at other places on the Riviera, as well as all over France and Italy. The people are accessible, and there are open doors for work, but so few to enter them.

I have long had it on my heart to appeal on behalf of these countries to those who may have already offered to some missionary society, and on account of health or age have been rejected for work in the far-off foreign field, and consequently think they must remain in England. If the door is closed to India or China, is it necessarily closed to France or Italy?

Those whose health could not stand the strain of life in a trying climate in the far-off mission field, might do splendid work for God in these benighted Roman Catholic countries. The climate is good, the conditions of life are somewhat similar to our own, and the language, probably to a certain extent already known, needing but little study to be thoroughly mastered. To those who are disappointed because they cannot go to India or China, I would say, Is it necessary to stay in England? Will you not think of France and Italy, where there are solitary workers in various centres longing for help?—Yours truly, F. H.

Mentone.

THE REVIVAL.

1859—1899.

WE continue to receive many communications regarding Revival. Brief extracts from some of the letters will interest our readers and encourage definite prayer.

I was one of those that obtained mercy in the year 1859, in Belfast. I heard Richard Weaver, Denham Smith, Shuldham Henry, and Grattan Guinness.—From Woking.

I cannot help feeling a deep conviction that your issue of The Revival is most timely. At present there seems to be an earnest cry to God to revive his gracious work.—From an Evangelist.

We have for three years been praying and believing for a mighty Revival. We are indeed rejoiced that such a paper is being published, and shall do our utmost to distribute the copies sent to us.—From Whitstable-on-Sea.

Greatly was I blessed in 1859 by hearing Richard Weaver, and The Revival was a real treasure. It was a source of real disappointment to me when its name was changed. I hope to make good use of the copies you may be kind enough to send me.—From Leeds.

We have been definitely praying for a rich outpouring of the Spirit upon this station, and we are believing for it, and trusting that 1899 will witness a grand and glorious Revival amongst us here in this "Garden of England."—From Sandown, I.W.

Surely the words, "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh," point to a mighty working of the Holy Ghost not yet given. God is working deeply among his own people; oh, that the work may spread among the ungodly!—From West London.

I am much interested in the publication of The Revival, and sincerely and prayerfully trust it may be made a blessing. A few of the Lord's people here have been for a long time praying for a Revival at a midday meeting. Thank God the signs of its near approach are not wanting.—From Hastings.

Some of us have been earnestly and prayerfully waiting upon the Lord for a personal and widespread Revival, and I believe that a distribution of such a paper as The Revival might be used of the Lord to awaken hunger for quickening in other hearts and knowledge how to seek and obtain it. We have long valued THE CHRISTIAN, and send it when read to Jamaica.—From Haverfordwest.

I well remember the first issues of The Revival in the early days. I was then just brought into the light, and was permitted to be united to the people of God in May, 1860. I was converted in the same town as Sir George Williams, and was apprenticed in the same shop as he was previously. Believing that God is about to answer prayer for pouring out a blessing, I will, for past as well as future blessings, join in thanking Him.—From Clevedon.

It has been my deep conviction for a considerable time now that God has been preparing the way for a mighty manifestation of the glory of his power, so as we have seen it in the sanctuary. The certainty that his Word will be fulfilled for the sake of Jesus, is filling me with joy and expectancy. The interest, with preparedness of heart amongst our people, is spreading. I have spoken to them about The Revival and it was most evident it struck a chord in many hearts.—From Bristol.

There is, on the part of many Christian workers in India, a great increase of the spirit of prayer, as evidenced and stimulated by the two days of special prayer last year and this; and in the hearts of many there is a distinct expectation—surely inwrought by the Spirit of God—of a coming Revival. I feel confident that the circulation in India and among missionaries and others of the record of God's work of forty years ago would be greatly used by Him in helping forward the good time coming.—From Madras.

THE STORY OF JESUS.

Sing, my tongue, the glorious battle,
With completed victory rife,
Tell the triumph of the strife:
How the world's Redeemer conquered
By surrendering of his life.
—Mediæval Hymn.

IT has been observed that the first mention of any subject in Scripture affords the key to all subsequent reference to it. An early example is found in the story of our Saviour Jesus, who is the main subject of Moses, and the Prophets, and the Psalms, and of the whole New Testament.

THE JUDGMENT IN PARADISE.

The first mention of the Redeemer is in Gen. iii. 15, as the Seed of the woman: "He shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." The words are a direct denunciation of judgment on the serpent, and an implied promise to the fallen pair. But our special purpose is to indicate that this first mention of Him who in the fulness of time should be born of a woman that we might receive the adoption of sons, was not primarily with reference to man's redemption but to the enemy's overthrow. The latter involved the former, as the greater includes the less.

He had endeavoured to usurp the throne of the Most High, and his deceitful overtures to the hitherto innocent pair were not so much an attack upon them as on his and their Creator. This is the keynote to the story of Jesus. He was sent, first of all, as God's beloved Son and elect Servant, that He might glorify God on the earth as the only possible Ruler of his own creation, and vindicate Him from the slander wherewith the enemy had slandered Him to our first parents in the garden. Secondly, He came to destroy the works of the Devil, and to bring to nought the Devil himself. And thirdly, to redeem sinners of mankind out of the hand of the enemy, and to bring them to God.

This order in the work of Christ is never reversed; nor is it ever to be lost sight of, that as the antagonist and victor of the Evil One, first on behalf of God, and secondly on behalf of man, the Seed of the woman was promised, and in due time came into the world.

THE PROPHET LIKE UNTO MOSES.

Moses said, "A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, like unto me." What were the characteristics of Moses as a prophet? He was sent by God to claim His people from the Egyptian king. Pharaoh well understood this, for he said, "Who is Jehovah, that I should obey his voice, to let Israel go? I know not Jehovah, neither will I let Israel go." As Moses inflicted judgments on Pharaoh and his servants, so Jesus, like unto Moses, inflicted judgments on Satan and his demons. And the way of salvation which God opened up to Israel by the hand of Moses, was a foreshadowing of the way which the same God opened up to his people through Jesus Christ, the Prophet like unto Moses. In each case the way of salvation was the way of destruction to the enemy; and the path through the red sea of death to the other shore prefigured our Lord's passage and ours through death and resurrection to the Land of Promise and of Rest.

THE LORD IS A MAN OF WAR.

The Messianic psalms, whether they speak of a suffering or a glorified Messiah, point back to the judgment scene in the garden. (44) and have for their text, in the latter case, "He shall bruise thy head;" and in the former, "Thou shalt bruise his heel."

In Isaiah's great prophecy of Emmanuel (vii. 14; ix. 6, 7) the allusion to the same scene is manifest. He is the Virgin's Seed; the Government is not on the usurper's shoulder, but on His. His names, Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Father of Eternity, the Prince of Peace, are all in allusive contrast to the rebel spirit who had fallen into condemnation through his treasonous pride; had defrauded Adam of his dominion; and filled the world with disorder and disaster, with cruelty and crime, with war and woe.

In the New Testament, the antagonism becomes acute between the usurping prince of this world, and the Seed of the woman, the Word made flesh. The dragon, by the sword of Herod, seeks the young Child to destroy Him, and Rachel weeps for her massacred children, slain if haply He might be among them.

Before He enters upon his ministry, the Spirit drives Him into the wilderness, where He abides forty days among the wild beasts, tempted of the Devil. The Second Man must prove Himself impervious to all the fiery darts of the wicked one, in a place and under circumstances contrasting utterly with the paradise where the first man fell under the liar and murderer's first assault. He overcomes, and the enemy leaves Him, but only for a season.

VICTORY THROUGH SUFFERING.

The Anointed King takes up his herald and forerunner's cry, "Repent, for the reign of God is at hand." And He sends forth his twelve and then his seventy messengers with the same message. What does it mean? That the enemy has exercised his baleful princedom in the world for four thousand years, and now, authenticated by wonders and signs, God's King has come to claim his own, and to deliver his people from their worse than Egyptian bondage or Babylonish captivity. It is the last testing time of Adam's race. Cultured in a very fruitful hill by the Creator Himself, or running wild like the vine in the wood, Jew and Gentile are the same at heart. They reject and slay their King and their God.

Where is the Kingdom now? It is where the King is, in resurrection. Therefore, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God." The manifestation of God in the flesh was the final test of man in the flesh; and the murder of the King of men filled up the measure of their iniquity. It had thus been proved that flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. For pride cannot bow down at the feet of humility.

FILLING UP INIQUITY.

But the pride, the self-exaltation, with which man was poisoned, came from the Old Serpent, the Devil, and Satan. And it was at the instigation of the Prince of this world that the princes of this world crucified the Lord of Glory. Therefore the filling up of man's iniquity was also the fulfilling of Satan's iniquity. And Jesus, foreseeing this result of his death, had said, "I beheld Satan like lightning fall from Heaven." "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out." And the Apostle says, "That through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

The coming crisis waits for two events—the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ, and the casting of Satan into the bottomless pit. The readiness of the bride of the Lamb will synchronize with the completed proof of the unfitness of the usurper to rule, and the exhaustive demonstration that when a creature alienates itself from the life of God it inevitably becomes a wandering star, for which is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

From Genesis to Revelation Jesus is the Vindicator of the authority of the Creator, God; the Victor and Destroyer of the enemy; the Redeemer and Saviour and King of men. M.

Protestantism in the 16th Century.

By MARGARET A. ROLLESTON.

2.—Justification by Faith.

FROM the study of the Bible Luther rediscovered the great doctrine that it is only by faith in Christ that the sinner can find pardon. The Lord had, when on earth, told his disciples that they must abide in Him, that his life must be theirs also, and that only by becoming one with Him could they have the true life which He had come to give. Paul, the great Apostle to the Gentiles, had expressed the same truth in more technical, or legal, language, when he said that we can only be justified, i.e., made righteous before God, by faith in the sacrifice of Christ. The old self-life must die that the new life of Christ may rule in us, and that the Christian, identified with Christ, may be able to say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

But "a man can receive nothing except it be given him from above;" and the history of Christendom, as indeed of every individual soul, has proved over and over again that for a man to grasp the doctrine of justification by faith, so simple and yet so overpowering, the grace of God must be given. Man in his faithlessness substituted for the simple way of salvation an elaborate theory of sacramentarianism. Said the Catholics,* God has appointed certain means of grace, by the use of which He can be approached; and they were apt to forget that though God does use channels, his grace is not identical with them nor even always dependent upon them. The Catholic too often behaved as a man would who took a great deal of trouble in seeing that his water-pipes were in proper order but forgot to make arrangements with the water company for the necessary supply of water. Consequently a system of ritual and religious observances grew up, in the careful performance of which the Romanist sought to gain salvation.

We must indeed remember that many and many a Catholic has been justified by faith; and even men who have been prevented, through some fault not their own, from accepting, as we understand it, the truth as it is in Jesus, have been led by the Holy Spirit, and produced the fruit of righteousness. But though this is so, it is very important for us who may have to take part in a second Reformation of the Christian Church to have a clear grasp of the fundamental difference between the system which makes justification by faith its leading doctrine and that which teaches sacramentarianism. Sacramentarianism, by practically limiting the power of God, results in sacerdotalism, the caste system of a priesthood, and in bondage. The doctrine of justification by faith insists upon the necessity of a new nature, and brings each individual soul directly into relation with God.

3.—The Sanctity of Home Life.

Perhaps the most obvious benefit of the Protestant Reformation was the revolution it created in the attitude of men towards the natural relationships and joys of life. Catholicism seeks to train men for heaven by asceticism, and it declares the celibate state higher than the married. Such teaching necessarily results in isolating a man, and in the degradation of home life, for it declares that the highest Christian life is not compatible with marriage, and that man in his struggle for salvation is best aided by all that loosens his ties to earth. As Luther said, man's law had been placed above God's law, and the result was to put a heavy burden on men's consciences.

Protestantism reasserted the truth that the true genius of Christianity was not separation but permeation. It is not in seeking to love men less, but in loving God more, that the Christian solves the problem of right relationship to his fellows. It has been truly said that God so uses "all human relationships in the revelation of Himself, that where any of these are wanting, very special grace must be given before even He can be known as fully without as with them."

Protestantism, in reasserting the sanctity of domestic life, secured the purity and happiness of many a home, placed woman once again in the position of helpmeet to man, and thereby laid the foundations of healthy national life.

Such then, are the distinctive doctrines of Protestantism, and we must now see how far they were held by the men who in the 16th century broke our connection with Rome and reorganised the English Church on its present basis. The agents of the English Reformation belong to one or other of the following classes :—

1. The political agents, viz., Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth.

2. The religious leaders, to whom more properly the name of Reformer alone belongs, viz., Bilney, Latimer, Ridley, Cranmer, &c.

It will be well to clear the ground by first considering the claim of the political agents to the title of Protestant Reformers.

Henry VIII., though no Papist, was as certainly no Protestant. He repudiated, indeed, the claim of the Pope to rule the English Church; but as the Statute of the Six Articles proves, he held firmly the distinctive doctrines of Catholicism, and was determined that his subjects, on penalty of severe punishment, should hold them, too. Indeed, the theological position of Henry VIII. was in most respects that of an extreme ritualist of to-day. Edward VI. was most decidedly a Protestant, and in his reign Protestantism impressed its mark on the Prayer Book, which is still used in the Established Church.

The theological position of Elizabeth is more uncertain than either her father's or her brother's. Neither Protestant nor Catholic can altogether claim her, for, while objecting to doctrines distinctively Catholic, she never seems fully to have grasped Protestant teaching. Her excommunication by the Pope, the danger which threatened her from Spain, the growing Protestant feeling of her subjects, forced her to assume a more Protestant policy than she would otherwise have done, and the National Church which she established, in the hope that Protestant and Catholic would alike worship in its buildings, was decidedly Protestant in its doctrines.

Henry VIII. and Elizabeth were, as Cyrus was of old, the servants whom God used to free his people from bondage, and we ought also to remember that, despotic though these monarchs were, they could not have effected even separation from Rome against the will of their people. This latter consideration leads us to ask who were the religious leaders who so influenced the nation that it repudiated the authority of Rome? A delineation of the lives of some of the leading Reformers would show that their teaching was Protestant as well as Anti-papal.

Jersey.—During the week of prayer there has been a real working of the Spirit, and the addresses were of a heart-stirring character. Canon Heath spoke well on the duties of parents and children; Rev. A. Trengrove on thanksgiving; and Mr. Benson on the duties of Christians in relation to public affairs. Rev. Minton-Senhouse and the new Congregational pastor, Mr. Laundy, also gave some interesting addresses.

Protestant Notes.

REV. THOS. CONNELLAN, of Dublin, has shown that there is no just claim for the establishment and endowment of a Roman Catholic college in Ireland. Maynooth, for the training of Roman Catholic priests, has been already endowed with over half a million of public money. All the prizes and emoluments in Dublin University are open to Romanists, as well as those in the Queen's Colleges. Mr. Connellan argues, therefore, that the Roman Catholic Church has no grievance whatever in the matter of University education.

* * * * *

The Guardian advocates the claim of the Roman Catholics to a university of their own on a curious ground. Because the "atmosphere" of the present (non-sectarian) University of Dublin is not favourable to the spread of "Ultramontane" principles, though it has had two Roman Catholic Fellows and at least one prominent Roman Catholic Member of Council during the past ten years; therefore, it believes that the Roman Catholic demand should be satisfied. Reduced to its general terms, this would justify any and every single sect in the country demanding that Government should found and endow a seat of learning in which its own special principles might be taught in a suitable atmosphere. But thus the argument at once becomes absurd. The right attitude is to reverse the argument, and demand that no university of learning, chartered by the State, and upheld with State money, should be anything but unsectarian. There is no grievance, and therefore there can be no remedy.

A treatise which many will find of service at the present time is Archdeacon Sinclair's "Points at issue between the Church of England and the Church of Rome," now in its fourth edition (6d. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.). This substantial pamphlet summarises a vast amount of information, and should assist many in the present time of Romish propaganda. Mr. Stock offers to supply this very useful work at half-price, in quantities of a hundred and upwards, for distribution, in execution of orders received direct from purchasers.

Sir E. Clarke, M.P., addressing a meeting at Plymouth on Monday, referred to the Ritual controversy. The majority of the people and members of Parliament were, he said, determined that the clergy should observe the conditions under which they had accepted their benefices. If necessary he had no doubt the power possessed by the Bishops to veto proceedings under the existing Act would be abolished by the House of Commons, but he would be glad to see steps taken by the Bishops themselves which would prevent the necessity for Parliamentary interference.

The pastoral recently issued by the Archbishop of York has been extensively circulated in the northern province in pamphlet form, and some of the clergy have already signified their decision as to the recommendations of his Grace. The vicar of St. Matthew's, Sheffield, however, Rev. G. C. Ommanney, has adopted an attitude of silence, but has given notice of his intention to preach a series of sermons on Catholic faith and practice, and has also announced from the pulpit a requiem mass. Rev. N. Green-Armytage, of Boston, is not disposed to give way to the Bishops. He writes: "Bishops need to be sharply reminded, as King Charles had need to be reminded, even by many who appreciated kingly rule, that, though they govern the Church by Divine right, as Christ's vicars, they must govern it according to her constitutions and her canon law, and not as 'lords over God's heritage.'"

On Saturday morning High Mass was celebrated at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Paddington, in the presence of the Bishop of Lincoln, who preached a sermon on behalf of the Oxford Mission to Calcutta, it being the eighteenth anniversary festival of that mission. The term "High Mass" is not used here without authority, for it is the description given of this very service in the calendar printed in the parish magazine, though on the paper of hymns supplied to the congregation the phrase used was "Holy Eucharist." It may be remarked, without prejudice, and merely with the object of conveying an impression, that any one who had witnessed High Mass in a Roman Catholic Church, might well—what with the wearing of Eucharistic vestments by the officiating clergy, the proceedings at the altar, the bell at consecration, the elevation of the "Host," the lights, and the ceremonial use of incense—have imagined that he was in a Romish place of worship, but for the employment of the English tongue instead of the Latin.—Daily News.

A correspondent of the Daily News, "Q.C., M.P.," says:—"It is clear that a general resolution of the Bishops to allow no petition to be presented under the Public Worship Regulation Act is not an exercise of discretion in each case such as the House of Lords decided—in reversing Courts below—that they possessed. Why, therefore, do not the Church Association, if it still exists, or other zealous Protestants, enforce the law? They should present a petition, let the diocesan veto it, then proceed on affidavit showing that there was a strong primâ facie case of illegality, and that the episcopal veto arose from a general resolution of the Bench of Bishops to discountenance the statutory machinery established by the Public Worship Regulation Act for the enforcement of the law. On these materials the Courts would, I doubt not, set aside the prohibition, and allow the petition to proceed. The experiment of a petition, with the object of ascertaining the full scope of the episcopal power of prohibition, would, in the present circumstances, be interesting, and might be valuable."

Liverpool has for many years been strongly Protestant. It is, therefore, not surprising that feeling there should have been violently excited by the extremes which Romish practices in the National Church have attained. In July the first combined manifestation of this feeling took place at an influential and representative gathering of both clergy and laity held in St. George's Hall. As a result of this initial departure two bodies were formed to promote the objects in view, viz., a Churchmen's Council and Layman's League. The first-named comprises something like 100 representative clergy in the diocese, many of them holding what may be called moderate views, and about 200 laymen. This Council has rendered invaluable assistance in maturing responsible judgment as to the present crisis in the Church. The Laymen's League is, as its title indicates, confined to laymen. Meetings have been held under its auspices in many parts of the city to advocate their rights. An appeal to the House of Commons has been urged as the only permanent safeguard against clerical lawlessness in a Church where the laity are practically powerless, and where direct appeals for redress have been answered until recently by episcopal indifference and the episcopal veto. The league has drafted a bill for the suppression of illegalities in the Church, which, it is understood, is only a preliminary step to be followed by certain measures for securing definite rights to the laity.

Sir William Harcourt continues his formidable letters to The Times on the subject of Ritualism. In his last he sends a copy of an anonymous letter, which was published in that extreme paper The Church Review. Sir William believes the writer to be one of those "numerous ecclesiastics who skulk under cover of the secret societies with which the Church of England is honeycombed." The clerical correspondent describes how candidates for confirmation are instructed on the "Sacrament of Penance" at length they "make their confession":—"They are numbered off—one, two, three, &c., the priest goes to the confessional, and they go up in order, No. 3, for instance, knowing that it is his turn to go up when No. 2 returns to his place. Of course they are put in different places in the church, but the effect is to make them learn that the Sacrament is an ordinary Church form in which all Catholics take part. The same takes place before all the great festivals, and they accept it like ducks accept water." On this shameless perversion of young persons, Sir William makes the pertinent observation :—"Yes, the ducks take to the water, and the Episcopal hens run about cackling on the bank, as their brood is enticed into the pools of the 'Catholic Revival,' and Reynard the fox lies in ambush on the brink awaiting his destined prey. Are the Bishops the only living souls who are ignorant that this sort of thing is going on with impunity all over the country, in the Church of which they are supposed to be the guardians?"

SUNDAY, January 15, 1899. Exodus xxxiv.

THREE essential conditions are needed if the vision and Word of God are to be beheld and received.

Earliness: "My soul, be ready in the morning." Solitude: "No man shall come up with thee." Tablets of the Heart: That God may write there what He will.

God is always passing by and proclaiming his name, and that name is Love. He is full of compassion and grace, plenteous in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, and limiting the entail of sin to the third or fourth generation.

Whenever you get into God's innermost place, do not forget to pray for others. Moses at once commenced to entreat that God would go in the midst of the people. In the previous chapter it had seemed as though the Divine presence were not assured; and therefore this man, who loved the people more than himself, used this memorable interview to ask that God would take Israel as his inheritance, and go among them. It is thus that the Son of Man pleads, and when He receives aught from the Father, it is that He may shed it forth on his Church.

Is it wonderful that Moses' face shone? Had his own salvation and enjoyment occupied him during the forty days and nights, he would never have received this heavenly sign and seal. The prayer that pleads for others is the one that God loves.

MONDAY, January 16. Exodus xxxv.

It is remarkable that this chapter, which speaks of the great gift of Israel, in which men vied with men, and women with women, begins with these verses on rest. It is as though rest must precede our most vigorous endeavours and noblest gifts.

After Moses' proclamation, the congregation dispersed to the tents to meditate and discuss, in family groups, what could be done. Ah! what heart-stirrings were there! The Spirit of God moved mightily upon the host, and great sacrifices were meditated. Then they came again, like a returning wave, with willing and rejoicing hearts.

There was one man who was more richly gifted than most. Bezaleel was filled with the Spirit of God in three several directions—first, he could devise works; next, he could himself work in all manner of cunning workmanship; thirdly, he could teach.

See how God's Spirit fits men for work! If He was able to fill this man with wisdom, understanding, knowledge, and faculty, is it not certain that his infilling will enable the young missionary to learn the language, and the older one to devise the buildings for the mission station; this man to act as a treasurer of some benevolent enterprise, and that to control the machinery of some great trading house?

"Not a very interesting chapter," says a friend of mine; "I have no great care for loops and selvedges and clasps." This is to judge superficially; for every whit of it would say "Glory," if only our eyes were properly opened to understand the Scripture. What the Spirit of God has given space to, it is becoming for us to understand.

If the Tabernacle inculcates the relationship which members of the church should sustain to each other, surely we must learn the lesson of these loops and clasps. The loop had the humbler and simpler office, and was not so handsome as the golden clasp; but all could not be clasps. There could be but one clasp to two loops.

So in every church there are those who bind, and those who are bound; some who have the power of attaching to themselves, and to Christ, whilst others yield to their loving influences; some who are receptive of unifying influences, whilst others exert them. But be one or other, and do your part to couple the tent together, so that "it may be one."

It is pleasant, also, to think of these boards of acacia wood, standing in their silver sockets, and constituted into a wall, by five bars of wood overlaid with gold, running horizontally from end to end. What are you—a board, a socket, or a bar?

WEDNESDAY, January 18. Exodus xxxvii.

In three out of the four pieces of furniture mentioned in this chapter, provision is made for the migrations of Israel. Four rings of gold and staves of acacia wood in the ark; four rings of gold and places for the staves in the table; two golden rings and staves in the altar of incense. Everything betokened a pilgrim host. This was as evident as the great reverence with which the people regarded these sacred emblems on which they lavished their gold.

When, at night, we get to our homes, we think we come back to the same spot as we started from in the morning. But it is not exactly so. It is rather like the experience of the German Emperor in his recent tour, and of other travellers in the East, whose tents are struck as soon as they leave them in the morning, so as to be borne swiftly forward, and pitched to receive their occupants at night. They are the same tents, but they are set up further along the route. Every night, in the words of the hymn, we pitch our moving tent

A day's march nearer home.

THURSDAY, January 19. Exodus xxxviii.

It is amazing to read this computation of the vast sums contributed by Israel for the building and furnishing of the Tabernacle; especially when we are told that the people had to be restrained from giving, because they brought much more than enough! It seems strange that a nation of slaves should have been possessed of such wealth. But no doubt these were some of the treasures of which the people spoiled the Egyptians on the night of the Exodus. "The children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver and jewels of gold. The Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they let them have what they asked."

In this relation it should be remembered, first, that the word translated in the A.V., "borrowed," and in the R.V. "asked," does not imply the thought of a return. It signifies simply asking, without expecting recompense. And, next, we should not forget that the people had toiled hard without remuneration for perhaps one or two hundred years, and it was meet that they should receive some kind of recompense.

But, however the money and goods came into their possession, these old Jews certainly set an example to us new Christians. Few of us can claim to give beneath the love of Calvary what they gave freely under the brow of Sinai. The amount proportionate to our income, which we give freely, is a pretty accurate gauge of the amount of our love and trust, and what we are towards man is a true test of what we are towards God.

FRIDAY, January 20. Exodus xxxix.

Ten times over we are told that all the work was done, as the Lord commanded Moses. "And Moses saw all the work, and behold they had done it; as the Lord had commanded, even so had they done it, and Moses blessed them."

We are carried forward in thought to what will be said to some faithful workers, when their life's work shall have been finished to the utmost of their ability, and they shall have been summoned into the presence of the King. Christ will see all the work they have done, and will know that it has been done according to his pattern, and as He commanded; and He will bless his loyal servants, saying, "As ye have been faithful in a very little, be rulers over many cities; enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

In order fully to apprehend the comfort of these anticipations, we must never fail to distinguish between the judgment-seat of Christ (2 Cor. v.) and the great white throne (Rev. xx.). With the latter, those who believe have nothing to do, save as spectators or co-assessors. But we shall all stand before the King when, at the end of the present age, He comes to take the account of his servants. He will not deal then with our sins or acceptance, since these were settled long before; but will allot our rewards, and bless our work, in so far as it has been faithful.

SATURDAY, January 21. Exodus xl.

Behold the Tabernacle of God was with men. The people had constructed an abode for Him, and He had descended to fill it. God had said, "Make for Me a house to dwell in," and when Israel had obeyed, the cloud indicated that He was present.

It was necessary in that time of religious immaturity that there should be an outward and visible sign of God's presence. But in our experience, we may account that He has entered to fill our nature, even when there is no outward manifestation, and only a very deep and impressive sense of God's presence. Not with cloud or fire, not by voice or trumpet-note, not through any appeal to sense, but by the all-penetrating, all-subduing sense of God's nearness, we learn that God has come to the obedient and prepared soul, irradiating and filling it with his blessed indwelling.

And when God comes to indwell, He also assumes the guidance of our lives. When the cloud lifts, we journey onward; when it abides, we stay. But our goings forth to service, as our return to rest, are determined for us by indications that appeal to the heart and cannot be mistaken.

Probably nothing in Christian life needs more careful attention than to acquire the habit of detecting and obeying the movements of the cloud. But how blessed it is to be told that the cloud remained on its chosen seat by day and night! Yes, child of God, the night of trial, sorrow, or obscurity cannot deprive thee of the sense of God's presence and guidance. Nothing but murmuring, rebellion, wilful sin. Such is the lesson of the Exodus.

The Scorn of Consequence.

By Rev. W. H. M. H. AITKEN.*

"DO come and hear the mission preacher," said a worker to a young man employed in commerce. "Not if I know it, sir," was the laconic reply. "Why, look here, it is just this way with me: situated as I am in business I must either lie or I must starve. I don't like lying, but I like it better than starving; so I don't intend to starve, and consequently I must go on lying. What is the good of going to hear a mission preacher tell you what you know already—that you oughtn't to lie—when you can't help it?" Surely such a plea must needs appeal to our tenderest sympathies; but all the more do we admire that power of the grace of God, which enables a poor frail man to exhibit that true wisdom which is indeed in "the scorn of consequence."

During a mission in a northern town, a young clerk came under the power of the word, was led to make a full surrender of himself to God, and was filled with joy and peace in believing. His life flowed on smoothly and happily until a few weeks after the mission, when there came a season of terrible trial in his

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

He held a good situation, for so young a man, as confidential clerk to his employers; but it was to his good fortune in obtaining this somewhat coveted position that he owed the fierce temptation with which he was assailed. He received orders one evening from his employers to write a letter containing a series of statements which he knew to be utterly false. Before his conversion such a direction would have caused him no qualm of conscience. Although not himself a dishonourable man, I dare say he would have argued that his employers were acting on their own responsibility, and that he was no more to blame for what they dictated to him than the pen with which he wrote.

He had so often done the same sort of thing before, and the habit of obedience was so strong with him, that he sat down and wrote almost mechanically what he had been instructed to write; but he had no sooner posted the letter than all his joy and peace left him, and he

from the gates of heaven into an incipient hell. That night he scarcely slept. A great part of it was spent in crying to God for mercy and help.

The next day, he asked for a private interview with the head of the firm. In the most respectful terms that he could employ, he explained that he felt constrained to decline to do such a thing again under any circumstances. His employer was intensely angry, and gave him notice on the spot; and the poor boy, who had by this time regained his inward peace, found himself face to face with the possibility of being thrown out of an exceptionally good position, and that at a time when clerks were "a glut in the market," and the probability of his hearing of even an indifferent situation was exceedingly slight. To make his trial heavier he had a widowed mother depending on his exertions, and also an unmarried sister.

The days of the month of notice dragged themselves away wearily enough. He occupied every spare moment he could command in seeking right and let for employment, but in vain. There were times, of course, when his faith was sorely tried; the enemy "came in like a flood," with the suggestion that he had been a big fool for his pains, and that his folly was all the greater in supposing that God was going to interfere on his behalf in order to save him from the results of it. He comforted himself with the thought that he had committed his way to the Lord, and had obeyed the dictates of his conscience; yet it was with a very heavy heart that he came down to the office for the last time, with no sort of prospect of anything but actual destitution and want before him.

As he threw himself on his seat, his eye fell upon a letter awaiting him on his desk. He opened it in a listless sort of way, little dreaming of what it was to contain. Imagine his feelings when he found that it came from a very important firm, and brought him the offer of a situation with a salary nearly twice as large as that which he had resigned for the sake of God and the truth. He had been tried, and came out of the furnace as gold.

A Jewel for the King's Crown,

MISS UNCLES, of Bath.

"Do tell Christians what they miss by not having the fulness of the Spirit."
"And how is this to be obtained?"
"By continually reading the Word, with constant prayer for the teaching of the Holy Spirit."

I WAS sick-visiting, and, as is often the case, I had to learn. The speaker on this occasion was a truly godly young woman of about thirty-three; her conversion took place at the age of fifteen.

Those in whose service she had been employed as assistant in, or manageress of, a shop, had the highest regard for her integrity and devotion to duty. Those who are in our employ will soon find out the reality of our religion; and employers are also well able to find out the piety of their workpeople.

But it was not till her long illness of two years that she shone most brightly. Robert Chapman has said that "God's jewels require cutting, grinding, and polishing"; and surely it was so with her. Before this she was a true and sincere Christian, bringing everything to God in prayer, and living a blameless life; but consumption was to be as fire to purify the silver, or, to be consistent with the figure chosen for this memoir, the grindstone for the jewel to adorn the King's crown.

"Oh, Mr. Willway," she exclaimed, "God has taught me so many lessons since I have been ill. I have found his grace more than sufficient. If I only had a voice strong enough, I would go and tell all the world of the goodness and love of God."

Sometimes she would be racked with pain and torn with a cough, but at intervals of relief she would say, "This light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;" and she was fond of holding out her hands as imaginery balances, one being higher than the other, thus representing the "light affliction," as compared with the "weight of glory."

Her great theme was the fulness of the Spirit, and her earnest desire was that Christians should be told what they miss by not having it. Without this, the Bible is to a large extent a sealed book.

Not only was painful wasting disease to be a means of purifying, but the enemy of souls was permitted to come and assault her with fiery darts, questioning at times the truth of the Christian religion and then her own interest in her Saviour. But she found that the shield of faith could quench his fiery darts. "Satan," she would say, "you are a liar from the beginning; and by-and-by you will be cast into the bottomless pit, and I shall be with my Lord."

Her care for her invalid sister, who died some years before, was very beautiful; and the dying sister's prayer, that if she were ever in need of some one to nurse her she might have one, was granted. And this friend esteemed it a privilege to wait upon one who was so "meek and quiet" in spirit.

My testimony after visiting this suffering one was that I had been two hours outside the gates of heaven. My faith was strengthened. I could see the reality of the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ when put to the test of a long and painful illness. Here was one for whom nothing could be done; medical skill was baffled, science, philosophy, the pleasures of the world, could not help this young woman whose career on earth was to terminate so early; but the grace of God could and did sustain her. She begged her friend, shortly before her death to tell people that God supported her to the end, and her testimony was that, amidst the most acute pains, underneath her were "the Everlasting Arms."

She could declare without boasting, that "every-one that knew her knew that she belonged to the Lord." Can we say that? Well for us if we can.

Very shortly before her death, she seemed to have visions of the happy realms above. On one occasion she sprang out of bed and went to the window, exclaiming with a happy look, "Jesus! Jesus! Jesus! I have longed to see Thee!" and then she fell to the floor. Her longing for home now increased, and the burden of her prayer was, "O, my Heavenly Father, you have been with me all through this agony, and you will be with me to the end! Come and take your jewel, Bessie Uncles. You know where she lives, 10, Lower Dover Street, Bath." And soon that prayer was granted, and with a sweet smile the ransomed spirit took its flight.

Perhaps, discerning my wish to know whether she trusted in her good works, or rested simply and solely upon the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, she said to me once:

"Don't suppose, Mr. Willway, that I have any merit. If it hadn't been that Jesus saved me, I should have been lost. If God had let me alone, I should have gone to hell."

And so for all the wonderful work of grace wrought in this bright joyful Christian, we ascribe all glory to God, and say heartily: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake."

London Medical Mission.

WE are very busy among the sick and dying in the Seven Dials, and in Lambeth, and have recently come across the following cases:—

Was asked to come at once to an urgent case of a young woman bleeding considerably from a kick given her by her husband. She was married at seventeen, and is now twenty-five years of age, and had had a miserable life, having become addicted to drink herself. She seems to have been drunk when kicked, and was very repentant for her own failings. She listened attentively to the Gospel, and is doing better now. Her husband has been alarmed by a serious caution from the doctor.

The same day, in another part of this neighbourhood, we found a young woman ill, her husband had just been taken off to prison for ten days for a drunken assault.

Mrs. G— sent for us, bleeding from a dangerous scalp wound, caused by falling down a flight of stairs in an old tumble-down tenement. Whether she was drunk at the time we cannot say, but both doctor and nurse have been very careful in going to see her lest they also should meet with a similar accident. At first she was very ignorant and opposed to the Gospel, but she now listens with interest.

A respectable woman, in great agony, called us in. "I would not have troubled you had I not spent all I have had; my husband is out of work, but got a job yesterday for half-a-crown, which he had to give to the local doctor who came to see me last night." We were very glad to be able to help her, and found the case was one that needed immediate hospital treatment. A serious surgical operation was necessary, and so far she is doing well. We sent a nurse with her, paid all expenses in connection with her removal, and thus were able to help another needy person in a time of great difficulty.

Medical Mission meetings are held on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings for workingmen, charwomen, and factory hands. Visitors are always welcome at the Gospel services for the patients, at one p.m. on Mondays and Thursdays at St. Giles, and at ten a.m. Tuesdays and Fridays at 78, Oakley Street, Lambeth, or on any day between ten and twelve for visiting in the homes of the people.

The Opium Traffic.

THE national sense of horror at the infamies of the opium traffic must certainly be deepened as a result of the gathering held on Wednesday last, at the instance of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade and Women's Anti-opium Urgency Committee, in the Friends' Meeting House, Bishopsgate Street. The occasion was the farewell of Rev. and Mrs. Arnold Foster, who are returning to China to resume their missionary labours.

Dr. Maxwell, who presided, gave a graphic sketch of the history of anti-opium efforts, briefly described revolting results to body and mind of indulgence in the habit, and quoted the solemnly expressed opinion of one of the most influential statesman in China, Chang Chih-tung, that "the injury done by opium is that of a stream of poison flowing on for more than a hundred years, and diffusing itself in twenty-two different provinces;" and, "after a few tens of years it will result in China becoming altogether the laughing stock of the world."

Mr. R. C. Morgan moved a resolution that—

"This gathering of friends of the anti-opium movement, in view of the Rev. Arnold Foster's immediate return to his mission labours in China, desire to put on record their deep sense of obligation to him for his greatly valued help to the cause of national righteousness.

"They gratefully recognise the goodness of God in bringing Mr. Foster to this country at a time when, under the influence of the Royal Commission's misleading report, the minds of many had been persuaded to take up either a distinctly hostile or a callously indifferent attitude to the anti-opium cause.

"They are profoundly thankful that it was laid on Mr. Foster's heart to throw himself with unwearied energy into the task of exposing the misrepresentations of the Royal Commission's report so far as it concerned China, and of placing a right restatement of the question in its great moral issues before the Christian people of this country.

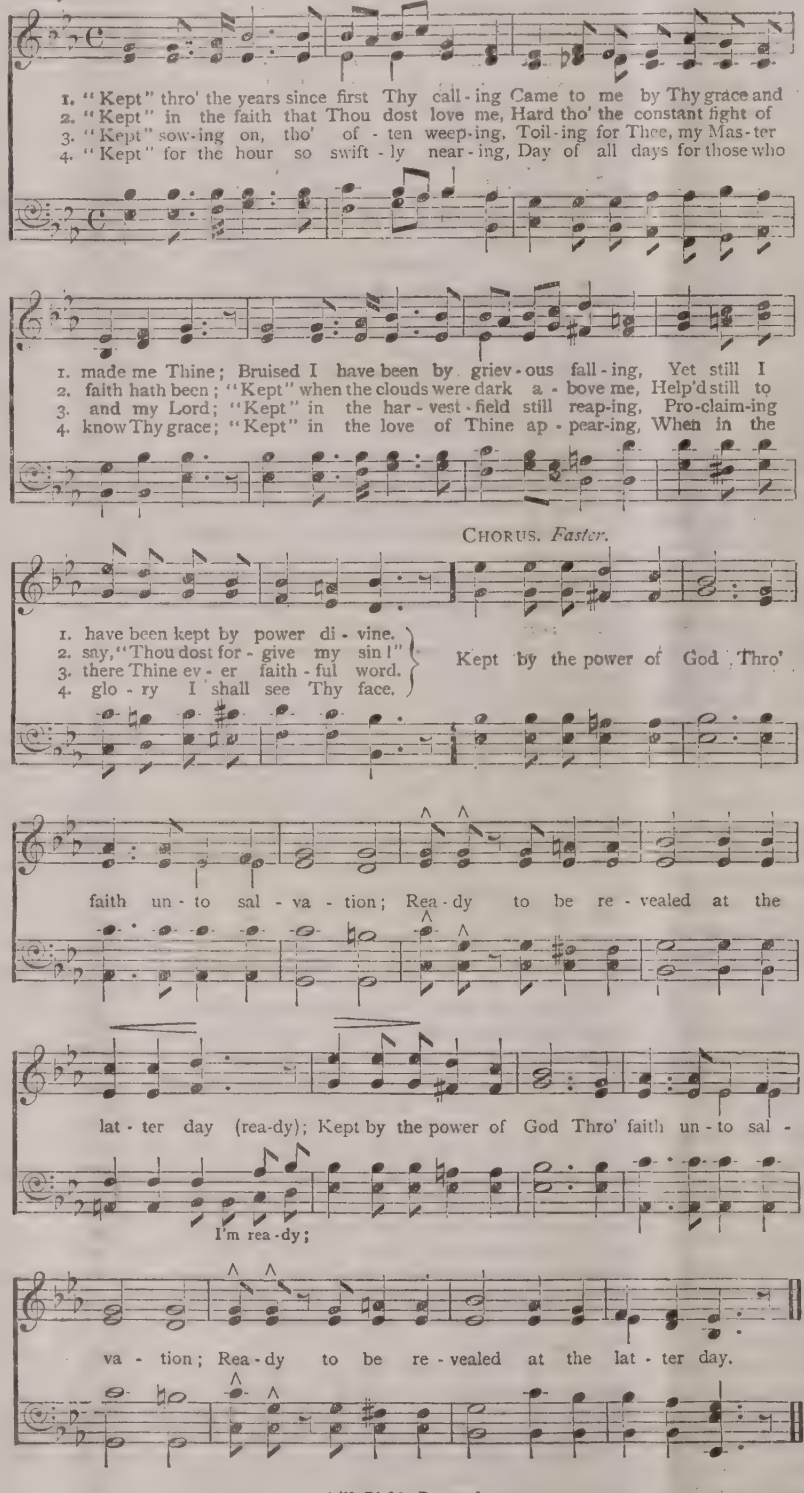
"They especially recall the notable addresses delivered by Mr. Foster at the meeting at Cannon Street Hotel, presided over by the Rev. Dr. Handley Moule, and at the meeting in Lambeth Palace, presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury; and whilst particularly mentioning these two occasions, they are not forgetting the many other addresses by Mr. Foster on the same behalf in various parts of the United Kingdom.

"They desire further to express their sincerest acknowledgments for the two contributions by Mr. Foster to the permanent literature of the anti-opium question—viz., the article in the Contemporary Review on 'The Report of the Opium Commission,' and the 'Examination of the Report of the Opium Commission so far as it relates to the evidence from China that was submitted to the Commission.'

"They believe that the result of Mr. Foster's labours has been to lift the anti-opium cause out of the depressed condition into which it had come, and to give new impetus to the movement against a great national iniquity.

"And while very heartily thanking Mr. Foster for all his labours in this behalf, they would express to him their warm desire before God that in returning with Mrs. Foster to his loved mission work in China, it may be his happy privilege not only to see a rapidly increasing prosperity to the mission cause, but ere long also to hear that by the mercy of God his own beloved country has at length severed herself completely from all further complicity in a traffic which has wrought such desolation in China."

The speaker insisted that this country, which posed before the world as the leading Christian nation, was inflicting upon China as grave a wrong as could well be perpetrated. The value of Mr. Foster's work appeared all the greater, viewed in the light of our grave responsibility as a people.



After Rev. G. Piercy, in seconding the resolution, had given some reminiscences of work in China, Mr. Broomhall feelingly referred to the great increase in public interest in the question, accruing from the meetings which had been held at Cannon Street Hotel and at Lambeth Palace, which had done much to remove the fallacy that the Commission's report had settled the matter once for all. The speaker contended that if those who laboured under such a delusion would refer to the newly published sixpenny book containing Rev. Arnold Foster's examination of the Commission report, they would not find it an easy matter to deny the Commissioners' astounding incapacity. The preface to the pamphlet was a valuable document, expressing the belief that Mr. Foster's argument would be found "as strong as a perfectly fair use of sure premises could make it, and appealing to the thinking public for a fresh hearing on this great question." The signatures thereto included those of a great number of leading men, including the Archbishop of Canterbury, many of the bishops, and the chief ministers of the Free Churches, besides prominent representatives of the religious Press.

Mr. Robert Scott referred in kindly terms to the labours of Mrs. Foster, and to the signal revival of national feeling against the opium traffic and its abominations. The resolution was agreed to nem. con., and Rev. Arnold Foster, after acknowledging the many kindnesses he had received in England, passed swiftly to a forcible reiteration of his scathing indictment of the traffic. Mr. Foster does not merely hold lofty views on a grave moral question, the truth burns in his heart and must needs flame forth. After expressing a belief that remedial action might be nearer than we thought, Mr. Foster related incidents from personal experience, demonstrating the keen sense of shame existing among the Chinese, and their readiness to assist in the removal of moral ills. He recognised the good recently done by Lord Salisbury's Chinese policy in combating the idea that this country intended to join in a general bellicose struggle for territory. Our business is to rehabilitate not to devour, and we must realise that, in the sense of shame in this matter, China is a living force to-day. The churches must awake to their duty, both to England and to China; they must make their voices heard in Government circles, and never cease strenuous effort until right is done and this reproach is swept away.

Workers in Paris.

DEAR SIR,—The Lord was manifestly with us leading our meeting last night, when forty to fifty leading workers gathered again to wait on Him for wisdom and strength for the great battle. We were glad to see two more pastors, while four others in truest sympathy were prevented from coming.

Among other truths brought before us was the fact of our being the Lord's only representatives here, and that the Lord had really given the life of Christ to us in order to represent Him as He should be seen by the world. The prayers of two pastors were remarkable—one for humility and deep consciousness of need; the other for the joyful anticipation of victory, from one of the veterans.

We were all anxious to have a third meeting, which will take place on Saturday, 21st, at 8. p.m. But the enemy is busy, not only outside, but inside the camp.

Will Christians, therefore, continue definitely to pray that the Lord's people here may be endued with power, so as to give an effectual witness to the hundreds of thousands who are living wholly "without God" and "without hope?"

A Noble Record.

REV. RICHARD ROSS.

THE subject of this sketch was born at Pirie, near King William's Town, South Africa, about seventy years ago. His father, Rev. John Ross, was one of the first band of missionaries who settled among the Kaffir tribes. For half a century he laboured among them, never once visiting Europe. Those were days of excitement and adventure, and of them the elder Ross had his full share. Twice he saw his house and church burned, and his converts scattered or killed. The enmity and jealousy of chiefs compelled him more than once to change his residence and remove a long distance from the scene of former labours. But nothing daunted his courage or cooled his ardour, and when one door closed he forced open another.

It was in the midst of such scenes and frequent changes that Richard spent his boyhood, and of many of them he still retains a vivid recollection. When not more than six years of age, his parents had to fly for safety. In their hurried flight the waggon was upset, and all their earthly possessions scattered down a mountain gorge.

After the war-cloud lifted and the missionary returned, he had to shoulder axe and saw, and with his own hands rebuild the ruined station. Nor did he neglect his proper missionary work while thus engaged From noon to dusk he laboured with his hands, and in such intervals as he could command gave his two sons the late Dr. Bryce Ross and Richard lessons in reading, grammar, and Latin. The boys got a good ground ing in the elementary branches education, and, what was perhaps better, they acquired an intimate acquaintance with native customs and ways of thought. They imbibed, at the same time, an enthusiasm for missionary work, which in after years made them both famous, Bryce as a Kaffir scholar and Bible translator, Richard as one of the most successful of missionary pioneers and evangelists.

From Pirie, Richard followed his brother Bryce to Edinburgh, where he entered the university, having already made up his mind to follow in his father's footsteps as a missionary to the heathen.

Having completed his studies, Mr. Ross returned to Africa to take charge of the important native congregation at Lovedale. Here missionary works had been carried on for many years, and the foundation of what is now a world-wide institution laid by Rev. M. Govan. But the light was only as a single taper in a midnight city, and the young missionary threw himself with ardour and enthusiasm into the work of evangelising the inert mass of heathenism around him. His success was assured from the first, and many stories are told of heathen men planning vengeance because wives or relatives had adopted "the religion of the Book."

During the first ten years of his missionary work, Mr. Ross journeyed through the district, preaching wherever he went. Small centres were formed where converts met for worship; gradually these grew, and schools were established where the young learned to read. This unlocked all the treasures of the Bible, and many portions of it were made familiar to the heathen population with the old result, that "the Word of God grew and prevailed." While Mr. Ross was in the full tide of happy and successful work at Lovedale, another movement was going on which was destined to change a great portion of Kaffraria, and give a new direction to the mission agencies at work among the people there.

After the cattle-killing mania of 1857, Sir George Grey seized large tracts of land, which were thereafter held as Government reserves. About this time certain of these lands were offered to loyal natives around Lovedale on terms of personal occupation. Of this offer numbers availed themselves, and when it was hinted that the heathen headmen meant to emigrate into the Transkei, and be free from the interference of missionaries and school teachers, there was almost a stampede to the new land of liberty. Mr. Ross resolved to follow them, and after the necessary preparations were made bade a sorrowful farewell to his Lovedale flock. The new sphere afforded splendid opportunities, but the difficulties were great. Even the question of transport was a formidable one; but he was not made of the stuff to hesitate, much less retrace his steps, and so we find him settled at Toleni, a small stream which joins the Great Kei about twenty-five miles from the sea. Compared with his Transkei wanderings, his Lovedale journeys were but pleasure rides. Stations were organized at distances ranging from ten to forty-five miles from Toleni. These were visited regularly, schools were established, evangelists appointed, and services superintended. A second centre was formed at Idutywa, forty-five miles away, and Mr. Ross had the satisfaction of seeing a European missionary settled there.

No sooner was he freed from the care of Idutywa, than he turned his attention to Toboyi, a district of Tembuland nearly fifty miles from his home. This, too, ultimately became a central station, with a large number of converts and a complete organisation under Rev. W. Young.

In East Griqualand, one hundred and fifty miles distant, there lived a small tribe, which Mr. Ross believed could be made a fulcrum for missionary operations among the Pondos. This district he visited several times, and though not very much could be done then, the district was occupied by Rev. M. Macdonald a few years later, at the close of a series of wars; and no fewer than four central stations, with numerous out-stations, have been formed since then.

All this constitutes a noble record of work, done ungrudgingly and with all the enthusiasm of a man who has a message to deliver and who must speak, and, to speak to the largest possible number, must be oft in journeyings and fatigues. It was on his return from one of his East Griqualand journeys that he was suddenly seized with an attack of paralysis. This incapacitated him for three years, but from his sick room he sent encouraging messages to his evangelists, wrote or dictated long letters to his colleagues, and by his patient bearing put to shame many who grumbled at the small discomforts which ever must accompany missionary work on the confines of civilization.

After a prolonged visit to Europe he was able to resume duty, though not with the old energy, and has since then done much to direct and encourage younger men. For the past five years he has had, as colleague minister, his own son, Brownlee Ross, who makes the third generation of Kaffir missionaries in direct line.

One of Mr. Ross' guiding principles was to draw out native liberality. As early as the Lovedale days, he insisted on all the buildings at out stations being erected by the people themselves. But the results of his labours are best seen in the crowds of men and women who, under the influence of his preaching, have discarded the savage life. The crown of a missionary's labours is, when at his quarterly communions, he admits into the church by baptism, converts to the number of twenty, thirty, forty, fifty—and this has frequently been the happy experience of the missionary. In the evening of his days, he can look back and reckon by hundreds—yes, by thousands — those whom he, through God's grace, was privileged to receive out of the old life of heathenism into the new and better way of Christian civilisation.

Thoughts for Parents.

DISCIPLINE.

"Thou shalt consider in thine heart that as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee." (Deut. viii. 5.)

Family discipline has a divine warrant.

1. It must be intelligent. Take pains to understand your children, and you will have less to punish.

2. It must be gentle. Beware of violence, passion and publicity. Do not punish in the presence of others.

3. It must be firm. Love may undermine law. Love and law must be equal factors in child discipline. Moral cowardice hinders many a parent, and makes family discipline feeble that should be firm. Father and mother must be of one mind in the matter.

4. It must be just. It must not be partial; have no pets. Nor prolonged; forgive your children as soon as they repent.

5. It must be given in the spirit of Christ. Let the children know you punish them because you are bound by God's commands to do so. You dare not let them go unrestrained Tell them of Eli and his sons.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

Centenary Hall.

THE gathering at the Centenary Hall on Tuesday was presided over by Mr. Frank Bevan, who, after expressing a fervent hope that by the combined efforts of evangelical episcopalians and the members of the free churches the advances of ritualism might be stayed, urged the duty of prayer to that end.

Dr. Monro Gibson, remarking feelingly on the chairman's references to the evils of sacerdotalism, said that the converted soul joins, not a human organisation, but Christ, and offers, not the mass, but a spiritual sacrifice. The whole of the controversy which agitates the Church moves round the doctrine of priesthood. Under the new covenant there is only one high priest, Jesus Christ. Aaron died and his son succeeded him, and as time went on successor after successor was required in the course of nature, but this Man lives on for ever and needs no successor or substitute.

Tracing the analogy between the children of Israel and the Christian believer, the speaker went on to point out that while Aaron was the high priest, yet the entire nation were participators in a priesthood of privilege, and so, while Jesus is the high priest, the intercessor, all his followers belong to a royal priesthood. Proceeding to define the attributes of that priesthood, Dr. Gibson said they were sacrifice, intercession and benediction. Christ is the great Sacrifice offered for sin, once for all, and therefore, no more sacrifice could be required for that purpose, but the sacrifice we have to offer is—ourselves; "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God that ye present your bodies, a living sacrifice." Subsequent to this personal consecration, we enter into the second privilege—that of intercession—in which we plead with God on behalf of humanity. Then comes the privilege of benediction. It is ours not only to approach God in prayer for men, but to diffuse the blessings of the Gospel in the spirit of faith and earnestness, to turn the world from sin to righteousness, from all false sources of joy to the peace which passeth all understanding.

Commenting on the approaching dawn of the twentieth century, Dr. Gibson said the nineteenth had been a wonderful century for material progress, but spiritual advance had not been commensurate. The attitude we ought to take is that illustrated by the words of the 67th Psalm, "God be merciful to us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us;" not that blessings may be poured upon ourselves merely, but "that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." There is too much selfishness in prayer. We want a new era of intercession which shall bring new blessing. Men are earnest enough in prayer on their own account, but in prayer for others their interest is apt to slacken. It becomes feeble when it is exclusively personal, for "he that saveth his life shall lose it." In conclusion, the speaker pleaded for more whole hearted prayer, which should result in a revival of evangelistic fervour and work.

At the Centenary Hall on Wednesday, Mr. J. H. Tritton indicated the desirability of fervent prayer for the cause of peace and the progress of true religion in the great European nations, and "among our brethren of the United States."

A vigorous address was given by Rev. J. E. Wakerley, on the subject of "National Revival." Quoting several verses from Zechariah viii. as affording a picture of the possibilities of the growth of righteousness in municipal and national life, the speaker said the busy world of trade needed reminding of such a message of hope as this, that the day is coming when commerce shall be held second to godliness. The uppermost subjects in the minds of men are greed of gold and political power, but Christian principles shall yet hold undisputed sway, and "Holiness unto the Lord" be engraved upon the bells of the horses. Tammany and corruption will lose their supremacy, and there will no longer sound the infamous cry, "To the victors belong the spoils."

Quoting the remark of Dr. Dale that "we must seek to lift municipal life to a noble level," Mr. Wakerley insisted that Christians should not, however, sit quietly by waiting for the dawn of a brighter day, but should exert themselves to secure the election of God-fearing men as law makers. In concluding his spirited remarks with a modern paraphrase of Zechariah viii. 21, the speaker pictured the Lord Mayors of Birmingham and Liverpool extending official invitations to one another in the terms "Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of hosts, I will go also," the railway companies gladly granting special rates to civic praying parties (at any rate equal to those afforded to the rascality of racing) and the land being filled with the praise of God. Did any one object that this forecast expressed the impossible, and that such hopes and suggestions were futile? Let any such remember the rebuke to the faithless, "If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes, saith the Lord of hosts?" The speaker closed with fervent prayer that a revival of true religion might speedily result in bringing to pass the reign of righteousness upon the earth.

Mr. M. H. Hodder, who presided on Thursday at the Centenary Hall, suggested that prayer should be offered not only for families and schools, but for universities, and, passing to a consideration of the possibilities of home influence, urged the desirability of a deeper testimony in the family circle. He also gave an interesting account of special drawing room meetings held in a particular district, at which numbers of young people assembled by special invitation listened to the truth.

After the subsequent devotional exercises, Rev. Thos. Charke, of Horbury Congregational Church, gave a terse and helpful address on the formation of character. The tendency of men in the pursuit of wealth, position or fame is to exalt Reason as a God, as did the French revolutionists of '89. Spiritual things are left entirely out of calculation, and it is openly argued that the best way to develop the young mind is to bring it into conditions of good environment, to set before it noble ideals, and to bring about the gradual eradication of hereditary tendencies and all, without any reference to regeneration by the Holy Ghost. Can any one good person make another person good? No; while rejoicing in every good work and influence, if life comes into a dead soul, it can only come one way. If we are to form sound character it must be by conversion and in the spirit of divine energy. Let us be content with nothing short of that in our Sunday Schools.

The loftiest idea in some quarters is that the young require to be "built up" by a course of feeding on the latest phases of criticism. We have to combat that, and to work, not merely for instruction in the Scriptures, necessary as that is, but to speak as men and women with a message from God, desiring to lead the young to Jesus Christ. Mr. Charke concluded a thoughtful and appealing address by calling his hearers to the greater use of that glorious power, transcending all human forces, the power of prayer, possessible alike by the prince among his pageantry, and the peasant working among the clods for his daily crust.

Mr. S. Gurney Sheppard presided on Friday, and petition was made for the Divine blessing upon Gospel testimony throughout the world. A stirring address was delivered by Rev. Sidney J. Jones, minister of the East London Tabernacle, who founded his message on Isaiah ix. 7, where it is recorded in prophecy of the Lord's Anointed "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." In these words was found a motto for the year, a source of confidence and joy. Not only is God committed to this glorious issue, but as the prophet declares it will be Divinely brought about, "the zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." While the full realisation of the promise will come when the Lord shall return in power and glory and establish his kingdom, there is an actual and present truth in the words in their application to the Church of Christ. The one institution that is sure of a future is the Church of Jesus Christ. Not only will the government of Christ never end, but the same holds good of its increase. It is necessary that this truth should grip us to-day.

As we see the sin and unrighteousness of the world, and the evil forces in operation, we are apt to feel that the work of God is hard; but God's work has always been hard, and the world has hitherto been won to God inch by inch. It has always been a dead struggle against the powers of darkness and evil. When we look out on the world we have need also to look up to God, and it is that upward look that will give us courage in our life and testimony.

Let us pray that the year upon which we have entered may witness some surprising outbreak of God's power and glory; that it may surpass 1859; that we may behold much of "the increase of his government." We must not wait for the Church; it is by individuals being revived that the Church will be invigorated. We must put "his government" first in our prayer and labour; we must seek to increase it by going and sending messengers to the uttermost parts of the earth, and by seeking to gather out of the world the ones and twos with whom we come in daily contact. Other things are increasing—the unchristian population, unchristian thought and literature, and unchristian conceptions of life are increasing. May these things help us to see that our part in the world is to labour and pray for "the increase of his government."

Exeter Hall.

There was a goodly gathering on Wednesday at Exeter Hall, when the subject of petition was "Nations and their Rulers." The chair was occupied by Major General Hatt Noble, and an impressive address was delivered by Dr. R. Anderson, C.B. We need, he said, to keep in view two great truths, or systems of truth, that specially bear upon the present dispensation. First, we must recognise that it is not a dispensation of miracles; God does not declare Himself openly and directly, and in a way that compels men to admit that He is aware, so to speak, of what goes on in the world.

THE SILENCE OF GOD

is a great fact, not peculiar to this dispensation, but characteristic of it; although it is clear that when such periods of silence occurred in earlier dispensations God's people felt the fact more keenly. The Psalmist said, "My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, 'Where is thy God?'" Great truths are connected with this silence of God—grace on high, and faith here on earth. In the name of religion, these things have been turned about, and we are told that grace is something poured into us through sacraments and other channels. We need to realise that the Lord Jesus Christ is sitting upon the throne of God; while down here, under the clouds which prevent us from seeing the sun or guiding our course by the stars, we turn to the chart and compass, and find comfort in the assurance that God is with us.

To ignore the fact that God is silent during the present dispensation is to encounter much misunderstanding, and become involved in serious mistakes. The poor Peculiar People—whom I do not confound with "Christian Science," which seems to me to be a form of the demon worship of the last days — act in the face of this very truth, as also do many others who have not the same courage of their convictions. These people want God to declare Himself; but it is not God's way to do this now. It is for us here beneath the clouds to enjoy a God-consciousness in all our circumstances; not to look to God openly to intervene on our behalf, but to own and bless our use of the means at our disposal. With grace in heaven and faith on earth we shall endure, "as seeing Him who is invisible." We must recognise with his people, and not merely have regard to his public acts. In Psalm ciii. 7, we read, "He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel." Moses, who had fellowship with God, knew the Divine ways; the unbelieving people saw the acts, and no more. So the Peculiar People, and others who would not rank with them, strain their eyes to see public acts on the part of God instead of realising fellowship with Him, and going on in the darkness with a confidence such as the presence of God only can give. The Book of Esther, which never names God, is one which, in a remarkable way, brings forward God's work for his people and with them in terrible times. Thus, the second great system of truth that we need ever to keep in mind is that God's power and presence is a reality, although not of such a nature as to compel recognition on the part of unbelievers.

THE PRESENCE AND POWER OF GOD

A STRANGE COINCIDENCE.

The present time has two singular characteristics — an extraordinary revival of religion and a failure to recognise God such as has never previously existed in England, and has seldom been observable in Continental countries. Look at France. During the recent festivals the churches were thronged as had not been the case for years, and military uniforms abounded. A few years ago the army of France was infidel, now it is religious. Along with this, put the fact that the French as a nation seem to have lost all thought of God, and the solemnities that belong to thought of God. It comes then to this, that religion at the end of the nineteenth century is bringing about just the same result as atheism brought at the end of the eighteenth.

Is there nothing akin to this in our own country at the present moment? I am not so happy as many Christians seem to be at the revival of religion that characterises the present time in England. Believing the Word, I hold that Satan is the god of this world; and I believe that religion is the special sphere of his action.

THE REVIVAL OF FORTY YEARS AGO.

A revival of religion, to be a counterpart of that blessed revival from which many of us, myself among the number, date our entrance into the household of God, must be attended by a definite and clear recognition of God. How does this bear upon prayer for nations and their rulers? There has not been, within the memory of any of us, a period in which England has stood out so prominently as now before the nations, as leading the civilisation of the world, and as the greatest power in the world; and competent authorities tell us that there has never been a more brilliant feat of arms than we have been rejoicing over in recent months. Yet has there been from one single platform, from the lips of a single public man, the slightest allusion to God in it all? There never was a time before in the history of England when great blessings did not bring public acknowledgment of God. The day, however, is past, and it seems past for ever.

I am not of a morbid disposition, but it is my conviction that in the days in which we are living God's people will either be drawn more and more into the world by the open door of religion, or more and more into that place of safety which the Lord provides: "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." This may mean isolation; assuredly it is for Christians, while living as strangers here, to see God's face and hear his voice, and to remember God in all their ways.

The subject on Thursday was "Families and Schools," and there was a goodly gathering in the Lower Hall. Mr. W. H. Seagram presided, and an address was delivered by Pastor W. FULLER GOOCH. Having read the last five verses of Psalm cxliv., in which domestic prosperity is classed with other blessings, he dwelt upon God's regard for the families of his people, finding therein much encouragement to earnest prayer. Passing on to notice the dangers besetting young people, arising from the prevalent indifference to religion and present intellectual tendencies, he endeavoured to stimulate his hearers to a diligent discharge of home duties in the matter of training the young in the ways of wisdom, and making their welfare the subject of constant prayer. Coming to the question of direction, he spoke of the influence of the family altar—an institution which is lacking in so many Christian households. Family prayer is calculated not only to win the children to Christ, but also to influence the servants of Christian families. Several friends led in prayer, mainly with reference to the subjects mentioned in the syllabus.

The suggested topics of prayer for Friday's gatherings, outlined under the general head of Foreign Missions, were that no open door of access to Jewish, Heathen, and Mohammedan races may be closed; that the whole world may be open to the Gospel; that God's people may fully esteem opportunity for propagating Christianity as an exceeding privilege; that the evangelisation of the world may be kept in view by all Churches as accordant with the mind of Christ; that in this enterprise believers may attempt great things and expect great things; that wisdom, courage, faith, love, and patience may be multiplied to all missionary directors, workers, and converts.

At Exeter Hall a large company assembled, and the proceedings were notable throughout by deep spirituality and fervency. Mr. R. C. MORGAN, who presided, after reading the subject and briefly commenting, expressed the general feeling that the gathering should be one marked by earnestly beseeching an outpouring of the Spirit, and referred to the importance of propagating Bible truth. The way to cause the work of conversion to flourish was for the Lord's people to "eat the little book" of his Word, and declare its teaching in the power of the Holy Ghost.

Dr. GRITTON, remarking that confession of weakness and the expression of holy confidence in the Messiah's triumph, as expressed in the psalm that had been read, was eminently characteristic of the true missionary spirt. He also commented on Eph. ii. 13 and 18, and observed that as all difference between Jew and Gentile was swept away, and all had access by one Spirit to the Father, so we are guided to the same Father by the same Spirit, made nigh by the same precious blood, and possess the inestimable privilege to work for the evangelising of humanity. The churches are characterised by and in that sure confidence, the mission workers of to-day are content if only the Lord Jesus Christ may see something of the travail of his soul in conversions to his glory. Some of the Lord's divine purposes we know, while others we know not, but we need to realise very keenly that God has given us a proclamation to make in all the authority of his great name, we ourselves living in blessed access to the Father by the Spirit. Let this thought make us more and more courageous, prudent, and humble. We have to go and preach the tidings of redeeming Grace, relying on the promise that He will be with his people, and make the nations hear.

Remarking on the missionary outlook, Dr. Gritton observed that only a short time since it seemed possible to be cognisant of all the missionary enterprises of the churches, but nowadays they have outgrown our knowledge, and the output of missionary literature is enormous. Nevertheless, we can comprehend every effort in our prayers and sympathies. In the breaking-up for Gospel seed of the huge African continent, in great works being accomplished in India, in the arduous and important field of South America, and in places whose names are so new that we have not even learned them, there is vast room for gratitude. Let prayer be offered, that the Church being built up in Christ in all these places may attain to the fulness of God. With a stirring reference to the nobility of spirit and wholeheartedness of prayer to be found in the petitions of Paul, the speaker said that if we could all come to say "Amen" to the prayers of the great apostle, we should ourselves be better fitted to carry on our work. Let us pray more earnestly, let us hope more cheerfully, knowing that our great leader shall not be worsted, but that He shall certainly be the ultimate victor, and we join in the song of his triumph.

Portman Rooms.

Meetings were arranged for here on four evenings of last week by the Evangelical Alliance, when the addresses were specially directed to the elucidation of important fundamental truths. Sir C. Gage Brown presided over a good company on Tuesday, when the address was by Rev. E. G. GANGE, of Regent's Park Chapel, on

THE PRIESTHOOD OF BELIEVERS.

He chose for the basis of his clear and vigorous exposition 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5.—"To whom coming .... ye become a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Priests, said Mr. Gange, are always conspicuous persons in the Word of God, both Old and New Testaments. The first priest was the Family priest. When the Passover was observed in Egypt, the father, as head of the family, gathered the household together, and acted as priest in slaying the lamb and sprinkling its blood on the lintel and doorposts. Long after that, on the anniversary of the Passover feast, he was accustomed to be the officiating priest.

It seems to me that to-day the best possible priesthood would be for the father to act as priest in his own family—to build a family altar, and offer heavenly worship; if every mother would gather her children around her, and tell them the sweet story of Jesus and his love. Then we should need no Sunday schools, or bands of hope, or Bible classes.

But that family priesthood broke down, because very many fathers were not devout. And it would not work to-day; if it were left to the head of the family to be priest in the family you would have thousands of homes without the slightest knowledge of God. After the family priest came the State priest. God chose the tribe of Levi, and set it apart. The Levites were separated from all other callings to minister at the altar, offer sacrifices and present prayers on behalf of the people. That also broke down; the priests became very corrupt men. And you notice that of all the denunciations that came hissing from the lips of the inspired prophets, none were more terrible than those hurled at the heads of the faithless priests who served at God's altar.

THESE MEN BECAME UTTERLY GODLESS;

they lost the sense of God's presence, and were satisfied with mere symbol, rite, and ceremony. They failed to realise that all these ceremonies were designed to be only channels through which their worship might ascend to God. They said in effect, Let the sacrifices be offered, let the altar smoke, let the incense be burned, and we will go and live as we list.

It is the same to-day in many lands. In Paris there are no finer temples than Notre Dame and the Madeleine, from the spectacular standpoint. But except on fête days very few, even of the women, attend. The nation says, "Let the priests do the praying, the singing of the Glorias, and the reciting of the Paternosters; we will go to the theatre and the racecourse and enjoy ourselves." So the nation gets divorced from God.

The State priest broke down, and Jesus Christ came to set up a new order of things altogether. Many of the priests of his day He described as those who could scarcely escape the damnation of hell. He held them up to in his parable of the Good Samaritan. It is impossible for us to build up our systems upon the Jewish model; it is all gone—the temple gone, the sacrifices gone. Christ came and opened for all believers a new and living way to God.

Christ's priesthood was not after the order of Aaron, but of Melchizedek. Aaron offered sacrifices for twelve tribes only. Christ came and offered Himself a sacrifice—the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. Aaron's was a temporary office. Christ's is a perpetual priesthood. I sometimes fear we do not place in the forefront as we ought this glorious truth of the New Testament, the abiding priesthood of Jesus Christ. We rejoice in Him as a Saviour, but forget that He still pleads for us before the throne of God. His very presence there is a perpetual prayer as Charles Wesley sings:—

> Five bleeding wounds He bears,
> Received on Calvary,
> They pour effectual prayers
> They strongly plead for me—
> "Forgive him, oh forgive!" they cry;
> Nor let that ransomed sinner die.

Then comes the Christian priest. "As the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." "I am the Light of the world; ye are the light of the world." If we have come to Christ and are trusting in Him, we become a holy, royal, spiritual priesthood—this is the new order, according to the New Testament. The only way in which we can enter this order is by birth. As an old divine very truly said, "Only He who made the world can make a priest." No teaching at the university, no touch of a bishop's hands, can do it. There must be the touch of the Holy Ghost on a man before he can stand up in Jesus' name and intercede with God for man.

If we belong to this order, and are priests in the New Testament sense, we enjoy nearness to God. We put our hand in the pierced hand of the God-man, and plead his name. We claim, on behalf of the whole communion of saints and brotherhood of believers, this blessed privilege of going, through Jesus Christ, into the presence-chamber of the Eternal God. I hope we all know this experimentally.

The speaker dwelt in his concluding sentences on the duty and privilege of all believers, not only of prayer for ourselves, but for others, especially those most in need of such intercession.

Presiding over Wednesday evening's meeting in Portman Rooms, Mr. J. E. Mathieson read detailed points connected with that day's subject for prayer, "Nations and their Rulers." He explained the purpose of the Evangelical Alliance in the series of addresses being given here—namely, that they should respectively bear, to some extent, upon each day's prayer-theme, and specially upon the crisis through which the Church of England is passing. The spirit of national pride, so common among masses of our people; the insidious advances of Rome in the Establishment; and the progress of unbelief in Nonconformist Churches brought about by the reception of the "Higher Criticism," he specified as causes for continuing in fervent and believing prayer that God may save us, as a people, from falling to the level of other nations where these evils have prevailed.

THE SPIRITUAL CHARACTER OF THE CHURCH

was the topic of discourse by Rev. Gilbert Karney. He quoted the conviction of Dean Close, expressed to him some forty years ago, to the effect that dark clouds on the Church horizon often presage the weaning of the faithful from confidence in political and ecclesiastical organisations. The events which are causing so much anxiety and perplexity are predicted in the Scriptures, which are being wonderfully fulfilled. Is it not true that Babylon the Great, of the Revelation, that dual power of evil, partly political and partly religious, is evidently falling before our very eyes, as evidenced in the condition of the nations—France, Spain, and Italy—with which she is most closely connected? In the events of the past year, we seem to hear the rumbling of our Lord's chariot wheels; while a truly bright spot amid the darkness is the extension of the Gospel throughout the world, and the increased interest in missions, compared with what obtained, in this respect, a century ago.

The visible Church may rise or fall, but the spiritual Church of Christ—something quite distinct from any particular ecclesiastical organisation—is safe in the Saviour's hands. In the divisions of the Tabernacle of old the glorified Church, the Church spiritual, and the Church visible, are all clearly typified. We may enter the "outer court" by an outward rite; but not until, by grace, the believing soul becomes a priest unto God, is there entrance into the "holy of holies," or the Church spiritual. The figures of the Book of Revelation would seem to be designed to teach us that invisibility is a mark of the mystical Church of Christ. The members of that Church are "they whom Thou hast given Me," as Christ says (John xvii.), kept by the Father, sanctified through the truth, united with each other in their Lord, and looking for his appearing in glory.

Sir A. MacKenzie was chairman on Thursday evening, and alluded to the annual week of prayer as one of the most important and significant factors in the yearly history of the Evangelical Alliance. The subject of prayer for "Families and Schools" he described as a matter of individual and national importance; and warmly commended the Alliance for its latest efforts to arouse and inform a people, doubtless soundly Protestant at heart, concerning ritualistic and sacerdotal dangers.

In the address which followed, Rev. C. G. Moore expounded

THE ABIDING GRACE OF THE CROSS OF CHRIST.

While, in its initial stage, this grace brings reconciliation unto God by the death of his Son, there are two or three simple steps by which we come to know its abiding. We are led on to realise that we are saved by Christ's life; and in the third stage, our whole life begins to be filled with the glory of a union between the Cross and the Throne.

Some elements in this abiding grace may be pointed out. With Paul (Gal. ii. 20) we may think of the Cross not only as the means of our standing in grace before God, but as the pathway for us into the very heart of our Saviour. Moreover, the Cross will for ever remain the instrument and the means of all true unworldliness (Gal. iv. 14). Worldliness is a spirit; and we shall need an eternal salvation from that evil, as from every other. The world will even come and kneel with us at the Lord's Table, in its desperate effort to banish the distinction between itself and the disciple of Jesus Christ; but the Cross furnishes the secret of an unworldliness which is absolutely true but infinitely tender. A cold and repulsive attitude toward the world has more of selfishness in it than of Christ. We need so to walk that, while the man of the world feels there is a gulf fixed between him and us even now, yet he shall, somehow, long to be on our side of it.

In 2 Cor. v. 13-14, the Apostle ascribes a trinity of forces to the Cross. It was the dominant factor in his judgment of his fellow-men, as putting every one of them upon redemption ground. He saw also, in the Cross, the ruling purpose of God for mankind. By what means, save the Cross, can we save ourselves or others from living unto self in the degradations, vilenesses, and unworthinesses of the world? Finally, Paul found in the Cross the source of that love which made his life one of diligent and loyal service to his Lord and to men. "I have been crucified with Christ,"—it is a permanent blessing, is this death between us and all that God hates, all that belittles us and unfits us for eternity. The Cross remains the power of it and the secret of it; and as we remain crucified with Christ, conquered, vanquished, won, and swayed by his grace, in some measure our life shall be like his.

On Friday the speaker was Rev. H. J. R. Marston, of Belgrave Chapel, his subject being

"THE HOLY SCRIPTURES AND THE HOLY SUPPER."

There was a good attendance. The chairman, Mr. F. Bevan, in the course of a few preliminary words, said he was afraid that young people nowadays are not so familiar with the Scriptures as those of the last generation. He hardly knew how or why it was so. It was his privilege when in his youth, not only to be taught by a godly father and mother, but by an aunt of his, the author of those delightful books, "Peep of Day" and "Line upon Line." In addressing himself briefly to his allotted topic, Mr. Marston said:

I will found my remarks upon three words used by the Apostle Paul in I. Cor. xv.: "First of all." These words refer to those things upon which the Apostle had laid the first and fundamental stress in his ministry at Corinth. "I delivered unto you —imprimis: en protois— first of all, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried; and that He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures." These were the imprimis of the everlasting Gospel. The personal Christ; the Christ fulfilling a historical mission, in deference to and in harmony with the predictions of the Written Word—these are the first and the second planks in the apostolic platform. Christ and the Scriptures; the Scriptures and Christ—these are the things first of all with the Apostle; first of all with apostolic Christians; and first of all in apostolic Christianity. Perish all Christianities falsely so-called, in which these things are not imprimis.

THEY ARE FOREDOOMED TO FAILURE;

they are not of God; they will not stand the test of truth or the test of time. These alone will abide as the generations pass, and these alone will stand in the judgment of God at the last, which has been founded on the "first of all" of the apostle —the Christ, and the Scriptures which testify of Him.

If I should be asked to answer our chairman's question—why children in the present day are not so interested in the Scriptures as they were in the days when he was a child, I will plainly answer one thing. It is because those who have been entrusted with the education of the highest classes of the day in this land have either silently or overtly disparaged the authority and truth of Holy Scripture. That is the plain fact of the matter; let it not be blinked or blurred out. I have suffered from it myself. I remember perfectly well what I was taught by college tutors; how when I went to college a young Evangelical, but not properly grounded in the Christian apologetics of the orthodox German school, I was at once instructed that the Bible would not stand the test of history, and had been abandoned in Germany, to which alone the final appeal in such matters must be made. It was not until many years afterwards, after I had passed through great anxiety and pain of heart, that I lighted by accident, or rather by the gracious providence of God, upon the writings of Delitzsch and Luthardt. Then I found that in the land of Luther itself two apologists of the Gospel were to be found, as clear, as plain, and as enlightened as in those days when Luther three centuries ago. It is because masters of public schools and college tutors—not all of them —by tacit connivance or by deliberate aspersion, I cannot exactly say which, have questioned and weakened the authority of Scripture in the minds of the young, that children are no longer taught to revere the Book, and to look upon it as they would otherwise look upon it, and as the apostles of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ looked upon it—as Paul, for example, told Timothy that he had been brought up in it from the very days of his babyhood; for that is the force of the passage read by the Chairman.

In order to correct these fundamental evils we must address ourselves, by all manner of lawful means, to maintain the authority of the Scriptures, and to the diffusion of enlightened and believing knowledge of the Word of God among all classes. So I say that the authority of Scripture as inspired truth, as the trustworthy Word of God, is one of the two imprimis of Apostolic Christianity.

"Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." It is said, in one of those audacious sophisms that do an infinity of pernicious mischief in the minds of people who know little, and, alas! think less, that ours is the religion of a man and not the religion of a book. I deny the proposition. Ours is the religion of a book which tells us of the God-man. We may not, we cannot, divide the authority of the Bible from the person of Jesus Christ. We reach Christ through the Bible; and then, again, we reach the Bible through Jesus Christ. The two stand — I may say, fall — together. You will have very little true faith in, or love for, the Lord Jesus Christ left, if you begin to finger, and nibble, and nip, and pare that written word which in the Old Testament announced his coming beforehand, and in the New Testament, in the light of his own illuminating and inspiring Spirit, interprets for all time the meaning and significance of his person and his work to the world, and to the souls of his people. Therefore, let me and earnestness, and with a real sense of the danger which is not only threatening, but at work, to hold fast the inviolable, and indivisible unity of the two imprimis of St. Paul—Christ who died for our sins, and who did so die according to the Scriptures.

I pass on to say a word or two upon another subject—"The Holy Supper," and I make this remark, in the first place, upon it. It is not one of the imprimis of Apostolic Christianity. It is not one of those things to which Paul's mind went back when he was going to write a synopsis of the Gospel which he preached at Corinth. Christ dead, Christ buried, Christ risen, Christ seen, Christ ascended, Christ dispensing grace, reigning and ruling in mercy and power, Christ sending forth his servants and ministers, Christ to come again, Christ to change the body, Christ to be all and in all, Christ delivering up the Kingdom, so that God shall be all and in all —these are the first great matters of which Paul treated. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as the sacrament of baptism, is not one of the first things in Apostolic Christianity. This must be constantly and plainly set forth, in a day when the great Protestant and Prayer-Book order is being reversed, and instead of our being taught the Word and the sacraments, we are being taught the sacraments and the Word. This is making a fatal inversion of the true order, and introducing revolutionary confusion into the very constituent idea of Christianity. It is first the Word—God coming down to you, not you going up to God. It is first the Word revealing Him who cannot be known unless He is graciously pleased to make Himself known. This is the first pillar and pivot of evangelical redemptive religion.

But the ordinances of the Gospel, though not among the first things, are in my humble judgment (and speaking with all respect to those who differ from me on this united platform) among the second things in any true conception of Evangelical life and order. But I pray you observe the order. Adhere, not with a blind and bigoted tenacity, but with a deep and enlightened conviction to the authority, the primacy, the sufficiency,

THE INDISPENSABILITY, OF THE WORD.

That shall rule all things; that shall test and govern the constitution of all the other things in the Evangelical order.

After all, what is the Word of God, unless it is so to our souls; unless we can say as we open the pages of Scripture, "This is God speaking to me?" Speaking, indeed, through such and such a one—through David, or Paul, or Job, or Daniel, or John, or Moses; speaking to others besides me, and speaking directly personally, efficiently to me? Do you realise that when you read your Bible? Do not make the reading of the Word of God a perfunctory performance, a daily task. Seek to make it a realised opportunity for listening to the loving voice, not of the Church, but of the Church's God and King.

And when thou drawest near to the ordinances of God's house, learn that in them you have signs visible of the invisible order, which order is grace. For be it ever known and loudly proclaimed by the servants of God, that there are two orders, not one, in the universe. There is the order of nature, and the order of grace. The meaning and purport therefore of the visible symbols is by Christ's own appointment to testify to the realities of his world of Grace, here amidst the shadows of the world and the things which we see, and touch, and handle. When thou drawest near to the ordinances, look beyond the veil to the eternal realities, and know that the Lord is gracious, dispensing to thee and to all his people, grace in every time of need; mercy, compassion, power, health, holiness, till thou shalt see his face and need no Scripture, no sacrament, in that blissful place where there is no temple nor light of the sun nor moon, for the Lord God is the light of it, and the Lamb illumines it for ever with his blessed presence.

Bath.

We have held eleven meetings in our Guildhall. Canon Quirk presided, and gave the address on "God is Light" at the first one. Most of the evangelical ministers of our city have taken part, and addresses were given on four of the special subjects suggested by the council—two by clergymen and two by Nonconformist ministers. The attendance was fairly good. On the Friday, when prayer was for Foreign Missions, it was very good. G. E. T.

The Gospel in South America.

MR. W. C. COOK, of the Christian Alliance Mission, who has long been buried out of sight in the interior of South America, has at last been heard from, in the midst of the Indian tribes of Brazil. Leaving Goyaz in November, 1897, he journeyed to Leopoldino on the river Araguaya. The route lay through a mountainous country, where ranches were from time to time met with. At one of these the rain came through the roof, nearly filling the hammock in which the weary missionary was sleeping. He found the people anxious to receive the Word of God, and thus seed was sown all along the way.

At Leopoldino Mr. Cook met Chief Sepé and four Cherente Indians, and also the lady from Rio de Janeiro, who goes to teach in their tribe. They all welcomed him gladly, and arranged to accompany him to Santa Maria, a distance of eight hundred miles down the river. On the way, the Caraja Indians were quite friendly. It would be easy to establish a mission station among them. As regards the Cherente Indians, several monks have visited them for some years past, yet Mr. Cook was warmly received, and believes a great work can be accomplished among them.

At Santa Maria, ignorance, vice, and superstition abound, and various false reports were spread about the missionary. Here he visited a monk of great influence, who at the outset declined to discuss "religion," and called Mr. Cook a "beast," "liar," and "minister of hell," finally warning him not to sow any more seed in "his field," as if he did it might happen to him as happened to Protestants in Santa Rita, namely, "They saw the evening, but never saw the morning." The missionary's reply was, "I must obey God rather than man." Notwithstanding this opposition, the Word of God is "running," and an unusually large number of copies have been circulated.

Mr. H. S. Ridings, 31, Carson Road, Dulwich, will be happy to give further particulars of this work.

"Winter."

THE winters in Palestine are not like ours. In the land of the Bible the winter is the time for rain; there is no rain in summer, but about October the winter begins with torrents of rain, and this lasts off and on until March. There is only a little frost sometimes at night, and scarcely any snow in the lowlands, though it is white and beautiful on the mountains. Because of these rains the people cannot do much in winter, and those who are rich have always special houses for summer, which are open and airy, and others for winter where they can have fires. This is mentioned in Amos iii. 15.

If you want a nice story about a king, and how he amused himself in his winter palace, read Jeremiah, ch. xxxvi. Who was it that was walking in the Temple at Jerusalem in Solomon's porch in the winter? See John x. 22. Do you remember too, that it was because the captain would try to continue his voyage in winter, that Paul and all his companions in trouble were shipwrecked (Acts xxvii.)?

The winter was scarcely over at that sad Easter time when Peter denied his loving Saviour, because it says the servants were warming themselves round the fire (John xviii. 18). Oh! it was winter in poor Peter's soul just then. And this leads me to the lesson I do so want you to learn, BE VERY CAREFUL NEVER TO LET WINTER GET INTO YOUR HEART. You know how the cold numbs your fingers and takes all the feeling out of them, and how it cures them if you let the warm sun shine on them. So if you let the coldness of the world, or distrust, or carelessness, or disobedience get into your hearts, it will soon freeze up all the love and joy and kindness that is there, and you will become numb and not feel the precious love of Jesus.

I went into a room one bright sunny morning and it was so dark and cold. Why? Because the shutters were all closed. So we unfastened the shutters and opened them wide, and in poured the beautiful bright sunshine. Dear young friends, if you feel cold and unhappy inside, perhaps you have some shutters round your hearts; shutters of sin that you have allowed to shut out all the brightness of Jesus. He is the Sun of Righteousness; open out your hearts to Him, and his warm rays will soon drive the winter out of your souls (Malachi iv. 2.).

Just one more cure for cold hearts and cold feelings—that is, WORK. People who work hard don't feel the cold. So if you would keep your heart warm and full of love to Jesus, work for Him. Oh, there is so much work to be done for Him. So many little folks this wintertime are cold and hungry, and we can each find something to do to help them. So many little hearts are cold and sad, and a smile or a kind word will warm them up. So many are sick and suffering, and even the least child can show little kindnesses. Try, dear young people, and keep winter outside your own souls, by working to warm up some one else. E. J. BANKS.

"Ye Serve the Lord Christ."

GLADLY would I serve Thee, Lord,
Through the coming year;
In thy service and thy Word,
Find Thee always near.

By thy Spirit guide me, Lord,
Show me what to do;
That my every act and word,
May be service true.

Let me be thy servant, Lord,
Glad to do thy will.
Make my will with thine accord,
Keep me faithful still.

Personal.

I am glad to see many fresh names this week and warmly welcome all to my already large circle of "nephews" and "nieces."

G. DRAYSON.—Please give your Christian name to avoid confusion. You need not write the questions but number the answers accordingly.

MAGGIE BOGUE.—It is necessary to write out the answers as well as give the chapter and verse.

WINNIE PAGE.—Accept my deep sympathy in your loss.

MILLICENT M. CRAVEN.—I never heard whether your second certificate reached you safely.

WILLIE HOOPER.—Thank you for your letter. I am very glad you are joining the Searcher. Only give the answer to the question, and do not write out the whole verse unless it is necessary.

CYRIL HILLS.—It is necessary to get nine ordinary Bible Searchers correct before you may enter for the Quarterly Prize Competition. If you start at once you may be able to enter for the next competition at the end of March.

Slavery in Zanzibar.—The committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have addressed a memorial to Lord Salisbury in which they express their regret at the slow progress made in carrying out the Abolition Decree of 1897 in the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. It is the opinion of the committee that the Decree is too much hampered by clauses imposing formalities and obstacles in the way of the slaves desiring to obtain their freedom. They further regret that the Decree is mainly administered by local native officials, in whom, being themselves slaveholders, little confidence can be placed. They urge that British officials of special experience should be appointed to watch the conduct of cases, and that the old traditional British policy of freeing slaves should be fearlessly carried out.

Waifs at Dinner.

AT Christmastide, for the past twenty-four years, Dr. Barnardo has called together at the Edinborough Castle two thousand of the dirtiest and most neglected of the children that the Metropolis can produce. Early in the year the net was thrown by skilful and practised hands, and it encircled among others tiny newspaper and match sellers and shoeblacks. It also swept in a portion of that ragged brigade that infest the slums and are the heart-break of the School Board officer. The heaviest of the haul was made up of children whose only associations of "home" cluster round the fire of a common lodging-house, or, worse still, a one or a two-roomed house.

The assembly is, indeed, a grimy multitude; where to match it it would be hard to say. The absence of a clean face or a tidy dress makes one doubt their nationality.

It would not be fair to the little folk, however, to inspect them personally until the edge of their appetite has been somewhat dulled. That this operation was generously performed it is needless to say. It is not altogether by chance that many of the willing-handed helpers are composed of healthy lads in white sailor jackets. These are Barnardo boys in the process of making, and surely their nice appearance should be sufficient to tempt any homeless boy to throw in his lot with them.

Now we may venture a personal interview. Here is a girl of fourteen, with a little three-year-old in her care. "School?" "No, I sells rabbits." Here is a row of six small morsels, who confess their home is in "Flowery-Dean" Street. A girl of thirteen owns to the third standard of education, but, poor lass, she could not be classed in any standard for cleanliness. And she is no worse than her neighbours.

There they sit, grimy and not ashamed! Well is it for England that Dr. Barnardo should gather such a mass meeting of England's shame, that it may appeal for that chance that every child should have. But there is an improvement. The meetings of a dozen years ago presented conditions that have now disappeared. The children are healthier and better clad. And the harvest of waifs is not quite so plentiful.

We may not take time to tell of the entertainment that followed. The appeal that Dr. Barnado was commissioned to make fell upon open ears. "Come to me and I will do my best for you. Let me know what you would like. To go to sea, to learn a trade, or to be trained for a farmer's life under the British flag in Canada. Come and learn of earthly care and heavenly love. Come and let me help you to make the most of your lives for this world and the next." So he spoke in firm voice and quiet tone to the listening throng; his aim to secure sons-in-love and daughters-in-love to the Christian Church, by whose gifts he has been enabled these many years to keep his doors wide open. The Strangeways Institutions.

SUNDAY, January 1, was observed as the twenty-ninth anniversary of the Strangeways Institutions, Manchester, for Homeless, Destitute, and Suffering Children. Thousands of the poorest children have been rescued and saved since the opening of the first refuge in 1870, and the work with its eighteen branches, which provide for nearly five hundred children, is as active as at any former period. Around the Central Institution and Conference Hall, Strangeways, has grown up a number of agencies, such as "Deepening of Spiritual Life Conventions," "Missionary Days," "Prison Gate Missions," "Police Court Missions," &c.

The anniversary was observed by two special services. In the afternoon, at the Bethesda Home, the address was given by Prebendary MacDonald, Rector of Kersal. In the evening, at the Conference Hall, Strangeways, the address was by Mr. Leonard K. Shaw, hon. sec. to the institutions. The gospel was faithfully proclaimed on both occasions to crowded gatherings.

Work Among Theatrical Employees.—Mr. Wm. Forbes has visited Cardiff, and addressed meetings in the lecture-hall of the Y.W.C.A., Charles Street, on his work. Alderman R. Cory presided. After thirty years' experience, Mr. Forbes says, to the credit of the ballet girls, that he has rarely seen an actress intoxicated. A tea "to ladies of the ballet and chorus ladies," in Cardiff was attended by about twenty girls, and these teas will be carried on by ladies who are interested after the evangelist has left.

A Glasgow Campaign.

AT the last meeting of the Glasgow Free Church Presbytery Lord Overtoun, who headed a deputation from the United Evangelistic Association, indicated that the Association had thought it would be wise to take some steps, not only to mark their thankfulness to God for what He had done during the twenty-five years since the revival that followed Mr. Moody's visit in 1874, but also to inaugurate, not exactly a demonstration, but a great evangelistic campaign in the city.

Arrangements were not yet complete, but it was proposed to have an "all day meeting" on February 20, at which meeting they would consider such matters as the growth of the city, the city's needs, the work of the Association, and the possibilities of the future. The main proposal was that somewhere about October they should commence a great winter evangelistic campaign in Glasgow, to end about the month of March in the year following, thus covering the whole winter. The city would be divided into nine sections, three of the sections being worked at a time. They would begin with special meetings for children, and these would be followed by meetings for adults. The object of the deputation was to invite the Presbytery to appoint two or three of their number to act along with other Presbyteries as a special committee to forward this movement.

Dr. Ross Taylor said the Presbytery looked with no jealousy or suspicion on the work carried on by the Association. On the contrary, they welcomed their efforts, and rejoiced that they had been the means of doing so much good in the city. Every earnest man amongst them must gladly welcome any suggestion or any plan that had in it the promise of extending the Kingdom of God throughout the city.

Oxford Letter.

[By Our Own Correspondent.]

THE spiritual needs of Oxford were discussed at a meeting of clergy recently, and some plain words were spoken. The Rural Dean emphasised among other hindrances to the work of the Church in the city the excessive number of public-houses, the disregard of the Sabbath, the college servants' Sunday, and the growing separation of the richer and poorer classes.

A service for men has been commenced at St. Aldate's on Sunday afternoon. Last Sunday ninety-one men were present. Twelve or more followed the curate and Captain Shepherd from the public-house to church, all the public-houses in the district having been visited prior to the service. There is a felt need for a service of this kind, where plain talks to men can be given on subjects which lie near their hearts. A plain Gospel is preached; but an appeal is made to reason as well as to conscience. The first Sunday afternoon in the month is to be devoted to Christian evidence, when popular objections to Christian truth will be discussed.

The Y.M.C.A.

The Association at Omagh, Ireland, has engaged the services of a whole-time general secretary.

Rev. W. Hay Aitken will conduct a special mission in connection with the Bristol Y.M.C.A. from January 28 to February 13.

The new Association at Great Harwood, Lancs., has now sixty-five members. Central premises, formerly the post-office, have been secured.

The annual breakfast meeting of the Liverpool Association was held on Monday, January 2, when the treasurer, Mr. A. Guthrie, presided over a large and representative gathering.

The London Central Association has appointed M. Emile Marcault secretary of the French section, which has been successfully carried on at Exeter Hall for many years. M. Marcault will labour in the interests of young Frenchmen in London, meeting them as he is advised of their arrival here, helping them in the matters of employment and lodgings, and arranging meeting and other engagements in their behalf.

The members of the Coventry Y.M.C.A. Bible Class recently entertained one hundred poor young men to tea, the proceedings being very hearty. The Mayor and Mayoress of the city (Dr. and Mrs. Webb-Fowler) held a reception at the Guildhall on the following evening for the members and friends of the Association. Upwards of one thousand guests were present. The Mayor, in response to a vote of thanks, said he was convinced the Y.M.C.A. was doing a great and much needed work in the city. The general secretary stated that the membership was nearly six hundred.

International S.S. Lessons.

January 22.

"Christ and Nicodemus."—John iii. 1-16.

Golden Text.—"For God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16.

Nicodemus (1).

THE Pharisees were the loftiest of the Jewish sects; nearest the truth in point of belief. Paul belonged to this sect. Nicodemus was a member of the National Council, and therefore must have been well educated. He afterwards became a disciple of Jesus. (John vii., 50; xix, 39).

Nicodemus came by Night (1,2).

This was physical night. He may have been ashamed to come by day, or he may have thought this was the best time for a quiet talk with the busy Teacher.

Men usually come to Jesus in the night. When the sun of health and prosperity is shining they do not feel their need of Him, but when darkness comes on (sickness, failure, sin), they are afraid of these things and they creep under the protection of the great Friend.

Jesus is always ready to receive. "Call upon me in the day of trouble." All are glad to see us in the day of joy—God tells us to call "in the day of trouble."

We Know Thou art from God (2).

Nicodemus believed because of the miracles. This was in accord with Jewish history. They were always seeking after signs and wonders. We must exercise a larger faith. We believe because we have felt God's power and grace in our lives—comforting, strengthening, inspiring, rebuking.

The New Birth (3-7).

Every kingdom is entered into by the exercise of some faculty. We enter into the spiritual kingdom by the use of a new faculty which is born within us. The faculty is born of God; therefore it is spirit. The spiritual part of our nature comes from God, and those who possess it have everlasting life.

The Mystery of the Spirit (8).

The incoming of this Spirit we do not understand. It is like the wind, invisible and uncontrollable. No one can say by what means the Spirit of God comes to him.

What we do not comprehend, we can use: Beware of rejecting a truth or a fact because too deep for us to understand.

Illustrations:—

(2.) The blind mole who refused to believe in the existence of the sun because he had never seen it.

Things Earthly and Things Heavenly (12).

(1.) Things earthly—things which come within the range of our experience, like the new birth. Every man knows for himself whether he is born of the Spirit of God, and others may know it by his conduct and speech.

(2.) Things heavenly—things which do not come within the range of our experience—things for which the earth provides us with no similar—such as the Love of God. We could never know of that great love had it not been revealed to us.

Believing in Him (15).

What is meant by believing in Christ? It comprises the following points, at least:—

(3.) Taking Him as the One who can and will supply us with the needful strength to live up to that ideal.

Belief is a daily experience, and we are brought into touch with Christ by means of prayer.

The Shoreless Ocean (16).

God's love is infinite—we are finite. Therefore we cannot expect to measure or fathom it; but we can bathe and be made clean in this ocean.

Teacher should emphasise the following points:—(1.) God loved the world in its sin. (2.) His is a love of benevolence—a desire to do us good. (3.) Christ's coming into the world was a manifestation of God's love. Because the Spirit of the Father was in the Son; and what the Son suffered, the Father suffered too.

Work in Kennington.

FOR four years a good and growing work among the masses has been carried on in Kennington, with St. James' Hall, Royal Road, as a centre. The mission has been designated the "King's Own," by way of contradistinction, we suppose, to the fact that in former days the place was, in the outcome of its evil influence, "The Devil's Own." Mr. O. L. Heatley has been the enthusiastic superintendent, and he has been well supported by a band of earnest helpers and visitors. A warm and generous friend of the work has been found in Mr. Wm. Green, of Bickley, without whose backing the mission could not have attained its present efficiency and development. It may be remembered that recently the lease of the hall in Royal Road was secured, so as to prevent its future alienation for secular purposes.

The annual meeting of the mission was held on Monday evening; the hall looked bright and inviting with its Christmas decorations still adorning the interior. A number of friends met for tea and conversation early in the evening, when Mr. and Mrs. J. H. TRITTON acted as kind hosts. Later, the meeting took place, with Mr. Tritton in the chair.

The Superintendent, Mr. Heatley, had a very encouraging tale of progress to tell about the year that has gone. He said they could praise God for homes transformed, lives changed, and souls saved. He maintained that no district of London is more spiritually destitute than Kennington, taking into consideration its dense population. A large work of family visitation is kept up, some 800 visits being paid weekly, besides those specially dealing with the young. Mr. Heatley said that during the year £500 had been expended on the work, but they could spend £1,000 a year wisely and well. He also invited the help of lady visitors with a day or half a day's leisure a week.

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN is not a treasurer of the conventional order, who simply reads out a more or less complicated array of figures from a balance sheet. He candidly told the mission folks that on the year's transaction they were in debt to him over £80, and he hoped they would at once pay up. He would not be content till those who share in the benefits of the mission contributed at least £250 a year to its funds. That is not too much to ask. He also reminded the company that on the trust account for the purchase of the hall a balance of £850 is also due to him. Meantime this charge remains without interest, and he hoped it would in due time be wiped off with the kind help of their rich friends in the City. It is a privilege to any mission work to have such a thoroughgoing friend and patient treasurer as Mr. Green.

The addresses of the evening were all pitched in a key of encouragement and hope. Pastor FULLER GOOCH said he did not think that South London, with its pressing spiritual needs, had as yet received its fair share of attention and help. He rejoiced, therefore, on the good influences that are going out from the King's Own Mission. He went on to refer to the current and increasing expectation of Revival, and gave some interesting recollections of '59, the year in which he was converted and began to work in the neighbourhood of Norwich for God and the salvation of his fellows. If we are to experience a fresh manifestation of God's power on a wide scale it must begin by a return to God on the part of Christians themselves by the power of the Holy Ghost. We must get into close touch with God if our work is to tell effectually on dark and sinful neighbourhoods such as Kennington largely is.

Some helpful words followed from Rev. R. G. FORDE, who encouraged the workers in dealing with tough cases by a semi-humorous incident in his own experience. As a military chaplain he had to visit a soldier in Brixton Prison, who was serving a term for the theft of a pair of boots. When a previous chaplain saw the man he tried to convince his visitor that he had not stolen the boots, that the boots had not been stolen at all, that it was a friend of his who stole them, and finally that the stolen articles were not boots! A letter to this effect was sent to the colonel of the regiment, and that officer replied that the stolen boots had been found on the man's feet. Mr. Forde conversed earnestly with the prisoner, but he seemed very hardened, and little hope was entertained of any change in him. However, a letter has come from him in a distant land, whither he had been drafted after release, to the effect that for a time he had gone from bad to worse with drink and gambling, but now, after being laid on a bed of sickness, God had pardoned him and saved him from all sin, and he was rejoicing in his new found Saviour.

The Chairman added some hearty words of benediction on the work and the workers. During the evening Mrs. Gibbs (so well known as Miss Ada Rose) sang two solos most sweetly and effectively. We wish all Gospel singers would imitate Mrs. Gibbs in her clear enunciation of the words that are sung. An interesting item of the programme was a "Bible Chain," in which a number of boys sitting in the gallery consecutively and without pause repeated texts of Scripture, each succeeding text having to commence with the first letter of the last word in the previous text. Mr. Heatley remarked that four years ago he could not get a single text out of these lads; now they can go on at it, and do a good bit of overtime.

Temperance Notes.

AN important Temperance Mission will be held in the Guildford, Godalming, and Woking Deaneries, from January 29 until February 6.

* * * * *

REV. JOHN THORNLEY, of Sheffield, the veteran secretary of the Free Methodist Temperance League, regards the past year as a most encouraging one in connection with his own denomination. He reports revived interest, and says that in several cases "Temperance Sunday" was followed by real temperance work which has already borne much practical fruit.

* * * * *

ALCOHOL is one of the most insidious of drugs. It soothes and lulls, not because it is giving rest and refreshment, but because it is paralysing nerve centres, and therefore the drinker is the one most unable to say whether it is doing him good or harm. It is as a rule only when much harm is done, and the mischief is irreparable, that the drinker realises what alcohol is doing for him.

* * * * *

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT has received a letter, signed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, on behalf of the United Kingdom Alliance, dwelling upon his services to the cause of local option, and expressing a hope that the friends of that project may benefit by his counsels and follow his lead in the fight, "which cannot be staved off much longer," against the bitter thraldom of the liquor traffic.

* * * * *

A FORTNIGHT'S Gospel temperance mission was commenced in Manchester on Saturday by Rev. L. M. Isitt, from New Zealand. Whilst expressing thankfulness for the progress which temperance principles were making in many sections of the Christian church, Mr. Isitt urged that if only the churches could be roused to a sense of the magnitude of the evil, and of the hindrances which it placed in the way of the spread of Christian work, the power of the liquor traffic could be overthrown within a short period. He quoted an assertion of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's to the effect that strong drink was impairing the health, impoverishing the fortunes, and destroying the lives of at least one in every twenty of the inhabitants of Great Britain. This admission, said Mr. Isitt, meant that there were two million persons in this kingdom who were blighted, maimed, and injured by the drink traffic.

* * * * *

THE New Year festivities in the Highlands, appear, according to the Northern Weekly, to have been characterised by more pronounced marks of drunkenness, more juveniles. How and where, our contemporary asks, do the very young—say under fourteen years of age—get their drink, and why do not the magistrates of our Northern burghs "recommend," and even enforce, the closing of dram shops on New Year's Day—such as has been done with so much benefit to drink-consumer and drink-seller in Dundee, for example? Speaking on the Gothenburg system, Mr. Joseph Malins recently remarked: "Thirty-three years had passed since that system was started, and there had been a reduction in the consumption of ardent spirit, though not so large as in the preceding thirty years under rural Local Veto; and, on the other hand, there was an increase of 500 per cent. of beer drinking. Liverpool was about five times as large as Gothenburg, yet the convictions were only 4,800, as against 4,000 in Gothenburg. An the Times correspondent had rightly said, Gothenburg was a very drunken town.

Obituary.

R. B. SHERRING.

THERE fell asleep at Clifton, January 2, at the age of seventy-one, Mr. R. B. Sherring. He was a great friend and companion of young men, a supporter of the Y.M.C.A., a devout student of the Original Scriptures, a firm adherent of the old theology, and large-hearted in his sympathies. His public reading of the Scriptures was so remarkable for its pathos, emphasis, and reverence, that it never failed to impress. He suffered much in health in later years. He was much beloved and esteemed, and will be greatly missed.

CAPT. W. E. SMITH.

Some time ago we chronicled the retirement from the secretaryship of the Evangelisation Society of Capt. W. E. Smith, after a long term of valued service in that capacity. He has not long enjoyed his release from active public work, for we have now, with sorrow, to record his decease on Tuesday last week. He was interred at Weston-super-Mare, aged 76. The work which Capt. Smith accomplished in connection with the management of the Evangelisation Society was largely hidden from public view, but it was in many ways most valuable. He had very strong and decided views as to what the Gospel is, and as to the preaching of it. He insisted on the great fundamental points on faith being expounded on every occasion, and though the plan might sometimes be embarrassing to the preacher, it had the advantage of leaving the hearer without excuse as to the terms of salvation. Capt. Smith gave his very best to the work, and his monument will be found to-day in the acceptance given everywhere to the preachers of the Society he superintended. Before becoming hon. sec. of the Evangelisation Society, Captain Smith was Instructor of Musketry to the Royal Sherwood Foresters (Militia), and on the staff of the School of Musketry, Hythe.

REV. JAMES MORRISON.

Rev. James Morrison, senior pastor of the Free Church, Urquhart, died at his residence, Academy Street, Elgin, on Saturday week. He celebrated his ministerial jubilee four years ago, when he was in his seventy-eighth year, and had since that time resided in Elgin. The increasing infirmities of old age had confined him to the house for some considerable time, debarring him from taking any active part in public life, in which he had figured so conspicuously in the county for many long years. Mr. Morrison went direct from the parish school to the university. At the close of his studies he was chosen as missionary in the parish of Denny, in Stirlingshire, where he remained until the disruption in 1843, when he joined the Free Church. Immediately after the disruption he went north, and helped to organise the Free Church congregation at Edinkillie and Dallas. He went to Urquhart, which was then a preaching station under the Presbytery of Elgin, in August of the same year. His work was so successful that the station was sanctioned as a regular ministerial charge; and he was chosen and ordained to the pastorate of it on April 18, 1841.

Mr. Morrison took an active part in the deep religious movements with which the country and district have been favoured; and his services were much sought in connection with them, not only in Elgin and its neighbourhood, but throughout the whole country. The season of greatest blessing in his own congregation were in the years 1861 and 1874, and its character has been largely affected by them. The deep, evangelical tone of Mr. Morrison's own ministry was intensified by his contact with these religious movements. There entered into his discourses such a ripeness of experience, coupled with a ripeness of scholarship, spiritual insight, and sympathy with the inward struggles through which those who were anxious, as well as those who were striving after a higher spiritual life, passed, that they were highly prized wherever he preached at communion and other seasons. Mr. Morrison was very highly esteemed by his own congregation, both as a preacher and a pastor.

The Pastors' College Evening Classes will be resumed on Tuesday, January 17, when new students of all denominations are invited to join. These classes are free, and will be found very helpful to Christian workers and those who are thinking of entering the ministry. Particulars of the Secretary, Mr. G. HALL, Pastors' College, Temple Street, Nowington, S.E.

Evangelistic.

MR. F. Scheveira has been preaching at Havana and different towns in Cuba.

Mr. Frank L. Smith, who preached in England two or three years ago, is now holding meetings in Porto Rico, and has been greatly cheered in his work.

Mr. H. Stafford Smith, of the Evangelisation Society, who has completed his second missions at Alvediston and Stour Row, is at Broadchalke until January 22.

The Japan Gazette reports in very cordial terms the Gospel and other services held in November last by Mr. and Mrs. George C. Needham, in Yokohama.

Mr. Goudie has conducted an interesting ten days' mission in the Baptist Chapel, Stondon, near Hitchin. Every night large congregations assembled. A good work of grace has been accomplished. Many who were impressed were dealt with in the inquiry-room, and it is believed are now rejoicing in the Saviour.

Mr. Henry Varley lately concluded a visit to Paterson, N.J., during which he spoke forty times, either in Bible Reading or Gospel address. At the close of the mission he was warmly thanked by local brethren for the service he had rendered, and for the good which he had been instrumental in accomplishing.

Mr. Chas. Inglis has been preaching in Sing Sing night after night, with manifest encouragement. He is now in Chicago, and seeing much blessing in preaching in Mr. Moody's church and in the Chicago prison. He is to give Bible lectures to Mr. Moody's students for three weeks, and will afterwards leave for the Eastern States.

Rev. W. Hay Aitken is at present conducting a mission at St. John's, Highbury, where he preached to a crowded congregation last Sunday evening, his subject being the destruction of the works of the devil by the manifestation of the Son of God. St. John's is easily reached by various lines of omnibuses to Highbury Barn. The mission will be continued throughout next week.

Mr. George Nokes held a Gospel Temperance mission in Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall during December. The meetings were about up to the average for the week nights; on Sundays the hall was filled. Master Percy Kahn sang with great power on Sunday nights, and the month's work was not without blessing. A very large number signed the Temperance pledge.

The fourteenth year of service at the Stratford Conference Hall has been concluded, and the workers rejoice to see so many signs of blessing. The congregations are still very large; on Sunday evenings there generally are between 1,500 and 1,800 people, and in the afternoons about 500. Mr. Butlin's young men's Bible-class is attended at present by about 150 young fellows. The work amongst young women has also greatly prospered, and their jubilee building has been much appreciated. About 130 meet together on Tuesday evenings for a Bible reading. About forty meetings are held each week.

During the past week, at the Wickhambrook Congregational Mission Chapel, Gospel services have been conducted by the pastor's wife, Mrs. A. Butcher. The interest of the people was aroused from the beginning, and good congregations assembled nightly listening to the message of God's love and salvation. At the close of the services those who felt their need of further help have remained for conversation, direction, and prayer. The workers have been not a little cheered at the spiritual good resulting. Men and women are rejoicing in their new-found joy. Parents are full of praise and thanksgiving at "what God hath wrought." A mission by Rev. Henry Montgomery, Belfast, was commenced on Thursday afternoon, in the Christian Union Building, Abbey Street, Dublin. The weather proved very unfavourable, but there was a large attendance. The large hall has been lately renovated. A number of Christian workers of different denominations were present ready to help in the singing and in dealing with anxious souls at the after-meetings. At the evening meeting, Mr. Montgomery referred, in a very touching manner, to the great loss sustained in Belfast by the death of Dr. H. M. Williamson. A special feature of the service was the singing of solos by Miss Montgomery, who is gifted with a very fine voice. An after-meeting was held, when an opportunity was afforded for personal dealing with those desirous of coming to the Saviour. The meetings will be continued during the present week.

Albury, in Surrey, is the Mecca of Irvingism. There is the "apostles'" chapel; there a colony of believers gathers round it; and there still lives the last survivor of the Irvingite "apostles"—Mr. Francis Valentine Woodhouse, who is now the father of the Bar as well as the last of the "apostles."

The new issue of the "Medical Directory" reveals an extraordinary decline in the number of young men who joined the medical profession in the course of last year. It contains the names of 34,994, or an increase of only 91 in comparison with 1898. In the latter year the increase was 619, in 1897 it was 958, and, in 1896, 730.

Through the financial stoppage of Pattisons, Ltd., a crisis has occurred in the whisky trade in Scotland. We are glad to note the statement in a daily paper that:—"For some time investors will consider carefully before taking shares in liquor companies. It is very probable also that there will be a fall in the value of licensed property."

A young Englishman, Mr. A. B. Lloyd, has reached home after a remarkable journey in Central Africa, including the great pigmy forest mentioned by Mr. H. M. Stanley. Mr. Lloyd had no difficulty with the natives and never fired a shot in self-defence. In an interview with a press representative he spoke of King Kasagama, of Toro, as a thoroughly reliable and indeed exemplary man. Baptised by Bishop Tucker in 1896, he has since lived a thoroughly consistent Christian life.

Requests for Prayer.

THAT the Lord may send a godly man to preach the Gospel among the Italians of Tunis, North Africa.

For blessing on Mission at Kilcadden, Co. Donegal, conducted by Mr. W. Cowden, Belfast.

For God's grace to be richly outpoured on the speakers and the people during a mission to be held by Rev. Herbert and Mrs. Wood, of Liverpool, at Shieldmuir, N.B., from January 14 to January 30.

That special meetings to be held in Broxburn, N.B., during January and February, may be much blessed.

For blessing on a fortnight's mission at Bathgate, N.B., commencing January 15, to be conducted by Mr. C. H. Judd, late of China.

For blessing on a mission to be conducted by Mr. George Clarke, at Ipswich, January 15 to 30.

For blessing on a mission to children at Walford Hall, Stoke Newington, January 15 to 22, to be conducted by Mr. C. Dudley Smith.

For abundant blessing on a four days' mission at Kingsland Mission Hall, Castle Street, Kingsland.

For blessing on efforts made to win postal employés for Christ in connection with the Postal and Telegraph Christian Association, especially during the week set apart for prayer on their behalf, January 22 to 29.

For blessing on gospel services at Walkerburn, by Mr. James Walker.

For blessing on a ten days' mission in the Congregational Church, Castleford, commencing Sunday, January 15, conducted by Miss North.

For a mission this week at Bristol conducted by Mr. William Forbes.

Protestantism in France. — A series of lectures for the affirmation of Protestant principles have been arranged for delivery during this month and next in the Chapelle Taitbout, Rue de Provence, Paris. Great and many are the misunderstandings of the French people regarding Protestantism, and these addresses, by Pasteurs Messines, Th. Monod, and J. Pfender, also Dean Aug. Sabatier, are designed for the instruction of outsiders rather than adherents of the Reformed Church.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

WE again call attention to the Ten Weeks' Bible School which Professor W. W. White is opening this week in various centres of London. From an account on page 16 of a specimen lesson given last week, readers may form some idea of the method of instruction followed by the distinguished teacher. The School undertaking has long engaged the earnest prayer of workers in and around London, and it is to be hoped that great good will result from the lessons. Christian people who labour among the young, or who carry on mission work in quiet, unobtrusive ways, will find much assistance in the School. The design is to enable students to do more with the Book, to understand it better, and to use it with increased facility. Greater power in using the "Hammer," and more dexterity in handling the "Sword of the Spirit," may have more to do with the coming Revival than some of us dream. Let us apply ourselves to the Scriptures, and then assuredly we shall be better able to apply the Scriptures to ourselves.

New operations may bring on the Revival; assuredly the Revival will introduce new operations. That there is much to be done has been made clear in various articles in the Homiletic Review on "The Twentieth Century's Urgent Call." In the current issue there are notes on some obstacles to progress; and these include defective preaching, a failure to understand the law of Christian stewardship and giving, and neglect on the part of ministers to rouse the general membership of the churches to a sense of personal responsibility in the service of Christ. Another obstacle is found in the limited use of the capital invested in church property and appliances.

Here is a typical church edifice, erected at great outlay. There are three services of all kinds in it on Sunday, calling for its use for four or five hours, and reaching at most a few hundred people; the rest of the hours of Sunday are lost, and it stands closed and darkened and useless through the other six days of the week, carrying unconsciously to the hearts of the people the lesson that business is at least twelve times as important as religion. What an enormous waste and loss of the Lord's property!

Revival will set these sad facts in a new light, and supply answers to the question of how to remedy the failures which we all deplore so much.

The history of the Church since Pentecost has been a chequered record of the struggle of human institutionalism with the Divine idea. The frequent decay of religion during the Christian centuries has always followed on the usurpation by earthly priests of the function the one great High Priest in Heaven. And every fresh revival of spiritual life has been the fruit of a re-discovery of the immediate presence of the Risen Christ in the soul of the individual believer, and in the purified Church. This, and not the claim of the laity to have a share in the organisation and affairs of the Church, as Froude was ever asserting, was the pulse of the great Reformation.

This, too, was the source of power in the Puritan revival; in the great Evangelical revival at the end of the last century; in the work of Messrs. Moody and Sankey; and in the Salvation Army. This is the vital truth we should jealously guard from obscuration in these days of recrudescent Ritualism and priestcraft. In fighting this evil we are contending for that which gives the Christian faith its central significance and power.

An important question is raised by a correspondent (p. 20) as to evangelising on Sunday mornings. When earnest souls undertake such effort they are generally rebuked by someone for "neglecting the means of grace" themselves, in not attending their own place of worship. That side of duty must be considered, of course. But we have an idea that many Christians are "weak and sickly, and many sleep" for want of some active service. Why should not a group of church members take it in turns to go out two by two (or more, in proportion to their numbers) and work on the lines referred to by our correspondent? This would disarm the criticism, and stimulate the spiritual life of themselves and their church. They who would be "steadfast, immovable," must "abound in the work of the Lord."

An endeavour to reach men who go to no place of worship on Sunday morning was, as reported at the time, a feature of Mr. Leonard Weaver's tent work at Tottenham a month or two ago. Since then time has been afforded to learn of definite results. Here are some, as described by another correspondent:—

A child said: "Home is so different since father came to Christ."

A thief who stole a gold watch at one of the meetings was so touched by the message delivered that he sent a letter to Mr. Weaver stating where the watch might be found, he having placed it in a field close to the tent.

Whole families before divided are now bound closely together by the bond of Christian love.

"Hard to reach" these men may be; yet not so hard as would often appear. Who can tell the yearning of the heart for a better life that may exist under even the roughest and most unpromising exterior?

Our second correspondent adds:—

On December 27 the great gale removed the canvas roofing of the tent, and inflicted damage to the extent of about £150. It would be a tremendous pity if Mr. Weaver were hindered from carrying on his good work in other districts through lack of financial support. Those who attended the last meeting at Tottenham, although almost exclusively of the poorer classes, subscribed £40; it is the hope of us who worked in the mission that the same or even greater blessing may follow him in his future work.

The following practical advice by "J. P. G." appears in the Magazine of Streatham Hill Congregational Church:—

PRAY FOR THE NEXT PEW.

If you pray for the persons in the pew next to yours, you will feel a new interest in them, and this interest will find its natural and fitting expression in many kind ways. Prayer will be a secret and holy bond of union between you and them, and He who has said that if we ask it shall be given will, in answer to your prayers, send many blessings upon them. You may minister to their comfort, strength, holiness, and salvation, and make the word they hear every Sunday quick with Divine power.

"But there is no one in the next pew!" Then pray that it soon may be filled. Prayer may be the means of leading you to consider what you can and ought to do to fill it. Empty pews would not long be empty if those who are near them were resolved by the blessing of God to be the means of filling them.

The difficulty of securing an efficient diaconate is a source of anxiety in many a country church, where the local conditions are such as to limit the number of suitable men available for the position. A Congregational minister, Rev. E. J. Dukes, of Harrogate, boldly tackles the question in an able treatise—OUR SISTER PHŒBE. (6d. Book Depôt, Memorial Hall, E.C.)—in favour of the appointment of women deacons where such circumstances exist. Doubtless the idea will come as a shock to some; but prejudice seems the only valid reason against the innovation. Anyway, the suggestion deserves a fair hearing, and Mr. Dukes has dealt with it in a fair and reasonable spirit.

Rev. Stanley Rogers supplements his father's plan of half a million guineas with a very good suggestion. Supposing the money to be in hand, he would set aside a certain portion for a students' loan fund, for the use of ministerial candidates, who, on examination, prove themselves possessed of qualifications essential to a successful ministry; the amounts thus received to be paid back into the fund by instalments after they have entered the ministry and are in receipt of income. It is sometimes difficult to keep away unfit men, and at the same time to discover, encourage, and prepare such as are suitable. Godly trained men for pastors are ever one of the Church's greatest needs.

If God is "not slack concerning his promises," so also is it true that "He fainteth not, neither is weary" through precipitate action. At one time we are apt to ignore his promises because they do not hasten to fulfilment; at another, we are impatient of the speedy ripening of the Divine purposes. Neither attitude is consistent with a prayerful watching and waiting for the Lord's return. Disappointed expectations regarding "the blessed hope" rank among the most pathetic incidents in the history of the Church; but the contrary disposition—the spirit of saying "My Lord delayeth his coming"—is equally to be guarded against.

Looking back upon the great Reformation overthrow in our own land, John Bunyan regarded Giant Pope as "grown so crazy and stiff in his joints that he can now do little more than sit in his cave's mouth, grinning at pilgrims as they go by, and biting his nails because he cannot come at them." Events soon disproved this judgment, and showed that "Giant Pope" was as active as ever; also that God was not in a hurry to bring to an end the conflict between the Gospel and Romanism. Later on, it was thought that the French Revolution would cripple the Church of Rome, and afterwards that the abdication of Napoleon would issue in important results. But with the return of the Bourbons to France, Jesuit activity revived on the Continent, leading Robert Hall to say that all interpretations of prophecy, advanced by those who had been thought sound theologians, had been overturned by the battle of Waterloo:—"That battle and its results, appeared to me to put back the clock of the world six degrees."

In view of past disappointments, we do well to remember that there is an ebb and a flow in the development of events; but seasons of peace and quiet, no less than times of war and commotion, lead up to the consummation set forth in the sure word of prophecy. Let us wait God's time, neither going before through impatience nor lagging behind through indifference.

The extraordinary attitude taken up by the Church Times towards the Free Church Catechism as a signal proof of the substantial agreement of the Evangelical Churches on the vital doctrines of the Christian faith, suggests that Sacerdotalism has a curiously blinding effect on the vision of its followers. It has always been a stock argument among Romanists that Protestantism is hopelessly divided against itself. A more evident proof that, whatever may have been the case in the past, the lines of separation are fading in regard to essential matters, and that as regards the rest Christian people can agree to differ, has been afforded by the unanimous adoption of this Catechism by the leaders of the four chief denominations. And yet the Church Times finds on the whole that further proof has been adduced of the divisive nature of dissent!

"They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters," deserve, in these days of gales and storms, the especial sympathy and prayers of God's people. Who can measure the anxiety and nervous strain of captain and crew to bring even a freight ship safe to harbour, to say nothing of what it must be when hundreds of lives as well as a cargo are at stake? Pray also for the wives and mothers and children who are filled with fear for days and sometimes weeks at a time.

Ever and anon arise to the surface of public notice the dangers that underlie professional engagements for English girls abroad. Mr. Burrow, of the Theatrical Mission (Macready House, Henrietta Street, W.C.), has cases before him at the present moment of respectable girls being trapped by false representation into engagements, the nature of which they had not dreamed of. The Mission is in a unique position for rendering aid, and may assuredly look to the Christian public for support.

The Anti-Vivisection Societies are preparing for an active campaign during the present year, and will endeavour to get a Bill introduced into Parliament, which, if it passes, will greatly reduce the horrors of vivisection. We invite the sympathy of our readers in the cause of mercy, for the hope of getting the Bill through Parliament depends largely on the amount of pressure that constituents can put upon individual members of the House of Commons.

The decline of discipline in family life is an unquestionable feature of this generation. The pervading apathy towards religion and social welfare among working men may be traced largely to this lack of home influence and education. Recent investigations in the East End have brought out the most discouraging results as to the moral and spiritual condition of the people. It is difficult to suggest a remedy; indeed, apart from a revival of spiritual life, it seems impossible to bring any influence to bear on those most to blame for the present condition of things. The old home ideal is the direct fruit of the Gospel; cause and effect thus react on each other, and till the fountain is cleansed the stream will be tainted. This is a subject for all preachers and speakers at mission halls and P.S.A.'s to deal with—it would be difficult to suggest one more pressing or important.

The case of a woman who was condemned to death last week by Mr. Justice Darling for the murder of her sister in a bout of drunken frenzy, opens up a terrible vision of the squalor and depravity that co-exist with our boasted civilisation. The true lesson is the hopelessness of raising the morals of the abjectly poor while the means of drink are so plentifully and invitingly spread before them at every street corner. This wretched woman had previously suffered almost countless convictions for drunkenness, had herself been wounded about twenty times in various "rows," and had suffered legal punishment several times for savage assaults. And at the root of it all was the one plea of drink, which she described as the only escape of the poor from their miseries. Here is a confession which should nerve every temperance reformer to renewed zeal. Till that enemy is overcome, reformatories, refuges, and every form of educational effort are terribly handicapped in their struggle against vice.

At Marylebone Police Court recently, Mr. Plowden disregarded the offence of some juvenile gamblers, and sympathised with their endeavour to while away what he termed "the dulness of Sundays." On another occasion a working man, charged with being drunk and disorderly, urged, in mitigation of the offence, that for the last fourteen months he had been a teetotaler. Then came the following sapient dictum from the magistrate:—

> And you found it monotonous? I am not surprised. I quite understand your desire for a change after fourteen months of total abstinence. Now you have tried the wisdom of both cravings. You know what it is to be painfully sober, and what it is to be very drunk. You are acquiring experience as you go on. Take my advice, and do not drink too much. Try everything, but moderately.

Considering the agreement of nearly all judges and magistrates as to the evils of the drink curse, the advice was most reprehensible. Apart from this, self-restraint and moral dignity become the judgment seat, but ill-advised attempts at humour bring a sure entail of contempt.

The "policy of pin-pricks," as the attitude of the French Goverment towards this country has been termed, is one that is not unfrequently followed nearer home, and has lessons that many households would do well to learn. The irritable tempers, quick resentments, morbid sensitiveness, and tiny but perpetual acts of provocation that are sometimes shown towards one another by those who have to live together are a most fruitful source of unhappiness in home-life. Between nations, the result is to breed an attitude of constant suspicion and deepening alienation; in the family hatred and all uncharitableness flow from such causes.

Nations whose territories touch and whose interests clash, need to pay special attention to the courtesies of diplomacy, and to respect each other's feelings with jealous care. Those whose life is spent under one roof, and who are joined by the closest ties, should cultivate a large and generous mood of toleration and mutual regard. Was it not against such an evil the Apostle was pleading in the words, "And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you" (Ephes. iv. 32)?

The panoramic changes through which the Dreyfus case passes from week to week is a strange proof of the deep-seated malady that afflicts France. The forces of justice and injustice are locked in a death-grip, and now one, now the other seems to be winning. The situation is an eloquent commentary on the decadance of every public institution, and the poisoning of public opinion, under the influence of the combined evils of priestcraft and militarism. Here is a warning written in lines of fire across a continent, to which it would be well for Britain herself to give due heed.

A thoughtful Frenchman recently said that what France wants is ten thousand Protestants. The same reflection is suggested by an article in El Cristiano, a Protestant weekly in Madrid, which presents a most depressing picture of the condition of that unhappy land. The people are divided into two extreme parties — that of Romish fanaticism and that of religious negation. Immoral literature flourishes. There is no real religion, no fear of God, and morality is at a low ebb. A Spanish archbishop recently said in the Senate that what Spain wants is the "bread and leaves of the Catechism." This is the food on which Spain has been fed for centuries. A change to the strong meat of the Gospel, an open Bible, the preaching of its simple saving truths to the common people is the real need of the country. But this is exactly what the ecclesiastical party will not give to it; and so Spain is steadily going down hill, her greatness a memory, her future a blank.

The terrible cost of maintaining an army is sometimes best seen in the light of one fact. Thus in Vienna, where the aged Emperor is building himself an immense palace, costing millions of money, there are 60,000 soldiers living an idle life, while women have to rise long before dawn, mix the mortar for the palace, and carry it up in heavy tubs on their heads, to be ready for the masons. It has an inevitably degrading effect upon the toilers, and upon everyone; for perhaps the saddest thing is as the Woman's Signal says:—

> No one in Vienna sees anything incongruous in all this, or realises that these women are building a monument to mediævalism.

Mixing and carrying mortar is only one of the burdensome labours given to women who ought to be in their homes, and who would be there if the men were not turned into fighting machines; there is digging in the streets, and there is hauling great loads in the streets on waggons to which women and dogs are harnessed.

The Design of Christ's Death.

By Rev. J. CULROSS, D.D.

THE New Testament writers, especially the Apostle Paul, present a very definite view of Christ's purpose in dying, and attribute an efficacy to his blood, which gives an offence to many. Hence the watchword of many in these days, Not Paul but Christ. The apostolic age is represented as comparatively dim, and we do not need, it is said, to accept the word of the servant when we can get the teaching of the Master Himself.

Reading the evangelic narrative we find that Jesus spoke of giving his life a ransom, and had authority to do so, and in these words He says in the most impressive and solemn manner that remission of sins is due to his death. The words were spoken on the night of the betrayal. The disciples are gathered in the upper room with Jesus in the midst to eat the Passover. He had already told them that He was to be delivered up into the hands of men to be crucified. As the feast proceeded, He took bread, blessed, break it, and gave to them saying, "This is my body which is given for you." Then with fresh thanksgiving, He took the cup, bidding them all drink, and explaining, "This is my blood of the (new) covenant." "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, shed for you;" "shed for many for the remission of sins." The Revised Version translates even more definitely, "shed unto the remission of sins"; the word "unto" pointing out both the purpose and the actually-achieved result. We are told that the writings of Paul "reek with the blood theology;" what shall be said of these words of Jesus, and of the memorial feast of the Christian Church?

No criticism has been able to dislodge the words from the evangelic record, and no translations can diminish their weight.

Without attempting to exhibit the full meaning contained in them, which was held in reserve till the coming of the Holy Spirit, I would ask attention to the following considerations:—Jesus is about to lay down his life on the cross; just as He was led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil, so now, through the same eternal Spirit, He goes to Calvary to shed his blood, obedient to his Father's gracious will, even unto death. He speaks of his death as if it were already accomplished and his blood were already poured forth. There is something that differentiates his death from a common death—it is for others. "My body," He says, "is given for you." Even if this expression stood alone, it could not mean I give up my life in your behalf to save you from the fury of the Jews; as, a few hours later, He said to the band that came to take Him, "If ye seek Me, let these go their way." This would be to impoverish the words, and to render the sacred ordinance of the Supper meaningless to all except the Twelve. But the words do not stand alone. Solemnly He adds, "My blood is shed for the remission of sins"—words which declare the atoning purpose contemplated in his death—viz., in the pardon of sinners and the putting away of sin. This, indeed, is not the end of ends. Pardon is the first, but it is only one of the blessed results contemplated. These results are more than can be "reckoned up in order," but it leads in the train of "things that accompany salvation."

Good men may differ when they try to explain how it is that the death of Christ brings in pardon—in other words, when they theorise concerning the Atonement; but every attempted explanation must carry in it at least these three things: first, we are sinners; second, we do not gain forgiveness by merit or action of our own; third, forgiveness is due to the shed blood of Christ. If we fail in our explanation, and cannot clear all mysteries in the subject, it is enough to say, "Well, God sees through the case, and we trust Him for pardon through the shed blood of Jesus Christ."

No explanation can be true which represents God as an omnipotent Being who was in a rage, and required blood to appease Him and turn away his wrath and induce Him to love men. The Atonement is to be traced back to the love of God as its origin: "God so loved the world that He gave." Men must not represent God as an omnipotent Moloch.

This truth must be sacredly guarded in our hearts—Christ has earned pardon for us by his death. Some men are willing to accept Jesus as a heaven-sent and inspired teacher—the purest and loftiest Moralist who ever lived, but not as the suffering Son of God, who once, and once for all, suffered for sins that He might bring us to God. The Cross is the offence; they object to be saved in such a way; "let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe in Him."

Thoughts for Parents.

REASONABLE OBEDIENCE.

"IF ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat the good of the land."—Isaiah i. 19.

Take time and trouble to explain the "why" and "wherefore" of discipline, and thus seek to make your children fellow-workers with yourself in the formation of their own characters. Boys and girls are eminently reasonable beings and resent arbitrary commands.

Do not judge your child's conduct from the standpoint of your own. Endeavour to see through his eyes and with his experience, before you judge him. If you tell a child constantly that he is "naughty," it is but reasonable to believe that he will live up to his reputation.

Let there be no suspicion of antagonism between yourself and your children, beware of being "enemy-friend;" use your reason, if you would gain obedience.

1. When you give a command, see that it is obeyed.
2. Do not give several at once, or continually pester the child with "do this" or "don't do that." The chronic "don't" of the parent brings the chronic "won't" of the child.
3. Do not command what you cannot enforce.
4. Do not bully your children into submission.
5. When once a thing is forbidden, keep your word.

Centenary of the C.M.S. — Ladies and gentlemen are required for the special choirs which will lead the singing at the various meetings in the Royal Albert Hall, Exeter Hall, and Queen's Hall during the Centenary week in London, April 10-14. Those willing to help, will please send in names and addresses, stating what part they sing (soprano, contralto, tenor, or bass), to the central secretary, or Rev. A. Armitage, C.M. House, Salisbury Square.

Englishwomen in Egypt.—Mr. Bucher, the English chaplain at Cairo, writing to the Times, advises Englishwomen who see advertisements asking for governesses and dames de compagnie not to accept such situations without first communicating with some one who can give information as to the character of those who ask for such services. In several cases attempts have been made to wreck the life, and even where a promise of marriage is made, by the facile system of Moslem divorce the husband can at any moment free himself, leaving the woman practically unprovided for, but still in the eyes of the law of her own country a wedded wife. Where a woman has no acquaintance of her own on the spot to whom she can apply for information, Mr. Bucher advises her to address herself to one of the British chaplains in Egypt.

Week of Prayer at Mildmay.

IT is probably well known that at Mildmay the injunction "To the Jew first" is taken very literally. For many years this principle has so far affected the arrangements of the Week of Prayer, as formulated by the Evangelical Alliance, as to absorb the whole of the first day of united prayer in the interests of Israel. After this the programme follows in the order arranged.

The proceedings of the first day will be fully reported in Trusting and Toiling. One thought, however, given by Rev. H. B. Macartney was so unique as to compel special notice here. Alluding to the certainty of prayer for Israel's restoration being answered, he invited attention to Isaiah lxii. 6-7: "Ye that are the Lord's remembrancers, keep not silence and give Him no rest till He establish, till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." With reference to the date of this prophecy, B.C. 698, which, added to 1898, gives nearly 2,600 years, he showed this to be the oldest prayer union for Israel in the world, and felt assured that God would not set aside the prayers of so many years.

On the morning of Tuesday, Dr. Barlow showed how the prophet Daniel, understanding by the writings of Jeremiah that the seventy years captivity were certainly about to close, commenced to pray most earnestly for the fulfilment of that which was certain! Reason says: "If a thing is going to be, why should I pray?" Faith says:—"Because God has promised a thing I will LOSE NO TIME IN PRAYING FOR IT."

On the subject of nations and their rulers, Rev. P. Carmichael took a most statesmanlike view, reproving the slipshod criticism passed upon rulers and governors, by irresponsible persons, ignorant of the facts and issues which guide rulers in their decisions, reprobating the judgments passed upon them by such people. He insisted that instead of this light and ignorant criticism, there should be substituted the prayer that all things may be ordered and settled for the establishment of peace and righteousness.

On the Thursday most helpful meetings were held in connection with prayer for families and schools. Mr. R. C. Morgan in the evening meeting read from Eph. v. 22, vi. 9, and remarked that, in order to see rightly the relationship of the family, we must see the relationship of Christ to the Church, for this is the basis of true relationship between husband and wife, and parents and children.

Much prayer for Egypt and the Soudan was made on the Friday morning, and the chairman, General Brownlow, greatly deplored the decision of the authorities to forbid the commencement of the Church Missionary Society Medical Mission simultaneously with the erection of the Memorial College at Khartoum. From his experience and knowledge of the Mohammedans of India and of the frontier, he showed that the ignoring of the Bible was not merely a religious, but a political mistake. He showed how Mohammedans only comprehend two sects outside Mohammedanism—the Roman Catholic, and other similar religions, which they consider to be rank idolatry. All other Christians who make no point of their religion—who by their lives and conduct say plainly it does not matter, it is of no importance—they call, Kaffirs, or infidels. There is nothing a Mohammedan respects so much as the courage of a man's conviction. He can understand and admire a true Christian, but he scorns a mere professor.

On Friday evening, Rev. George Soltau gave a telling address on the only remedy the Church can apply to the crying evils and ignorance of heathenism. Quoting Rev. Handley Moule's striking translation of Romans viii. 19: "For the longing outlook of creation is expecting the unveiling of the Son of God," he pointed out the evolution of image-making in a descending climax. Man, in his habits and life can never rise beyond his conception of God—hence his degradation! By this idolatry, man is blindly thwarting God's purpose—for God intended in the fulness of time to introduce his "image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 4), that He might be the firstborn among many brethren (Rom. viii. 29)—one new man, renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him (Col. iv. 10)—where Christ is all, and in all. And instead of the idols of silver and gold, the work of men's hands (Ps. cxv.), which have eyes and see not, mouths and speak not, hands and handle not, feet and walk not, what is really needed is, that the heathen should see true Christians—the eyes, the mouth, the hands, the feet, &c., of the living Christ.

Revival:

What it is, and How it can be Obtained.

By Rev. E. D. SOLOMON.

"O Lord revive thy work."—Habakkuk iii. 2.

GOD is always ready to revive his work in any heart, in any church, and in any place.

Why, then, is his work so imperfectly done by us? Why are we so languid in it? Such questions can only be answered to our own shame and confusion of face. Hindrances delaying revival are never to be found on the Divine side, but always on the human side. God's challenge ever is, "Prove Me now herewith (i.e., by rectifying what is wrong) if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

There are conditions of religious revival, and we must comply with them if the revival is to come. The unwillingness is never in God, but always in us. We are never straitened in Him, but invariably in ourselves. "We have not because we ask not, or because we ask amiss;" that is to say, because we do not comply with the condition, or conditions, conjoined with the very promises we plead.

I. In order to have a revival of religion the nature and need of it must be very distinctly realised by us.

If I were to go to some of the members of our churches and say, "Do you not need a revival?" there would be an immediate reply in the affirmative. Yet, perchance, their thoughts would be principally fixed on so-called revival meetings, many of which are arranged for and held without any very appreciable results, certainly without any known conversions. I believe in missions and evangelistic services, yea, I strongly recommend them to all our churches; but we must distinguish between them and the earnest, united prayers of the Church for personal spiritual quickening, and for the real conversion of the ungodly.

A committee can arrange for special services, but it takes mighty faith and prayer and earnest work to secure a revival in fulness of power and blessing.

REVIVAL NEVER COMES MECHANICALLY.

Behind the special services there must be the throbbing, agonising prayer of some heart, or hearts, for God's Spirit to move on other spirits, making them more spiritually alive and strong and active, changing a dead Church into a living one, so that we who were cold and careless before, are made to die unto sin, and to live unto God. And to have the inevitable results of a real revival, there must be mighty faith and prayer for the Spirit in his convincing and converting power to fall on all sinners who hear the Word.

When in any community, and by whatever agency you have great spiritual results, the piritual quickening and consecration of believers, and sinners made new creatures in Christ Jesus—not patched up, not pushed along into the fellowship of the Church, almost against their will, but changed, inwardly transformed—then and there you have revival, and the fruits, the blessed results of revival; but any other things that are secondary to these are the result, the product, not of the Spirit of God, but of mechanical means, of "got up" meetings, which can be manufactured at will.

When we use the words of the prophet, "O Lord, revive thy work!" let our ideas be clear and definite; for, before we can have real revival, its need must be felt by us, and it must be felt by us individually before we can be individually quickened to a completer consecration. The realisation of that need is itself a quickening, is itself a revival in its initial form. God creates that sense of need in the heart of one man or woman, or in the hearts of a few men and women, that through them He may awaken it in many, and so bring spiritual quickening to the entire Church and salvation to many outside her communion.

Revival in its primary meaning, therefore relates to ourselves who are the members of the Church of Christ, but who have grown cold or lukewarm to his cause. It is the renewal, the reviving of the life of the living, but whose life is so feeble that it looks just like death, and so we speak of the owners of that life as being dead. Revival is health to the unhealthy. It is the inflow of vigour and strength into the weakly. It is increased life and power—"life more abundantly."

A professing Christian may be a wretchedly poor specimen of Christianity—

A WALKING GHOST

—and yet be unaware of his deplorable condition. He may, while professing to be a follower of Jesus, and while attending the ordinances of the Church, have his attention so engrossed with the things that are material as to allow his religion to become nothing but a piece of formalism. Or he may so concern himself about the inconsistencies and shortcomings of others as to forget his own; and while thinking and dilating on the general lukewarmness of the Church, without even thinking of the poverty and worldliness of his own heart and life, he may say, "We need reviving." Or he may use the words in his poor formal prayer, "O Lord, revive thy work!"

Revival will never come in that way: never come as the result of that man's efforts and prayers. He must first of all be concerned about himself before he can do anything to promote a revival. He must awake to his own infinite need; he must face his own sins and shortcomings, and wrestle in prayer with God to deliver him from them; he must stir himself up to take hold on God for himself, for the consecration of his own life to God, and in the interests of his own salvation, before he can effectually intercede for others.

Therefore I have no hesitation in saying that it is one man or woman, or a few men and women, who are profoundly impressed with their own need of a closer walk with God, of the need of their own hearts, and who personally consecrate themselves to God, who cannot rest until they get nearer to Him, and who are prepared to give up everything that hinders their sweet communion with Him—it is these men and women who are at the root of all the religious revivals in our churches and communities.

Therefore, let us not think so much of the collective life of this Church or that with which we may be in fellowship as of our own personal life, if we would help to promote a revival. Let us institute and earnestly ask God to search us and try us, and see if there be any wicked way in us, and lead us in the way everlasting. Let us set our secret sins in the light of our countenance, as God sets them in the light of his. Let each of us ask himself, "Am I always going to live at this poor dying rate? Am I always going to be content with the form without the power, with the semblance without the reality, with the profession without the life? This indifference to my own spiritual condition—am I never going to get rid of it? This incubus of worldliness that is killing my better life, and that makes 'the joy of the Lord' impossible to me—am I never going to shake it off? This Mammonism that is taking the place of God—am I always going to offer sacrifice at its shrine, and that sacrifice, myself? This covetousness that is eating into my soul like a canker — is it going to curse me for ever? Am I never going to give to my God the cheerful, faithful service that is his due, the whole-hearted consecration that He asks, and which I know I ought even enthusiastically to give?"

Out of such searching self-examination would come to every one of us an utterable sense of our own need of Divine quickening and uplifting, compelling us to cry, "Lord! I have lived for self and pleasure and worldly gain; help me to live for Thee! I have been most concerned about my own temporal interests; help me to seek first the interests of thy kingdom! Deliver me from all that displeases thee! and bring all my life into perfect harmony with thy most holy will. "O Lord, revive Thy work in this cold heart of mine, that I may let my light so shine that others, seeing my good works, may be led to glorify Thee!"

When this is true of us; when we draw close to God, consecrating our lives to Him, He will at once lay on our hearts the burden of souls. Then we shall not merely desire accessions to our particular church, but conversions! We shall pray for and expect nothing less, and we shall be content with nothing less! We shall begin to ask such questions as these: "Has the Gospel lost its power? Is not Jesus still mighty to save? Is not the Holy Spirit promised to them that ask? Cannot He subdue the most obdurate will, and bend the stiffest neck and break the hardest heart, and immediately confirm the preached Word with signs following? I repeat, when we are ourselves revived, when we give ourselves fully to the Lord, we shall expect and be content with nothing less than the constant ingathering of souls, and, therefore, shall pray much and do all we can to lead our fellow men to Christ.

Testimony to Israel.

IN the January number of The Scattered Nation Mr. David Baron writes:—"During the past years I have been labouring under a great strain, and often in much physical weakness. This has been especially the case since September last, after an attack of pleurisy, and now I have been warned by the doctors that I must take a long rest or run the risk of breaking down completely. My orders are to go abroad for three months, and if the Lord will we shall probably leave home about the middle of January.

"Thank God for the rainbow of promise even in this cloud. First, I am assured by the physicians that by God's blessing the long rest will enable me to serve the Lord Jesus with greater vigour in the future. I hope also to be allowed to do a little literary work, which it has been long in my heart to accomplish, and which I feel, with the Lord's blessing, may be of some use to the Church. Thank God, the mission work itself will in no wise suffer by my temporary absence. Apart from my able brother, Mr. Schönberger, there will be three or four other devoted missionary brethren engaged in the work at our London centre.

"I take it as an especial token for good in connection with this matter that the Lord is sending us as a substitute during my absence Pastor A. Venetianer, the 'Reformed Church' pastor of Uj Sove in Hungary. This dear brother, whose father and brother are Rabbis in office, was led to the knowledge of Christ about twenty years ago, having been instructed in the faith and led to the Saviour by Mr. Schönberger when in Prague. He is a very gifted man, and one of the most powerful preachers of the Gospel in Hungary. We should be thankful if you will join us in the prayer, that in giving up his pastoral work for the time and coming to London, he may come in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.

"I need not say what an encouragement it would be to us if, early in the New Year, the hearts of God's people were stirred to send help sufficient for the many and growing needs of the mission in the immediate future, both at home and abroad. I have only to add that letters will be forwarded, and the correspondence attended to as usual. Our annual meeting for praise and prayer, which is usually held in February, will this year be held in April."

The Scattered Nation also contains a résumé of the work of the mission during the past year. Copies (price 3d.) may be had of Messrs. Morgan and Scott, or of Mr. Baron, 23, Boscastle Road, N.W.

IN Bolivia, the Romanist priests are a principal obstacle to missionary effort, but there are other difficulties. There is no railway to or in the country. The access to it is over the most rugged and elevated mountain passes. It is a land of grand heights and of vast mineral wealth, in gold and silver mines, including those of Potosi. Yet it is low indeed in the religious and moral scale; and poor indeed in reference to Gospel privations.

Two members of the Society of Friends from Iowa, in America, have recently undertaken the task of endeavouring to introduce a pure Gospel into Bolivia. They have been sent out by an evangelistic band of students of the Friends' "Penn College" in Iowa, U.S.A. Some of these young men are contributing towards the expenses of the mission by the labour of their hands. The prayers of other Christians are desired on behalf of this mission.

SUNDAY, Jan. 22.

Leviticus i.

THIS book begins with the sweet savour offerings, probably because we begin from the God-ward side, and have to consider what gives God supreme pleasure. It is surely right also that the Burnt Offering, which represents entire consecration, should stand as the frontispiece of this book, and introduce the rest. Whatever services we offer to God, their fitness and acceptableness must be in proportion to the devotion of those who bring them.

The work of our Lord, which is presented from so many standpoints in these varied offerings, emanated from his entire devotion to his Father's will, summed up and expressed as it was in the words, "Lo I come to do thy will, O God!" Further, in the fire which consumed the entire offering, and made it of a sweet savour to God, learn how severe was the pain He endured, when He gave Himself up to the death for us all, "Christ gave Himself up for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for an odour of a sweet smell."

MONDAY, Jan. 23.

Leviticus ii.

The Meat Offering might consist of flour, baken cakes, or the ears of the new harvest; but, whatever its nature, there was fellowship and communion between Jehovah and the priest.

No doubt in its deepest sense the meat offering is an emblem of the human life and character of Jesus considered in its human aspects. The fineness of the flour bespeaks the evenness and nobility of his temper and spirit; the oil reminds us of the Holy Spirit by whom He was so copiously anointed; the frankincense of the grace and beauty of his character; the fire through which the offering passed, in the second and third aspects of it, as baken cakes or parched ears, tells of the nobility of his demeanour in death, which extracted the admiration even of Pilate. There was no leaven of corruption or yeasty ferment, no honey of mawkish sentiment; but the salt of strong, pure, evil-arresting devotion to the Father's will.

Would that these characteristics were true of us—were evident in our conversation and demeanour!

TUESDAY, Jan. 24.

Leviticus iii.

This is another of the sweet savour offerings. Like the rest, it does not deal with the sacrificial and propitiatory aspects of our Saviour's work, but with the beauty of his character, the entireness of his devotion, and the joy which the manner of his life and death gave to the heart of God.

In the previous chapter we dealt with the Meat Offering, which refers rather to the characteristic qualities of our Saviour's character, as the perfect servant, holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, who spake as man never spake, wrought deeds of matchless mercy, and bore Himself as King of men. But in the present chapter, the Peace Offering calls on us to review the spirit in which He died; when reviled He reviled not again; blasphemed, buffeted, and falsely accused, He threatened not, but endured the cross, despising the shame, with unexampled patience and fortitude.

There was fellowship between God and the worshipper in the former offering, and there is similar fellowship here. But there is more than that. We may so feed on the spirit of our Saviour's death, its patience, courage, meekness, gladness, and surrender, that those fair characteristics shall be repeated in ourselves whenever we are called to pass through suffering, rejection, misunderstanding, or any other kind of pain.

WEDNESDAY, Jan. 25.

Leviticus iv.

Now we come to the Sin Offerings. This chapter deals with those for such as had sinned unwittingly. The character of these sins is brought out more clearly in Num. xv. 30, where they are contrasted with high-handed sins, with which men blasphemed the Lord, and despised his Word. The same distinction appears in the words of the Psalmist: "Cleanse Thou me from hidden faults; keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins." The sins into which we may be betrayed by sudden impulse, rather than those of premeditation and calculation, are included in these unwitting sins. They are what the Apostle John calls, "sins not unto death."

It is impossible to do more than notice one or two salient points. Thus, for instance, that the anointed priest was required to offer a bullock for his sin; but a ruler only a goat, and one of the common people, being poor, might bring a lamb. It would be hardly possible to suggest more clearly the gravity of the sin of those who have better opportunities of knowing God's will, and are not exposed to the temptations that assail men whose calling summons them into the world. Judging by the value of the sacrifice, the sin of a priest was equivalent to that of the whole people (compare verses 3 and 14).

In the cases of priest and people, the blood was brought in to be sprinkled seven times before the vail, in the presence of the Lord; whilst the rest of the blood, as in the other cases, was poured out at the base of the altar. This latter act denotes the objective work of atonement wrought on Calvary for man; but the former represents the application of the blood on our special behoof in the presence of God.

THURSDAY, Jan. 26.

Leviticus v.

We may know sin generally; but it is good to particularise, especially when we examine ourselves in God's presence, or confess our sins. It is sinful to gloze over our knowledge that a man is swearing falsely, for by so doing we make ourselves participators in his wrong against another. We may contract defilement by our contact with impure books, scenes, or people. It is very rare that we can be touched by any of these without being defiled, even though we resist temptation.

There may be guilt on us by reason of things in which either we have not done right, or have condoned and permitted wrong, or have been betrayed by passion. In all such cases there are certain inevitable steps to be taken before we can be as we were or enjoy God's smile.

We must confess (v. 5) certainly to God; and, where needful, to our fellow man. We must make restitution (v. 16). Notice that it is not enough to give the bare value of the damage we have caused; we must add something by way of reparation for loss of interest. We must bring our guilt offering (v. 6). In other words, we must mention before God the atoning work of Jesus. We must yield ourselves again to God (v. 10). Part of the sacrifice was burnt to represent the renewed consecration of the whole nature of the forgiven man to God.

FRIDAY, Jan. 27.

Leviticus vi.

The Trespass Offering touches another range of sins—those in which a man may fail in a matter of honesty and fidelity towards his fellow man. He may have committed a theft, or gotten goods by oppression, or purloined a deposit, or failed to restore property he may have found. In any of these cases he would need to make restitution, because he had defrauded his fellow, and bring a guilt-offering for an atonement, because he had offended against the government of the great God and King of Israel.

Then follow a number of additional rubrics concerning the details of the various offerings with which we have been dealing. Notice, for instance, that it is enjoined twice that the fire should be kept burning on the altar. It was never to go out. God had lit it with his own hand, and man was carefully to nourish and maintain it. Whenever God has kindled a holy flame in your heart be sure to feed and nourish it with holy and reverent solicitude.

Next, notice that only holy men might eat of the sacred bread. Aaron and his sons are specially designated. Whosoever touched these viands must be holy. Let us see to it that we are living pure and unworldly lives, so that we may be able to take of the Heavenly Bread without sacrilege or desecration. "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat. . . ."

Also, let it be remarked that only holy men might touch these offerings (v. 27). There must be some among us who will give themselves to the study of sin, the analysis of its various kinds, and the consideration of Christ's precious atoning work; but this cannot be done without peril, and those who are called to this special work must be specially fitted for it.

SATURDAY, Jan. 28.

Leviticus vii.

One of the many points which may arrest us in this chapter is the great care God took of the priests, who offered the various sacrifices.

Of the guilt-offering, we are told that every male among the priests should eat thereof in a holy place, because it was most holy (v. 6). For the sin of the guilt-offering, there was only one law, the priest that made the atonement should have it (v. 7). The meal-offering, mingled with oil or dry, was also his (v. 10). The priest was to have a portion of the peace-offering (v. 15). The breast and shoulder are specially mentioned as pertaining to the priest, the one representing Love, the other strength (v. 31). The closing verses of the chapter are very emphatic as to the dues of Aaron and his sons to all generations (v. 36).

We need to lay all this to heart, because conveying very necessary cautions. Those among us who are specially called to holy service for others must not neglect themselves. The nourishment of their own spiritual life must not be neglected. It is of prime importance that we should feed our own souls, whilst preparing for the feeding of others. Before we utter God's message we should extract comfort and quickening from it.

Glimpses of Romanism.

2.—The Priests' True Position in Italy.

By Rev. A. ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

In my last paper I spoke of the Pope's position in Italy, and of the difficulty English people have of realising what that truly is. To do so, they must reverse all their ideas regarding him, picturing him, not as a prince invested with royal dignity and power, but as a slave abjectly obedient to the worst class of men that tread this earth—the Jesuits. The same delusion has to be got over by English people in regard to Italian priests. In popular imagination they are supposed to be drawn from a respectable class in society, that they are educated, that they are the moral and spiritual teachers of the people, whose confidence and respect they possess. Nothing could be further from the truth. They are, indeed, exactly the reverse.

In the first place they are drawn from the lowest of the low. Nothing offends a boy more than to ask him if he is going to be a priest. If such a question is put to a group of school lads there is a general shrug of the shoulders, and, in contemptuous tones, the words are heard, "Not one of us." No father who respects himself will give his son to the priesthood.

I remember a widower with a large number of children once asked me to take one of his boys and put him into a Protestant institute. I said, "Why, there is the Papal Seminary, put him there, and make a priest of him. The Church will be glad enough to get hold of him." "Yes," he said; "but I want my boy to follow a respectable calling." What class of boys, then, does the Papal Church get? Well, they get paupers. When I last went through a Papal college, I asked the professor who conducted me, "Now how many of these boys are really studying for the priesthood?" His answer was "Sixteen" (there might have been sixty or seventy in the place), and he added of his own accord,

"AND THEY ARE SIXTEEN PAUPERS."

The Church also obtains for the priesthood the sons of drunkards and criminals, whom it buys occasionally at so much the head.

Of course, boys drawn even from these lowest grades might be educated and made worthy of respect; but they are not educated, and any instruction they receive is altogether in what is false and erroneous, and it is often positively immoral in its tendency. Men who had been trained in Papal Schools have told me that when they escaped from them they had to unlearn all they had learned. But some things they could not unlearn, for, under the cloak of religion and under the pretence of guarding them against evil and making them holy, all kinds of evil and impurities were instilled into their minds.

I could give many illustrations of this, but I must content myself with saying that the priests reverse the apostolic injunction, and whatsoever things are untrue, dishonest, unjust, impure, unlovely, of evil report, without virtue and without praiseworthiness, they think and speak of such things. The Papal Church does not wish its priests to be educated nor specially good. I have known a candidate for the priesthood disqualified because, to use the words of the examining canon, "He carried too much of the Gospel!" Count Campello has often said to me, "There is only one crime a priest can commit—that is, to think for himself."

When I was walking near Arrone, in Umbria, with an Italian evangelist, a priest passed us on a black horse, when a boy, sitting on a low wall, cried out, "Un prete del diavolo" (a priest of the devil). I asked what the boy meant. The priest, I was told, was such a source of corruption in a certain village that the men rose against him. The Church then had to take action, and it is only on such occasions that it does. No matter how notoriously wicked the priest is, unless the people complain, he is let alone. Its action in this case was simply to give give the priest a fresh field for the continuance of his wicked ways. The fact is, the priests have no resources, and they easily, almost invariably, slide into corruption. "Wine, women, and the lottery," as a late canon of St. Peter's told me, "are their only occupation."

Of course, nobody knows as they do the hollowness of all their priestly claims, and how the whole papal system is a huge deception. In Italy, too, owing to the political situation, they must be the sworn enemies of the king and country. They must fight, or make a show of fighting, for the temporal power, and they must do all they can to foster discontent, and stir up rebellion.

One need not, therefore, be surprised that the priest is in Italy; emphatically "there are none so poor as do him reverence." Priests are not admitted into society. When I was staying with friends in a provincial town near Milan, I remarked that we had met at our host's house everybody except a priest; the answer was, "Oh, nobody receives a priest! Anyone doing so would fall in public estimation; it would be considered not only unpatriotic but immoral." Young priests feel this keenly. Some young men in Venice, about to be licensed as priests, said to a friend of mine, "When we go about Venice, we feel as if everybody was scowling at us and despised us. We cannot stand it; and so when we are drawn for the army, as we expect soon to be, not one of us will go back to the Church."

I need not say, in closing, that priests are not the moral and spiritual teachers of the nation. When they were privileged to come into contact with the people they were their demoralisers. Now they are outside social life altogether, and the opportunity of working mischief has been taken from them. This is good for them, and, as a member of the House of Deputies said, when addressing his constituents, "The Church of Rome is purer than it once was, not because it is growing any better, but because the strong arm of the law checks the villainy of the priests. If the priesthood in Italy were not augmented by foreign priests the profession would gradually die out. The Italian priest would disappear, like the savage, before the march of education and Christianity. But the sad fact is that other nations, and more especially England and Ireland, send constantly fresh recruits to swell their ranks, and to aid them in retarding Italian progress. Travellers often remark to me on the number of young priests they see in Rome, but when I ask what language did they utter, the answer comes, "Oh, they all seemed to talk English." England is the great civiliser of the world. What a pity it is that English Roman Catholics should give their sons and give their money to foster in Italy a system that is, and has ever been in the history of mankind, a system of iniquity!

Islington Clerical Meeting.

The Lord's Supper.

THERE was an unusually large attendance at the Islington Clerical Meeting, which was held on Tuesday, last week. Rev. Prebendary Barlow, D.D., presided, and the subject of conference was "The Teaching of the Church of England respecting the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion." In some opening words the Chairman pointed out that the appeal was first to the Prayer Book and Articles of the Church, and the writings of the Reformers and the testimony of the earliest (and purest) ages of Christianity, but above and beyond them all to the witness of Holy Scripture, whose authority alone could be recognised as final.

The first set address was delivered by Rev. Prebendary Wace, D.D., who answered the question, "Why the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was Ordained?" The institution and its terms were examined and outlined in a sense loyal to Holy Scripture, and the reply to the question was, "For the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and of the benefits which we receive thereby." Dr. Wace added: The two parts of the remembrance have been, by the Saviour's own words and action, indissolubly combined, and to put them assunder is at once to Him, and a grievous injury to ourselves. Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas conducted an inquiry as to the object, reason, and purpose of the Supper. Ecclesiastical expressions and Scripture statements were scrutinised; and in regard to the Prayer Book, the remark was made, by way of reminder, that it dates from the sixteenth century—from a period known as the Reformation! It was forcibly shown that the Supper is not a commemorative sacrifice, but the commemoration of a sacrifice; on this point the Prayer Book follows the Zwinglian view, the Swiss and English Reformers being at one on the subject. Dr. C. H. H. Wright, in a few words, maintained that while Christ was present with his people, He was not in the consecrated bread and wine used at the service.

Dr. Handley Moule spoke of "The Benefits whereof we are Partakers thereby," giving, first, the voice of the Church, and then the voice of Scripture. His conclusions were admirably expressed: The body and blood, as set before the believer's inner eye in the Supper, are the Lord's Body and the Lord's Blood as in death. It is the the covenant of a settled and abiding and continuous remission. It unites us spiritually, in a deeper faith, to the Lord, developing in us his indwelling, refreshing our souls, and binding us to one other. The presence is special in purpose and not in mode. "Neither Scripture, nor the Liturgy, nor the Articles, nor reverent reasons require in the least any mystery of an abnormal Presence attached to, connected with, the sacred elements. Rev. A. E. Barnes-Lawrence, in the course of a pointed address, said the sacrifice is past, but its efficacy endures. A real sacrifice it is, and our feast upon it is real and true—not upon the bread and wine, which are mere passing shadows, but on Him crucified, of whom this food is the appointed sign and sacrament.

"The Manner and the Means of Reception" was dealt with by Canon Girdlestone whose admirable paper, as given in last week's Record, presents in a postscript a useful list of important books and treatises on the subject. He said: "The body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper. But they are (as Article xxviii. says) given, taken, and received only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; given, not by man, but by God through the objective who presents Christ crucified in all his blessed reality to our spirit; taken, not by man's hand, but by faith (for we are specially invited to draw near with faith and take this holy Sacrament to our comfort); eaten, not with the mouth, but by faith. "Feed on Him in your heart by faith." Rev. Dr. Henry Gee gave a contemporary exposition of the clauses in Article xxviii., making apposite quotations from the writings of the Reformers and from standard works.

The fourth and last branch of the subject was opened by Rev. T. W. Drury on "What is required of them who come to the Lord's Supper?" This paper was of solid worth, and thoughtful in the indication of means of preparation and heads of self-examination. The two great duties resting upon communicants were set forth as follows: 1. Towards God we must have (a) repentance, (b) faith, (c) thanksgiving. 2. towards men we must have charity. These conditions involve the whole duty of man. We cannot worthily receive unless we draw near with present repentance for all sin, a heart wholly turned to God, and a will surrendered to universal obedience. Hence is the cement and bond of all duties. The Dean of Norwich followed, saying in the course of his vigorous speech:—Holy Communion is, with the single exception of the bread and the wine, entirely spiritual. From beginning to end it is a spiritual service, whereby spiritual life is strengthened and refreshed—not originated; we come to the Lord Jesus for life, but we come to the Sacrament with life.

After a few sound words by Canon Christopher, a general review of the day's proceedings was given by Rev. A. R. Buckland. Summarising the lessons to be drawn from the papers, he said:—"First of all, I think we may gather this: that the doctrines of the Prayer Book in this matter are to be understood in their natural sense. In the next place, I think we may infer that the doctrine of the Church in this matter is fully supported by Holy Scripture, especially by the words of institution. Furthermore, that they are sufficiently witnessed to by the ancient Fathers. And, yet again, that they represent not only an actual outcome of the work of the Reformers, but also the spirit in which the Reformers did their work." In conclusion, the speaker observed that it is the duty of Evangelical Churchmen to fight for the faith manfully but with charity.

Protestant Outlook.

THE Brighton correspondent of the Church Review states that in the parish of St. Bartholomew alone 700 confessions were heard before Christmas, and that 10,000 are heard in the parish in the year.

. . . . .

In a letter to the Times, Mr. Martin J. Sutton says: "Whether we like it or not, just as it is the duty of every teetotal elector to insist that the licensed public-house he never enters is properly conducted, so it is the duty and right of every Nonconformist voter to see that his representative in Parliament insists on the Church while established remaining true to the Prayer Book settlement."

. . . . .

Great interest is already being manifested in the meeting to be held at the Albert Hall. Mr. S. Campbell Cory has arranged with the Great Western Railway for a special train to London on the 31st inst., and he hopes to bring from 200 to 300 good Protestants from Cardiff. Rev. Henry Sharpe is arranging for a number of omnibus parties from Hampstead. The Protestant public must clearly understand that there will be absolutely no admission to the hall without a ticket. Within a few days of the advertisements of the demonstration appearing, over 3,000 tickets were applied for. This indicates that the meeting is likely to be a great success.

A meeting under the auspices of the National Protestant League was held last week at Manchester. Representatives were present from the North-Western and Midland counties, and Mr. Austin Taylor, of Liverpool, presided. The meeting approved the text of a Bill, drafted by the Laymen's League, to be promoted in Parliament, for the purpose of better enforcing discipline in the Church; and with a view of securing Parliamentary support for the Bill an organisation was formed, to be called the Northern Protestant Electoral Council for the Suppression of Lawlessness in the National Church, in connection with which committees will work in every constituency, to assist in the formation of a sound public opinion, and otherwise to push the Bill adopted by the meeting.

From all appearances we may believe that the Ritualists will stand firm and go on with their Romanising teaching and practices. This will be in harmony with their policy from the beginning; they have never gone back a step. Mr. Walsh's book bears painful testimony to the fact that at every fresh and more flagrant departure from Protestantism there has been an outcry against the guilty priests and their conduct; the offenders, however, have persisted in their offences, the storm has died down, and things have become worse. Signs of the same immovable temper abound on every hand. The suggestion of Sir Edward Clarke that the Bishop's veto should be removed from the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874, is met by the Church Times with a threat to assail his seat at Plymouth, and with their defiance.

Not the bogey of Disendowment, nor the fear of deprivation, nor the risk of letting in a Liberal Government, nor any sort of scare will ever frighten them into acquiescence in the government of the Church by Parliament.

This attitude will serve the truth very well, provided it is met with as firm an attitude on the part of Protestants.

The trenchant letters of Sir William Harcourt to the Times are being issued in handy booklet form by Mr. C. J. Thynne, 6, Great Queen Street, W.C., with the title "The Crisis in the Church." (6d.) The second and enlarged edition comprises nine letters. Other recent issues of value in the Protestant controversy include:—"What does the Church of England say about the real presence and adoration?" by Rev. Werner H. K. Soames, M.A., a reply to part of the recent charge of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The pages combine careful research with sound reasoning. (6d. net. Elliot Stock.) "Considerations regarding the Bishop of Salisbury's recent letter to his clergy, chiefly on the subjects of 'Eucharist,' and 'Confession,'" by Rev. P. V. M. Filleul, M.A. (3d. Stock), a deliverance deserving careful study. "Remarks upon the letters of the Bishop of Salisbury," by Rev. George Ensor, M.A. (6d. Partridge), in which certain ecclesiastical delusions are exposed and answered. "The Church and its Ministry," by H. Hill (3d. Stock), is also a useful pamphlet, timely in appearance. "The Papal University Question" reproduces from the newspapers important letters and articles on the Romish claim in Ireland and other topics of present-day interest. . . . . .

An influentially attended meeting of Churchmen, convened by the National Protestant Church Union, was held on Wednesday last week at the Church House, Westminster, "to consider the present crisis in the Church of England." The great hall, which accommodates 1,500 persons, was entirely filled, and 500 letters had been received from gentlemen who regretted absence. Viscount Midleton presided, and remarked upon the serious and highly objectionable nature of the disloyalty and disobedience now being shown by a section of the clergy. Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe read a memorial which it was intended to present to the Queen, which had already, he said, been signed by fifteen peers of the realm and a large number of members of Parliament. The prayer of the petitioners is that Her Majesty would take such measures as in her wisdom might be required to preserve this nation from the reimposition of the sacerdotal yoke which was cast aside in the sixteenth century. Among the speakers were Lord Kinnaird, Dr. Handley Moule, Mr. J. W. Mellor, M.P., Canon McCormick, Sir John Kennaway, Mr. T. A. Garfit, and Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P. Mr. Mellor held that liberty of conscience was at stake in the present crisis. He claimed the right to have the church service administered to him according to law. Years ago he was driven out of his church because of the doctrines and practices there, and he knew of many similar cases.

St. Giles' Christian Mission.—The workers of this mission have collected £60 towards the holiday home, orphanage, and convalescent home in connection with the work. All the workers are very poor.

The Peace Crusade.

IN a communication to the Leeds Mercury Mr. W. T. Stead writes:—"The crusade prospers bravely. The echo of the word which has been uttered in London in favour of an international movement in favour of peace has gone round the world. It has produced immediate and excellent results in the places where, of all others, it was most needful to make its influence felt, viz., in the governments of Russia and of England. The great meeting at St. James' Hall and the strong expressions of sympathy from influential leaders of English opinion have done much to encourage the Emperor of Russia in his resolve to persevere in his philanthropic designs. From the first time the Peace Rescript was issued, opinion in Russia has been divided, very much as it is here. The Emperor's initiative was hailed in some quarters with enthusiasm; in others was regarded as Utopian and impracticable.

"The long delay which took place in the despatch of Lord Salisbury's answer to the Rescript gave the party of reaction a great chance; and the preparations for war carried on in England, in view of the Fashoda difficulty, tended in the same direction. The hopes of the party of progress, with the Czar at its head, sank steadily, until at last they were so discouraged as to contemplate getting out of an impossible position by the expedient of reducing the Conference to a mere confabulation of the Ambassadors at St. Petersburg. It is not difficult to imagine with what joy, therefore, the proclamation of the Crusade in England has been received in Russia. It has been as a sudden outburst of light in a very dark place, and the Russians, who are keenly sensitive to the movement of opinion on the Continent, note with surprise and delight that the action of England has already produced a sensible effect upon the Press of Europe. If the English initiative is followed throughout the country, no one can predict how far-reaching may be its beneficent results.

"To quote even a tithe of the letters which have been received at the offices of the Crusade would fill many columns. Men and women of all parties and of all creeds have vied with one another in expressing their sympathy, and in urging the necessity of a truly international movement. The clergy are throwing themselves into the Crusade with an enthusiasm which promises to be contagious."

Mr. Stead's new weekly paper, War Against War, shows a very widespread feeling of sympathy among leading men at home and abroad with the object of the Czar's Rescript. It is stated that the Peace Conference, which was fixed for March, will not now be held till May. The Pope will not be invited, as the Italian Government will not participate if the Papal Court is represented.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Archbishop of Cape Town, opening a sale of work in aid of the extension of the Y.M.C.A. buildings, said he was glad to show his sympathy with the great and good work the institution was doing. It deserved the widest and most liberal support of Cape Town, for it had the moral, spiritual, physical, and intellectual interest of the young men of the city most closely at heart.

Mr. E. H. Thomas is leaving Bristol, where he has done much useful Y.M.C.A. work, to undertake the secretaryship of the Penzance Association.

The Wolverhampton Y.M.C.A. has just given a dinner to over 100 inmates of the common lodging-houses of the town.

The Putney Association has launched a building scheme, and has already received promises amounting to £600. A large meeting is to be held next month to bring the scheme to the notice of the public. A new building is also being acquired by the Woolwich Y.M.C.A.

The Darwen (Lancs.) Y.M.C.A., which has been in existence only since May last, has already 420 members, and has just issued a most attractive syllabus, containing a great variety of engagements.

Bible Society of Scotland.—During 1898 the Bible Society of Scotland has issued 920,893 Scriptures, the largest circulation ever effected in one year, and 118,000 more than in 1897. Lord Overtoun has accepted nomination as president of the society for the ensuing three years.

School of Bible Study.

AT length, Professor Wilbert W. White, whose work as a Bible teacher is well known in America and India, has opened his Ten Weeks' School for Bible Study in London. As the list given in our last week's issue shows, the course of ten lectures will be delivered in several centres. The syllabus gives particulars of five outline studies on separate books of theBible, and the same number of inductive studies on one book. Professor White needs no introduction to those who are conversant with Christian effort beyond our own shores; for the benefit of others it is enough to say that he is a graduate in Arts, Philosophy, and Divinity of Yale, and for some time was professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Literature in Xenia Theological Seminary, Ohio. He comes among us by invitation of the Y.M.C.A., the British College Christian Union, and the Y.W.C.A. Lord Kinnaird is president of the School, regarding which communications may be addressed to Miss L. Meager, assistant secretary S.B.S., 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W. To meet general conveniences the lectures will be on the various days of the week—every Tuesday at King's Hall, Holborn (5.30 p.m.), and Kensington Town Hall (8.30); Wednesdays, at Morley Hall, 26, George Street, W. (12 noon and 3 p.m.); Thursdays, at Hampstead Conservatoire (4.30), and Mildmay Park Conference Hall (8 p.m.); Fridays, at Eccleston Hall, S.W. (3.30), and the Polytechnic, Regent Street (8.30); and on Saturdays at the Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate Street, men only (3 p.m.). On Wednesday last week a reception was held at Exeter Hall, to meet Dr. White and the members of the local committees of the Bible School. There was a goodly gathering, and after prayer by Canon Girdlestone, introductory words were spoken by Lord Kinnaird and Mr. J. H. Tritton. Dr. White followed with an address on the Epistle to the Romans, after which there was a season of prayer, in the course of which the deep importance of the work was recognised, and the Divine blessing earnestly invoked.

Taken as a sample of what is to follow, Professor White's address raised high expectations; there was only time to deal with the first half of the Epistle, but by the use of crayon and canvas, the subject was very strikingly illustrated, so that to take in the instruction given. Professor White leaves others to talk about the Book; he aims at disclosing its actual contents and enabling the mind to detect and retain them. Seeing that most of the books of the Bible are so brief that they can be read through within half an hour, there is little excuse for anything less by way of study than occasional perusal of a complete book without interruption, and the recording of the impressions received in a word or sentence. If we do this with books, we should also do it with chapters, alike as to what they are in themselves, their relation to one another, and their teaching on great subjects common to Holy Scripture as a whole.

Along these lines, Professor White led his audience. Having made clear the grand theme of the epistle, as "God's Way of Saving People," he gave an outline treatment, showing as regards the way of salvation—its Necessity (i. 18—iii. 20); its Method (iii. 21—iv. 25); and its Results—God-ward, self-ward, Jew-ward, neighbour-ward and State-ward (v. 1—xvi. 27). The argument being laid bare, and the course of thought plainly indicated, it was pleasant to run through the chapters, to and associate the same with a single word. This led to such results as the following:—Chap. I.—Introduction (1-17), condition of the Gentile world inexcusable (18-22): Gentile. Chap. II.—Principles by which God judges; the Jews, too, according to these, are inexcusable: Jew. Chap. III.—The whole world is guilty; justification is by faith; God's righteousness is made available; boasting is excluded: Faith. Chap. IV.—Abraham is no exception to this, but rather the great illustration of it; David, by experience, testifies to the same: Abraham. Chap. V.—Results of faith; excess of effects of Grace over sin; parallel between the representative Adam and the redeeming Christ: Adam. Chapter VI.—Results of faith respecting conduct; illustration from death, burial, and resurrection, also from slavery; Resurrection. Chapter VII.—Illustration from marriage (1-6); the function of law is to reveal and not to relieve (7-25): Law, Chapter VIII.—Position of the justified; the Holy Spirit does what the Law cannot do: Spirit. The next three chapters give the solution of the problem of Jewish unbelief, the catchwords suggested being, Election, Free Grace, Olive Tree. Next comes Living Sacrifice (xii.), Love Fulfilling (xiii.), Meat (xiv.), Spain (xv.), and Phœbe (xvi.).

From these particulars, readers will gather that the study was inductive on the safest lines, and consisted in which cannot but yield gratifying results to those who follow it with diligence. Professor White has help for those who are disposed to help themselves; and with the scaffolding which he presents they may build at leisure as a result of independent study. Those who witnessed the elaboration of the lesson on Romans came away from Wednesday's meeting with a sense of having greatly profited, and a conviction that important facts had been implanted in the mind—facts to be called into the service of the Gospel in days to come. While calculated to assist all students, the Bible School will do much to equip Christian workers, and prepare them to use the written Word. Therefore, it is the prayerful hope of those who have organised the School that many will avail themselves of the advantages which it affords.

Eternal Life.

IF the whole be more than the part,
Then the spirit is more than the clay,
And she does not fall to the dart
When she spreads her wings to the day.

If good be greater than ill,
As life is greater than death,
"Our Father" must work his will
And give to the righteous breath.

If life is more than to be,
Then God must give of his best;
And the sons of faith shall see,
And the daughters of love shall rest.

If God be the Most High God,
There are heights that his children may climb,
For they follow the path He trod
When He rose from the plains of time.

There life shall be fuller, and love more sweet,
And the day shall know no night,
For the saved and the Saviour at last shall meet
And walk in the City of Light.

Evil-Speaking.

IN a recent letter Rev. Walter Bradbury says:—"Much hindrance in the Lord's work is occasioned by the evil tongue. So many never wait to hear the other side; a judge and jury must hear both sides. One day a lady asked me if I had heard a certain scandal about an evangelist. I replied at once, "I don't believe it." If this action were always taken until both sides were heard, what a world of evil would be avoided! It did me no harm to suspend my judgment, and would be infinite comfort to one falsely accused, and to gentle timid ones who have no spirit to defend themselves."

"The longer I live," said the famous Charles Simeon, "the more I feel the importance of the following rules."

1. To hear as little as possible what is to the prejudice of others.
2. To believe nothing of the kind until I am absolutely obliged to.
3. Never to drink in the spirit of evil reports.
4. Always to moderate, as far as I can, the unkindness which is expressed towards others.
5. Always to believe that if the other side were heard, a very different account would be given of the matter.

To all the accusations brought against Christ, He made no reply. "I held my tongue, and spake nothing. I kept silence."

International S.S. Lessons.

January 29.

"Christ at Jacob's Well."—John iv. 5-15.

Golden Text.—"Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst."—John iv. 14.

THE Pharisees had tried to bring Jesus into collision with John the Baptist, and this made it needful for Jesus to leave Judæa and go into Galilee (1). This, doubtless, as well as the journey, made Him weary, so that at eventide, while the disciples had gone to buy meat, He rested on the well.

Learn:—

(1.) Rest is needful for us as for our Master. There are times when God says to us, "Your strength is to sit still."

(2.) We may be tired in our work though not of it. Don't confuse the two.

(3.) Christ was yet ready for wayside ministries. Some of our best opportunities of pleasing God come in the usual course of life's way. Wait not for the great occasion. "Do the work that's nearest."

By the Wells of Life (6).

Jesus is by all the wells of life—wealth, poverty, success, failure, health and sickness—and He tries to teach us that the thing we see and feel is only a glass through which we may look at God and learn about Him. Blessed are they who can

See in every hedgerow
Marks of angels' feet.

The water of Jacob's well still tells of the living water which quenches the spirit's thirst.

The Unlikely Disciples.

Christ was always picking up unlikely people and transforming their characters (e.g., all the disciples, Zaccheus, &c.). He always changed them. This woman first called him Jew, (9), and then Sir, Prophet, Christ.

Christ saw in these people what no one else saw. So the fishermen of Galilee and woman of Samaria are known the wide world over, because Christ revealed the bad and the good that was in them; The former to cleanse it, the latter to develop it.

Jews and Samaritans (9).

"The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." (See 2 Kings xvii. 24-41.) Their mixed origin led the Jews to despise them, as also the fact that they were in part the descendants of the inveterate enemy of Israel.

Christ showed how he regarded the Samaritans by his treatment of this woman, and also by his parable of the Good Samaritan.

Christian charity should make us love all—in the sense that we must despise none, look for the best in all, and do good to all.

The Water of Life (10-14).

The water in Jacob's well is a symbol of all the waters which young people drink, trying to quench their spiritual thirst—knowledge, pleasure, ambition.

Illustrations:—

Pleasure. Lord Byron who tried every fount, yet said on his 30th birthday,

"My days are in the yellow leaf.
The flowers, the fruits of life are gone,
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone."

Ambition. Cardinal Wolsey, who fought for place and power, yet in the end said, "Had I but served my God with half the zeal I have served my king, He would not have left me in my old age, naked to mine enemies."

The Woman Misunderstood (15).

The woman says:—"Give me this water that I thirst not; it will save me the trouble of coming here to draw." Like many more she thought of physical water and a physical thirst. Christ at once brings her to look in upon her own spiritual weakness and sin by pointing to the wrong of her life. This is always the way He brings men to see their spiritual need and to feel their spiritual thirst.

We know that money and ambition and pleasure can neither forgive our sins or make us good. This drives us to seek the help of One who never fails. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God."

A Live Pastor and People.

Rev. H. W. SMITH, LANCASTER.

THE Free Churches of the ancient town of Lancaster provide an interesting part of its history. Under the shadow of the grim old castle is one of the quaintest, most delightful of Friends' Meeting Houses, full of memories of George Fox and the heroic age of Quakerism. In the High Street, among tall grey-stone houses, with green gardens in dignified retirement behind high walls, stands—four-square and sturdy—the original Independent Chapel. Some of its members even yet speak of the long way their grandfathers and mothers had to go to worship under the Five Mile Act before this building was allowed to take its modest but determined stand behind its straight row of sheltering trees.

Its daughter-church was formed in 1873 to celebrate the centenary of Congregationalism in Lancaster, and recently kept its "silver wedding." The twenty-five years of its life are of encouragement and interest to all who sympathise with God's work, especially connected with Nonconformity. The church-roll began with twenty-two names; it has now 420. The first church was an old dwelling-house adapted, now enlarged and used as a Sunday-school. The cellars underneath it are said to have been George Fox's hiding-place in the old troublous days. They have since held many casks of a less honourable freight, when Lancaster trafficked in the West Indies with rum as well as slaves.

The present handsome church was built in 1879, and is now to be enlarged and improved, to suit the enlarged work. Two at least of the founders of the church, Mr. Robert Mansergh and Mr. Edward Johnson, are still helpers of its work, and so is Mr. E. B. Dawson, whose family have been one of the pillars of the Congregational Church in Lancaster from the very first.

Rev. Adam Scott, now of Southport, was the first pastor, and was succeeded in 1884 by Rev. Henry Smith, whose portrait we give. Some people call him "a political parson," and it is true that he believes a minister retains the rights and duties of a citizen, with the added duty of stirring up his people to serve God in the Town Council and at the ballot box, as well as in the church; but he does not give his flock politics instead of the Gospel. "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" is his theme, with the "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," which are included in the true preaching of Christ.

His outspoken defence of right, and denunciation of wrong, and his large-hearted willingness to forward God's work outside as well as inside his own denomination, have made Mr. Smith a power for good in Lancaster. The whole town seems to claim him, and nods and smiles as he passes through its streets. His own people know that in him they have a friend and pastor as well as a preacher, and his genial presence and hearty hand-shake are ever welcome.

Many and vigorous agencies show that the Centenary Church is very much alive. The Sunday-school, with 550 scholars; children's Sunday evening mission of 600, and an active Christian Endeavour, are in addition to large attendances at the regular services and at the Lord's Supper. The mothers' meeting of more than 100 is presided over by Mrs. Smith's mother, Mrs. Bliss, a sweet and saintly old lady, whose presence is a constant benediction.

Perhaps the pastor's favourite child is the P.S.A. Brotherhood, started in 1893 to try and bring in the crowds of working-men who, in Lancaster as elsewhere, stream through the streets and in and out of the public-houses every Sunday. The Centenary church is filled with some 800 of these men each Sunday afternoon; some have joined the church and become active workers among their fellows. They recognise in their brotherly president, Mr. Smith, a parson who is also a man, and they willingly follow his lead. There are various kinds of P.S.A., but this is one which keeps to its aim, "to exalt Christ and ennoble the lives of the people." Among the extensions in immediate prospect is a Working Men's Institute arising from the P.S.A., for which a building is to be put up close to the chapel.

The Centenary Church is just now sharing in a wave of blessing granted to the town during united mission services arranged by the Free Church council. One member of the P.S.A. brotherhood set himself to bring one unconverted workmate each night of the mission, and each night his prayerful effort was rewarded by seeing his friend come to Christ as well as to the mission. Such a spirit in members and pastor will surely receive from on high the blessing which makes a successful church.

Villa Helvetia, Mentone.—The twenty-fourth annual report of this Home of rest for ladies says:—"The ladies who have been with us approached our ideal as to the class for whom the Home was originally opened. Hardly any of them were so ill as to give cause for real anxiety; they were able to enjoy to the full the beautiful climate, and to be constantly out of doors. They responded to the care taken of them, and have returned to their homes, some quite cured, others in a fair way towards recovery." All letters should be sent to Miss Dudgeon, Les Grottes, Mentone, Alpes Maritimes, France. The invalids are received on payment of £1 per week. The Home is closed during the summer months, and open from the 1st of November to the 1st of May. Application for admission should be made during the summer.

On the Brink of the River.

By Sir J. WILLIAM DAWSON.

AT the age of seventy-eight, and resting on the bank of the River of Death, I may perhaps venture to send a few encouraging words to younger pilgrims on the King's Highway.

It may be well to begin with the familiar admonition of our Saviour which He Himself places in the first rank: "Seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things (worldly and temporal needs) shall be added unto you." Matt. vi. 33. Here we have reference in the first place to that righteousness of Christ, by faith in which we are saved, but we have still more explicit reference to that high and bold Christian character which by God's Grace we can build up on our faith in Christ into a godly and holy life, leading to heavenly and everlasting glory. This should be the great object and ambition of every child of God, and especially of every Christian young man; and it does not exclude but promotes the highest success in any honourable and useful pursuit of a secular character. At the close of life you may, however, have to say as I now say, after a life largely spent in scientific and educational work: If I have any good cause of regret, it is that I have been able to do so little directly for Christ; if I have any cause for joy, it is that He has done so much for me, and that with all my infirmities He has enabled me to do even a little for his glory and for the good of others, though in looking back it seems all too little. In the words of Miss Havergal's beautiful hymn:

> Thou, Lord, hast brought to me
> Down from thy throne above,
> Salvation full and free,
> Thy pardon and thy love;
> Great gifts Thou broughtest me,
> What have I brought to Thee?

(Read in connection with this 2 Peter i. 6 and following verses by reference in the ordinary English version, which seems better in its rendering of this fine passage than the revised version.) It is very "blind" or rather short-sighted on the part of the young Christian to neglect the advice of the aged apostle. If you should be spared to old age, you would appreciate it, and perhaps regret that it did not more influence your earlier life.

Peter's advice has, however, special significance for those who are entering on the work of life at the present time; for these are assuredly the "last days." However mistaken our predecessors may have been in anticipating at too early a date the return of our Lord to set up his Kingdom, we cannot now be mistaken in believing that we are very near to the date indicated by both Daniel and John for the close of the "times of the Gentiles" which have lasted for 2,520 years, and for that of the great Apostacy, which for 1,200 years has ruled so large a portion of nominal Christendom.

We seem now to be at the beginning of that last judgment indicated by John under the symbol of the seventh bowl or vial of God's wrath, and though this has to be drained out before Christ comes again, it cannot occupy a very long time; and then, whatever view we take of the disputed questions respecting the Millennium, we may be sure at least that the binding of Satan and the deliverance of God's saints are drawing nigh. The young men of to-day may see the end of the systems of priest-craft, corrupt politics, militarism, and mammon-worship, and their allied evils which God's patience has so long suffered to prevail while He has been gathering in a people for Himself out of the world. In prospect of this, what manner of persons should we be in all holy conversation and godliness? How careful to avoid all that is evil or even questionable, how diligent to carry the gospel to those who are in darkness!—Men.

Other Lands.

Aden, Somaliland, &c.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

At our first view, Aden looks like a huge pile of rock, rising far up over the sea, on which the light of the setting sun will linger long after it has faded from the decks of the steamers and the houses on the quay. This is the soldiers' part of the town; all the rock is pierced for cannon, and some 1,200 soldiers are always here in garrison. The town itself lies on the other side of the rock, with some 20,000 population of all nationalities, principally Abyssinians, Arabs, and Somalis.

Some few miles, both from steamer point and the town itself, is Sheikh Othman, for ever associated with the memory of Ion Keith Falconer. Our steamer's engines are hardly still before I am accosted by two friendly men, well known in this place. One is Dr. John Young, who is carrying on Keith Falconer's work as a medical missionary, and at the same time acts as chaplain to the Presbyterian troops in this garrison. The other is Mr. Wm. Lethaby, a veteran worker for God, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. There will be just time, they say, while the mails and luggage are being transferred from the Himalaya to the Clyde for Bombay, for us to go on shore, and we gladly acquiesce.

At the foot of the gangway a number of native boats are waiting, each manned by a crew of four or five Somalis, with just a waist cloth for garment. Every man of every boat, at this particular moment, is shouting and gesticulating to the extreme amount of which I had supposed a human being capable. For some reason the boat against the steps is not for us, and it is clear that it must reluctantly withdraw from its position, and let another in. But to bring this about it seems as though the pit itself were moved. However, it is finally accomplished, and some seven of us, after imminent risk of falling between the steps and the waves, at last find ourselves aboard, and being rowed to the shore.

WHO COMPOSE OUR PARTY?

There is Dr. Young, stalwart, swarthy, frank, the very man for his great work here. He tells me that last year he treated at the Medical Mission premises upwards of 17,000 patients, of whom 14,000 were surgical cases; some of these had come as many as thirty-three days journey out of the heart of the desert. He is full of interesting matter, and when he comes to England next March to plead for his work, he ought to have a warm reception. The Mission itself is supported by the Free Church of Scotland, but he is anxious to add an orphanage for about 100 boys, whom he will train and send back among their own people, to support themselves by useful crafts, whilst they speak the good news of the Gospel.

Next is Mr. Lethaby, whose face bears the evidence of the stern battle he has fought through a long and useful life dedicated to service for the Master. He was one of the first Englishmen to open up Moab for Biblical investigation, and the preaching of the Word. He tells me that his sales of Bibles and portions here amount to some 500 copies annually, and that his repository is constantly resorted to by those who want further instruction. He complains that no effort is made for these thousands of idolaters, Moslems, and Jews, except to persuade them that sin is safe, and that it is best to "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." They are a polyglot conglomerate of Aryan, Semitic, Hamitic sinners, for whom the sons of Japhet are doing nothing.

Then we have Dr. Macphail and his delightful wife, who is also a qualified medical missionary. They are returning after their furlough and marriage in Scotland to work among the Santhals. Also Mr. McCowen, who is giving up a lucrative practice as a lawyer, in Tralee, to devote himself to the thousands of young Englishmen in Rangoon. Dr. Anna Church is going out to superintend the new hospital in Calcutta, to be opened by Lady Curzon in February. Miss Lloyd is on her way to assist Miss Orlebar in her blessed work of recruiting and refreshing missionaries on the Neilgherry Hills. There is Mrs. Ferguson also, whom an accident to her foot prevented from accompanying her husband when he started for China in the spring, but who is now hastening to him with their two children. Mrs. Meyer and myself complete the party.

Who are these vivacious, sinewy lads, who are tugging so vigorously at the oars, cheering one another by a strange guttural chant? Some of them have well-shaped heads and intelligent faces, their skin a beautiful bronze.

THESE ARE SOMALIS.

Dr. Young is much interested in them. Their native country has just come under the direct control of this country. It was formerly administered from Aden; now it has its own British Resident. A day and a night's sail across the water would bring us to the Somali country on the coast of Africa, with a population of 100,000 souls, mostly pastoral. Dr. Young says that they are a brave, pure-living, and intelligent race; nominally Mohammedans, but not bigoted, and their women are not veiled. The men are fearless—one of them will face a lion or half a dozen Arabs. A dictionary of their language has been compiled, and there is an open door for missionary work.

After a mile's row we reach the shore. The general excursion is to see the great rock-hewn tanks, which are credibly dated from the days of the Pharaohs, and indicate the importance attached to this rock as a fortress in those distant days. There are still great supplies of water prepared here by distillation. As a calling-place for ships, whether for supplies of water or coal, and as commanding the entrance to the Gulf of Suez, the possession of this fortress, which we have held since the Queen's accession, is of first-rate importance to our Government. It is the Gibraltar of the Red Sea.

We walk through the soldiers' quarters to the garrison chapel, with its simple marble tablet to "the dear memory of Ion Keith Falconer." Dr. Young provides tea in the vestry, after which we have a bright and interesting service, and three addresses are given, full of loving and manly appeals to our soldier-brothers.. How splendidly they sing "Jerusalem, the Golden," "Jesus calls us o'er the tumult," and others! I notice one wipes tears from his eyes after the closing prayer. They wait to shake hands; honest, frank, intelligent fellows. But Dr. Young says the place is full of temptations for such as they.

But we must not linger. Away out to sea we can see the lights of the Clyde, and cannot be sure to a nicety when she may be wanting to get away. So we return to the landing-stage, and with four of these young sinewy Somalis rowing hard, we cross the dark waters, the warm night wind in our faces. A funny little fellow, perhaps twelve or thirteen years of age, guides the rudder, sings the weird boat song to encourage the rest, and now and again thrusts his little brown hand insinuatingly towards us, whispering under his breath the familiar word baksheesh.

Anon, we weigh anchor, and make across the Indian Ocean on our five days and nights for Bombay; and what a storage of love there is in our hold—with Christmas gifts, cards, letters, which will send a thrill of love and joy and home-longing throughout the whole empire of India. The sorting room is next our cabin, and we can see the employés dropping the precious packets and letters into the upright brown canvas bags, labelled with the names of great cities and far distant provinces. Most are in women's handwriting, from the shaky characters of some grandmother by the Scotch loch for the soldier laddie, to the large round hand of the baby girl to her officer or missionary father. Women are the vestal priestesses of the home life, so careful to anticipate in good time the coming festival, and so eager to bridge the gulf with a thread, delicate as gossamer, strong as an anchor cable!

What joy our mail bags carry, like compressed sunshine and heat, waiting for delivery at tea plantations, missionary bungalows, soldiers' quarters; to bring a mist of tears into the eyes of strong men, who hastily dash them aside as they catch a hasty sight of the writing of mother, sister, beloved wife, little child, bosom friend. This blessed festival of our home-life keeps us pure and sweet: is like the salt of this great ocean. It binds the absent to mansion or cottage, city-home or country-village, Highland shieling or Irish cabin, and sends the pulse of home love and home-memory to the furthest arteries of the Empire.

There is a touch of poetry and pathos in the thought that the penny postage within the British Empire should date from Christmas Day, as though the special prerogative of the post were to strengthen the ties which bind our colonies to the old Mother Land—our common home. O blessed human love, which, as the waste of waters intervenes, neither slackens nor recedes, but seems strongest, purest, most tenacious, when loved ones are separated by hemispheres!

Factory Girls in Japan.

It is usually thought that Christmas and New Year cards received with names printed or written on them cannot be of any further use. In Japan, however, the inscriptions being unreadable to the girls, they are greatly appreciated for their pretty designs or finish. The Japanese cotton factories have boarding-houses containing from 100 to 2,000 girls; they are bound for three years, and in some cases the rules of the company do not permit them to go outside the walls for fear they will run away or enter other factories; the monotony of their lives is almost unbearable, for they are mostly country girls used to freedom.

The factories Miss Holland has visited employ altogether 20,000 girls, but extending her circle she could get access by God's blessing to 50,000 girls. Tokens of loving sympathy from Christian friends in England sent with prayer will bring joy to many hearts. Although this request is for Christmas cards, it need hardly be said that reward cards, scrap pictures, scrap books, fans made of post-cards, old numbers of chidren's or other illustrated magazines, dolls, or any fancy articles, and musical instruments would be of great service. One set of things will go round to all the factories for entertainment during the recreation hour.

Working people and Sunday school children can afford a halfpenny stamp and send up to two ounces weight of cards direct to Miss Holland, 12, Conassian, Osaka, Japan. Parcels can now be conveniently sent by the Canadian Parcel Post.

Christian Officials in Japan.

AT the opening of the present session of the Japanese Diet, the Liberal party had a majority in the Lower House, and the President of the last session was again chosen to the same position. He is an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and a very earnest Christian. At the close of the last Diet he had a prayer meeting in the official residence, and stated that it had been his custom to ask God's blessing and guidance at the beginning of every meeting. There is no one in the Liberal party who has greater influence in deciding as to the policy to be adopted. It is, therefore, practically settled that the course of the government in the future will be favourable to the missionaries and their work.

The President of the Liberal party is Count Itagaki. He is not a professed Christian, but for a long time has used his influence to help the work. In his recent position as Minister of Home Affairs he made inquiries regarding the value of Buddhist teachings among the convicts in prison. The result was the appointment of a Christian chaplain in Tokyo, and it is reported that it is to be the same in other places.

The Buddhist priests made a protest against any change, and threatened serious trouble if the appointment was not revoked. But they were told to mind their own business, and not interfere in the administration of affairs on the part of the Government.

The President of the Lower House of the Diet is the representative of the Province of Tose, and he has been chosen to that office at every election since a Parliament was established. It is reported that at the last election he received every vote except two. That one who has been so prominent as a Christian should be thus continually honoured is an evidence of a great

CHANGE IN THE PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

Another significant and quite remarkable fact has been the election of a Christian representative from the City of Kyoto. It is a great religious centre, and the stronghold of Buddhism. The priests made a special effort to prevent his election, and their failure indicates that they no longer control the men of influence and power.

The first wife of the Minister of War was a Christian woman. A son of the Minister of the Navy is a Christian. A recent Governor of Tokyo, and the head, or warden, of this prison are Christians. One of the most distinguished men in the Japanese Navy said to his family on his dying bed that he wished them all to become Christians. Two Bibles have been presented to the Emperor and one to the Empress.

There are Christian teachers in the Nobles' School, the Puresses' School, the University, the Higher Normal School, the Naval Academy, and other leading educational institutions. An officer in the army told me that there were recently nine Christian officers and nearly thirty men in the Nagoya garrison alone. The president of the Y.M.C.A. in Tokyo is a captain in the navy and a graduate of Annapoli Academy.

The president of the Progressive party is also friendly to Christianity, and while at the head of the Cabinet said that Japan was under great obligations to the Americans, because they had sent here so many missionaries.

No one in Japan has been so prominent as a statesman, or had so long or so successful a career, as Marquis Ito. On his return from Europe and the United States he spoke approvingly of the missionaries and their work. He has recently been making a visit to China, and I am informed by a friend who was present at some of his most important interviews with the Chinese authorities that, while he is not a professed Christian, his words were those of a Christian statesman, especially so when he exposed the dangers arising from official corruption, and recommended the most liberal attitude towards Christianity.

The visit to Japan of Rev. Geo. C. Needham and wife has been very providential and of much value to our work. His meetings have stimulated the missionaries and others to more careful and persistent study of God's Word, and furnished to all Christian workers an impressive lesson in the importance of using the Bible as God's instrument for the conversion of sinners and the strengthening of the believers. There have been a great number of conversions, and all have been shown that it is not a new Gospel that is needed to change sinful lives, but the "Old, old story of Jesus and his love." H. LOOMIS.

Movements in China.

IN a letter from Shanghai, dated at the end of October last, Rev. Timothy Richards says:—

"When in Pekin, I had made an appointment with the Emperor's tutor to meet and discuss measures for extending Western education throughout all the provinces, and arrangements were being made by which I was to have an audience with the Emperor, as his young reforming advisers were very friendly, and were discussing seriously the advisability of adopting the Christian religion generally.

"You know the sequel—how the Emperor was dethroned by the Empress-Dowager, and how six reformers were beheaded and the most prominent sympathisers were degraded for life, while some were condemned to imprisonment for life. All this persecution and violence is very painful, but the reformers died bravely—worthy Christian martyrs.

"The effect of this violence is not fully seen yet; but some of the reformers in Shanghai are coming to me inquiring how to join the Christian Church. They meet in my house on Sundays. The Chinese girls' school, started in Shanghai by the natives last winter with much enthusiasm, has lately developed into two, and a third such school is expected to be opened shortly. Last week the director of the China Telegraph Company, who was the chief mover in this, placed these schools under my control, so that the Government cannot confiscate the property nor shut up the schools, as they will now be under British protection.

"The Empress-Dowager has also issued an Edict with strict instructions to all the Mandarins high and low to protect the mission. Thank God for that! In the time of our prosperity we thanked God for the great results, as they affected the whole nation, from comparatively small means. Now, in the time of adversity we must look to God for guidance and wisdom greater than ever; and, in due time, He will bring his purposes to pass. Let us plead with God to raise up men and women who shall more than take the place of the dead martyrs, and some day we shall rejoice together over the multitudes whom no man can number, saved from poor distracted China."

Writing a month later, Mrs. Richards says:—"What has occurred lately, that seems so disastrous, may turn out rather to the furtherance of the Gospel. The carrying out of Rev. Gilbert Reid's scheme may have to be postponed, but the hunger for the books seems to continue. Not only so, but some Mandarins have been asking for baptism, and fresh ones are coming for religious conversation."

A Missionary Cruise.

A MEMBER of the party that recently went to Algiers on a missionary cruise for school boys and others, organised by Rev. Norman Bennet, gives some cheering particulars in a letter dated from Tunis, January 4. On the outward voyage the writer gave five addresses in the saloon, some of them lectures and some homely talks. There was a good deal of conversation with individual groups. The mission party numbered about fifty, and the lectures were attended by 100 to 120, so that a number of the general passengers were interested.

In visiting the mission stations of the North Africa Mission the missionaries everywhere commended themselves to all. The young members of the visiting party much admired the courage of the four ladies at Tetuan, living alone in such a wild place. Some of the missionaries held a missionary meeting on board the ship. There were many professed Christians in the party—adults and boys. Some of the latter got blessing en route, and some it is hoped began the new life, while the Christians were aroused. The careless people on the ship were discussing religion and missions. Prayer was answered everywhere for weather and landings and there was never a serious hitch in anything.

Home Missions.

The National Refuges.

OUR readers have for many years been familiar with the appeal headed, "Homeless Boys of London," with its pathetic title reminding the wealthy citizens of the great metropolis of the misfortune and misery under which many poor lads are suffering.

For fifty-five years the National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children have been established for the especial benefit of destitute boys and girls who have not fallen into ways of dishonesty, but whose circumstances render them peculiarly liable to the danger of drifting into crime. It must ever be in the highest interests of the State to foster these beneficent voluntary agencies, which stretch out a helping hand in the very nick of time, to rescue the honest poor from the great perils of their surroundings. Especially important is the work of saving the children—a truth which, in the year 1843, so impressed itself upon the heart and mind of William Williams (the honoured founder of the National Refuges) that with the assistance of a few like-minded men he over a cowshed in the old rookery of St. Giles', Bloomsbury, wherein about half-a-dozen utterly friendless little ones were provided with food and shelter.

Since then God has wonderfully blessed this work, and there are now eight homes on shore and two training ships on the river Thames to bear witness to the genuineness and development of this truly Christian enterprise.

A leading feature of the institution is the absence of the voting system. Each case is dealt with by experienced officers according to its merits. The admission committee—a very practical and hard-working body of benevolent gentlemen—meet every fortnight; and it is therefore impossible for applicants to be long kept in suspense. Indeed, it is constantly occurring (as was the case only last week) that the secretary, Mr. H. Bristow Wallen, has to report that certain children have been admitted on the very day of application, without awaiting the meeting of the committee. District visitors, as well as the clergy, know the benefit of so prompt a method of dealing with urgent cases.

Since its establishment the society has received 14,850 destitute boys and girls and trained them to earn their own living. The boys in the homes are taught tailoring, shoemaking, carpentering, gardening, and such-like useful trades. The 200 girls at the Sudbury and Ealing homes are carefully trained for domestic service with special instruction in cookery, thanks to the help of the Worshipful Company of Cooks, who generously provide the ways and means for this essential branch of domestic economy. Mr. Francis Hammond, of the Cook's Company, is also a valued friend of the National Refuges, and has rendered great service to the society and to the girls themselves by securing such privileges as these homes enjoy. At the present moment children being supported by the society in its several branches, and it is worth a personal visit to either branch in order to realize the thoroughness of the training these children receive. It should be particularly noted that the homes and ships are always open for inspection, an invitation for scrutiny which no committee would venture to give unless quite certain that the result would be satisfactory. It not unfrequently happens that the President of the Society, the Right Hon. the Earl of Jersey, will pay a surprise visit to one or other of the homes. Even the farm schools at Bisley, Surrey, situated three miles from Brookwood Station, are not exempt from his lordship's unexpected appearance. This is as it should be, and affords the benevolent public strong proof, not only of Lord Jersey's fatherly interest in the work, but also of the genuineness of the institution, which freely courts such examination.

Considering how greatly England is dependent upon her navy for the maintenance of peace and prosperity, it is not surprising that such voluntary training ships as should be exceedingly popular with all classes of the community, especially as the highest possible percentage of the lads actually follow the seafaring life. No boy is placed on these ships as a punishment. Only lads of good character and desirous of becoming sailors are received. The total number trained and sent into the Royal Navy and merchant service exceeds 6,000.

Complete success has also followed the emigration of well-trained lads to Canada; and very interesting letters are frequently received by the various superintendents from their old boys.

The addresses of the homes and ships are as follow:—The Arethusa and Chichester training ships, at Greenhithe, Kent: London Home, 164, Shaftesbury Avenue; Working Boys' Home, 164A, Shaftesbury Avenue; Boys' Home, Fortescue House, Twickenham; Farm School and Shaftesbury School, Bisley, Surrey; Girls' Home, Sudbury Hall, Wembley, Middlesex; Girls' Home, Ealing House, St. Mary's Road, Ealing. There is also the Training Ships Depôt, 100, East India Dock Road, E.; and a further shipping agency is maintained at Newport, Monmouthshire.

The Servants' Mission.

AFTER thirty-two years of steady, quiet work in the West End of London, some of the far-reaching results of this work were revealed at an interesting meeting recently held at the new headquarters in Eaton Terrace. From letters read, requests for praise and prayer, and happy testimonies, it soon became clear that many of the converts and associates of the mission, having been faithful in that which was least, had been called to wider fields elsewhere. To India, China, Australia Canada, the United States, South America, North and South Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Italy, France, Switzerland, besides many parts of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, have these been scattered, taking with them the knowledge of Christ Jesus.

Some are now missionaries, evangelists, scripture readers, and mission helpers. Others earn their bread with their hands, and do definite work for God in their spare time. Short extracts from their letter will perhaps give the best idea. From Buenos Ayres one writes:—"I am still working on the railway, and am making slow but sure progress with the Spanish. On Sunday mornings I go to the docks with two or three other young fellows, and we visit the English ships, giving tracts and gospels. In the evening a large open-air meeting is held, watched over by a little dark-skinned policeman, who walks off the first man who attempts to disturb."

From Canada another writes:—"I have just returned from a three weeks' mission at Port Huron, where we had much blessing and many souls for our hire. At the close of the last service on the fourth Sunday flames broke out from an over-heated flue, and the wooden building was destroyed. . . . I felt that I had been baptized for the services of that day as I had never been before." From China came requests for prayer on behalf of an old mission worker, now a C.I.M. missionary, and for blessing on the work of a native helper at Hua-Pu, who is maintained by the Servants' Mission, and who represents in China those who cannot go themselves.

Among the speakers were a missionary from China, and a country worker from Herts. The latter seemed to bring the fresh country air and buoyancy with him as he spoke with a radiant face on Praise suggested by Psalm cv. The meeting closed with a brief word from Mr. Goodchild, the secretary.

Shaftesbury Institute, Lisson Grove.

THE Christmas and New Year's gatherings for the poor are an important part of the work of the Shaftesbury Institute. In an account of recent meetings, Miss Meredith Brown says:—

"It is at Christmas time only that we show hospitality to those among whom we are working, for we never give meals for the purpose of gathering meetings. One of the most successful evenings was the dinner on January 4, when 400 men, gathered from the common lodging houses in our immediate neighbourhood, were our invited guests. About 280 were accomodated at tables in the mission hall, and two additional rooms, which had been prepared, received the remaining 120.

"For several years Mr. Charles Cook, of the Metropolitan Music Hall, has kindly addressed the men, while his well-trained choir have brightened the evening by singing. Never did Mr. Cook speak with greater power than on this occasion, and men, with vice-marked faces, seemed to hang on his words. Many were touched, and brushed away tears that would come! One man in the gallery was overheard to taunt his neighbour with it. 'What do yer want to cry for?' Their better nature has been obscured by a life of sin, but was it not just such that the Son of Man came to seek and to save? 'Are not these tears in thy Book?' The record of the deepest part of the work is with God, and the Day will declare it."

"Bird's Nest," Kingstown.

FOR upwards of forty years the "Bird's Nest" has been receiving destitute and necessitous children of any denomination, and instructing them in the fear of God and the knowledge of his Holy Word. Strong drink is one of the most prolific causes of destitution and misery, and is no respecter of persons, as the following letter shows:—

"Dear Madam,—I am anxious to find a home for a little girl, aged nearly eight. Her father is a doctor by profession, but from drink he is a complete wreck, and has lost practice and position. Her mother, a Roman Catholic, died about two years ago from the same unfortunate cause. My husband, a doctor, told me of the case as the man was then believed to be dying and was placed in the infirmary. I have helped with clothes, boots and money, but all were speedily turned into the one thing—drink. The child's constant employment is fetching beer. The relatives have suffered so much annoyance from the father's evil habits that they will not do any more, and the child is left in one of the lowest quarters of the city, her father's health being utterly ruined, leaving him unfit for work of any kind.

"It may be said that such a child will surely be a disappointment, and develop evil tendencies which cannot be controlled. This, however, is not the case, and I could give a great many instances where the children of drunkards have received Christ, and become exemplary young men and women. There are four boys of one family who were received into our Homes under such circumstances, and they are all earnest Christian young men, occupying middle class positions, where I have the privilege of seeing them frequently.

"Two little girls have been lately admitted to the 'Bird's Nest' because their parents are reduced to destitution through persecution by the priest and Roman Catholic acquaintances. Their landlord evicted them from their lodging, and when they continued to send their children to the mission schools and attend the Gospel meetings, they found it impossible to get work.

"Many of our earliest friends and supporters have passed away, and we feel the need of new help very much. For forty years we have had no lack, but this year we are considerably overdrawn at our bank, and shall need some £1,000 or more before March 31.

Bible Study.—Five towns in the north of England are arranging for a series of addresses on Bible Study during the early part of the year under the direction of Rev. George Soltau. Each town will be visited once a week for the holding of two classes, until the course is finished. The first lectures will be given at Darlington on Monday, January 30, and Mr. Soltau will visit Darlington every succeeding Monday until Easter. The Tuesday of each week will be given to Middlesborough, the Wednesday to Stockton, the Thursday to West Hartlepool, and the Friday to Sunderland. The afternoon course will be "The Four Portraits of the Lord Jesus Christ in the Four Gospels," and the evening course will be devoted to "Genesis, Exodus, Romans, Hebrews." The lectures will be expository and devotional.

Work on Sunday Mornings.

PAUL, in his farewell address to the Church of Ephesus, said: "Remember that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears." Going from house to house, too. In such a way the churches were built up, and the Gospel triumphed in spite of all its foes. Is there much of this preaching now?

Hundreds of times I have denied myself the pleasure of worshipping with the people of God on the Sunday morning to go and accost men in the street, beg of them to be saved, not by addressing them in crowds (my voice was not strong enough for that), but going to them in groups or singly and offering them the gift of God. It seemed to me selfish to go and enjoy the means of grace, with the streets of this large town crowded with thousands of working men who will not enter a place of worship. What is lawful may sometimes not be expedient, and with the world rushing down as it is, I have often felt that I was in my right place going on the Sunday morning from one to another and appealing to them personally. The grand truths in the third and fourth of John were not addressed from a pulpit, but to single persons.

This wide gap wants occupying; if no one else is filling it the reader had better try to do it, and you will find the grace you need. If you go with a bundle of tracts the Lord can select the one for each person that is suited to their state. Often an unpremeditated word has come like a message from the Almighty, and I felt God has spoken there, not me. There is nothing dignified in doing this, but the Son of God was not what the world calls high-minded, had no worldly dignity, but was "meek and lowly in heart." Should the disciple be above his Master or the servant above his Lord?

As I stood talking to a group of rough-looking men, some fine-dressed people passed on their way to their place of worship. They looked quite surprised to see a tradesman doing such a thing. They seemed to wonder where I got my commission from.

A young man with shattered nerves was begging and said, "My own father was my ruin." It was true. Another man said, "I have ordered my landlady, that when I am dying, and anyone comes to speak to me about religion, she must tell them to go about their business."

One morning I was going about in poverty of spirit, had no liberty, felt discouraged, and good for nothing; went up to a smart-looking young man, spoke a few words, and offered a gospel tract, when he turned on me with eyes of bitter scorn and said, "Don't you know you are making yourself look ridiculous, and are making even Christians laugh at you?" Thoughtlessly I said, "Well, I don't care!" and was passing on, when I felt I had not spoken the truth; so I turned back and said to the young man, "I did wrong to say I did not care for what you said, for I felt it very keenly; but I will bear the pain for the sake of Jesus."

Going up to three great strong-looking men, who each had a dog tied by a string, and seemed like dog-fighters, and had come from one of the collieries, I said without any preface, "Will you let Jesus save you?" They seemed taken aback; they were not accustomed to being asked such a question in the street. They answered, "We should have to give up our dogs; we can't come to Jesus." If conscience required them to give up fighting and dogs before they could be saved, they were right.

Someone said that "whenever the Son of God saw a crowd it made Him feel sorry." Oh, for more of the spirit of Him who stood weeping for men on the hillside, and who left the throne above, and was glad when tired and weary, to sit on the top of a stone wall and rest Himself. Many a time I have felt ashamed that I spoke the stupendous facts of the gospel with so little emotion. The first man I found courage to speak to personally, outside, after my conversion, was one selling fruit on a barrow one Sunday morning. This man told me years after that what was said awakened him, that he gave up selling on Sundays, attended the Methodist Chapel and found salvation.

If the churches are to be revived, the lay members will have to do more themselves, and not throw the whole responsibility on the ministry. E. Binns.

About Books.

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

SOME of these not referred to in our last issue may be briefly noted. Good Words has an interesting account of a visit to the poet Whittier by Edmund Gosse. The "Sunday Readings" are by Dr. Alex. Maclaren. The Sunday Magazine has a timely paper by Dr. George Smith, of Edinburgh, on Mr. Gladstone and missions. A new story by "David Lyall" opens well. The Young Man and the Young Woman are most attractive and readable numbers. The former begins a story by that well-known raconteur of soldier life, E. Livingstone Prescott. A leading item in the contents of the Home Messenger is brief sketches, with portraits, of some young but eminent Gospel ministers.

SOME FRENCH BOOKS.

It has been a pleasure to examine three more publications from the evangelical publishing house of J. H. Jeheber, Rue du Marché 28, Geneva.

First comes a work which should help many in the study of the Apostolic Acts and Epistles—L'Apôtre Paul et le Monde Ancien (8frs.) This goodly volume of 500 pages is a free translation by Jules Gindraux of an excellent German work by Pastor Schneller, of Cologne. There is no lack of literature regarding Bible times and lands, but we know of no book that covers the same ground as this, and in the same instructive and helpful way. The author traces the Apostle in his great missionary journeyings. If he had actually accompanied him he could hardly have written with more animation. Having gone over the ground as a traveller, and studied antiquities, monumental and otherwise, Pastor Schneller sets events in their place in geography and history, and makes them "live" to the mind of the reader. This remarkable book outlines in descriptive style, and with abundance of illustration, over twenty years of the Apostle's life—from the preaching in Cyprus (Acts xiii.) to the martyr's death at Rome. The translator prefixes an introductory chapter on events anterior to the Cyprus mission. This work, which is furnished with a map and many excellent engravings, deserves a worthy place among lives of the great Apostle to the Gentiles.

From ancient travel we pass to modern. To visit a country, and then write a book about it, is nothing new; but to go to America with such motives as actuated Pastor Frank Thomas, of Geneva, and then to produce a volume such as he has entitled Nouveau Monde (4frs.) is quite exceptional. A keen observer and a practised writer, M. Thomas set on travel for three months to see what there was to be seen in the United States; and being above everything an Evangelist he determined upon giving special attention to America's religious institutions and philanthropic activity. He was particularly desirous of studying the efforts made to win the young to the Gospel, and very naturally he inscribes his book, first to Mr. James Stokes, the well-known benefactor of the Y.M.C.A., and then to his own beloved people in Switzerland. In the first part of his book, M. Thomas gives recollections of his journeyings, and here he is pleasantly descriptive and historical; in the second part he deals with the American churches and their work, devoting an entire chapter to labour among the young, and ends with an account of Northfield and its round of agencies, evangelistic and educational, under the direction of Mr. Moody. M. Thomas writes with enthusiasm of much that he saw—not of all; and his pages are embellished with several illustrations.

The third book before us belongs to a totally different branch of literature. Misunderstanding and assumption are responsible for much that passes under the name of conflict between religion and science; and much has been written to assist those who, as a result of such tendencies, have fallen into the slough of mental and spiritual despondency. A thorough piece of work in this line comes from the pen of F. Bettex, with the title La Religion et les Sciences de la Nature (6 frs.) Being profoundly convinced that the living and personal God of whom the Bible speaks is the necessary centre of a rational universe; that the Creator and his creation are not contradictory; and that the discoveries of science do not, and never will, disprove God's Word, M. Bettex writes strongly. But he writes with a grasp of scientific theory as well as Christian truth, and he easily shows how little of genuine science there is behind some of the great swelling terms of modern thought. Professor M. Thury, of the University of Geneva, contributes an introduction, in which he rightly remarks upon the author's striking style and great ability in presenting a large number of facts without confusing the reader. This is no new line of instruction for M. Bettex. Already this and other works of his having a like object have had a large circulation in Germany. We trust the pages will be placed in the hands of those who have been landed in unbelief by way of the premature "findings" of natural science and philosophical speculation.

Young and inexperienced Sunday-school workers will find valuable hints with illustrative examples in Sunday Teaching, by Mrs. Woods Baker. (6d. net. Headley Brothers.)

The New Year's message issued by the Open Air Mission to its members and friends is this year entitled Led in Triumph, and is written by Pastor Fuller Gooch. It emphasises some of the more encouraging aspects of Christian life and service. (11, Adam Street, Strand. 1d. each, and 6s. per 100.)

Across Three Oceans and through many Lands. By F. Reynolds. (C. H. Kelly.) A young observant traveller round the world by way of India, New Zealand, and Canada here records his experiences in a pleasant chatty way. The descriptions are profusely illustrated with products of the author's camera.

A pleasant addition to Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier's half-crown series of story books is In the Heart of the Hills, by Hettie E. Colter. It tells of the resolves and fruitful service of a young lady who devoted her life to work among rough miners on the Pacific slope. We must leave the reader to discover the pleasant dénouement.

Rev. R. Roy Chowdhury, a well-known Christian missionary, has written a paraphrastic explanation of the Apocalypse, with the title The Oriental Exposition of Revelation, or the Latter Days' Events. The pages throw sidelights upon the much-debated symbols, but want of arrangement is a weak feature of the book. (One rupee. N. Banerji, 11, Wellesley Street, Calcutta.)

Rev. F. B. Meyer's Daily Homily, which was originally published week by week in our columns and greatly appreciated, has met also with much acceptance in book form. Vol. IV. just issued (1s. 6d. Morgan & Scott) contains the daily portions on each chapter from Isaiah to Malachi, inclusive. Need we remind our readers that Mr. Meyer's meditations are ever marked by beauty of thought, expression, and illustration; above all they are practical as bearing on the daily life.

Members of improvement societies and similar institutions will find much to help them in a Handbook for Literary and Debating Societies, by Laurence M. Gibson, M.A. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) After a perspicuous chapter of directions for the guidance of chairmen, we have here summaries of arguments (both sides) on scores of subjects, political and social, educational, literary, and religious, with ample references to sources of information. In conclusion, there are hints regarding other topics. Members of such organisations as Mr. Gibson has aimed at helping will find the pages just what they need; while the book should also be of service to many in directing thought and reading on subjects of practical importance.

In The Age of the Maccabees, with special reference to the religious literature of the period, Rev. A. W. Streane, D.D., deals with a subject having important critical bearings. The volume is the eighth in the Bible Student's Library, all of which have proved of signal service in meeting the questions raised by ancient and modern rationalism. These pages are not to any extent controversial; they instruct positively on an important period of Jewish history, and the information which they give regarding the people and their literature, their politics and religion, is of great service in the thorough study of the New Testament. There are well-digested chapters on the Apocrypha, the Septuagint, and Apocalyptic literature; and in appendices, Dr. Streane deals with the Assideans and their relation to the Pharisees; the traditional account of the succession of leading Jewish teachers from Ezra till the destruction of the Temple by the Romans; and the date of the Book of Daniel. This is a work of great value, and while written for non-experts it is furnished with many footnotes which scholars will appreciate. (6s. Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Religious Education at Schools.

SIR,—I trust parents will carefully read and prayerfully digest the weighty words of Rev. H. J. R. Marston, reported on page 20, 21 in your issue for last week. His address forms a serious indictment against some of the masters of public schools and college tutors, who "by tacit connivance or deliberate aspersion question and weaken the authority of Scripture in the minds of the young." In the Preparatory Schools Review for last July will be found an able paper by a form master, in which the writer formulates the views on religious education which, in his opinion, should be imparted to young boys, preparing for the public schools. He says: "If we are ourselves convinced that the new learning alone gives coherence to the Bible history, and justifies the ways of God to man in a manner more satisfying to reason than any of the methods of interpretation which satisfied less inquisitive ages, then surely it is our duty to bestow the new light on the rising generation." This is a very honest declaration, such as might be expected from a cultured master at a high class preparatory school; but it is painful reading to those who conscientiously cling to the "old paths."

No one can read the educational journals of the present day without seeing that the graduates into whose hands the sons of the upper classes are entrusted have not only read the works of Driver, Robertson Smith, and other rationalists, but have accepted their teaching without questioning or reserve, and feel it their duty to show off their own new learning by inculcating the poisonous germs of the higher criticism into the susceptible minds of the young lads committed to their care. Your readers would be startled if they only knew how very numerous are the cultivated tutors who have not the least hesitation in shocking the early, pure, and simple faith of boys of tender years by teaching them that the Biblical accounts of the Creation and the Fall are more the products of a poetical imagination than historical truth; that Moses did not write the Pentateuch; and that modern research has upset the canon of scripture with respect to the authorship of the prophecy of Isaiah. In short, according to these classical and mathematical tutors of our youth, the Bible is not holy, but intensely human, containing almost as much error as truth.

With a faith weakened as regards the authority of Holy Scripture, a lad goes to a public school: and there men, terribly in earnest, inoculate into him the pernicious teaching of saving grace through priests and sacraments, as agents and instruments.

But the most pressing danger arises from the culpable indifference and carelessness of parents. Indeed, Mr. F. A. Hort, in his paper in the Preparatory Schools Review, from which I have already quoted, says that in teaching the new learning "a tutor may occasionally hear a protest from a parent, but most often not protests but total indifference." Before placing a son with a tutor, or at school, parents make every possible inquiry—tithing mint, cummin, and anise—with respect to food, comfort, and health, and they are right in so doing; sometimes also they will put a question about general education; but so far from pure Evangelical teaching being cared for "first of all" (to quote Mr. Marston), it is regarded as a matter of no consequence, provided only the boys are happy and well, and the school, by its respectability and standing, adds to the social cultus of the family to which the boy belongs. I write from an experience extending to thirty years.

During the next few days tens of thousands of boys and girls will join the various schools throughout the country, and parents will do well if they pay earnest attention to the quality and nature of the religious teaching imparted at those establishments where they place their children.—Your obedient servant,

A Retired Headmaster.

Hanley Castle Gospel Mission is doing a good work in a very needy neighbourhood. It was established fourteen years ago, and its operations are carried on under the direction of a committee of working men. It is of an entirely unsectarian character, and numbers among its workers Churchmen, Nonconformists, and Salvationists. The Committee are anxious to increase its agencies and extend its sphere of usefulness, and are greatly in need of help. The honorary secretary is William H. Lane, St. Gabriel's Terrace, Hanley Castle, Worcestershire.

Young People.

Dr. Barnardo's Homes.

THE Albert Hall was, on Saturday afternoon last, the scene of high revel at the entertainment given to the Young Helpers' League by quite an army of bright and cheery little people from the great institutions so well known under the title of "Dr. Barnardo's Homes."

Do you ask "What is the Helpers' League?" Well, it is a union of the boys and girls who have happy homes, who help to support crippled, deaf and dumb, blind, ailing, and incurable children of the waif and stray class, especially in the various hospitals connected with the Homes, including Her Majesty's Hospital for Sick Children in Stepney Causeway, the Infirmary Cottages at the Girl's Village Home, and the hospital at

"BABIES' CASTLE."

At these three refuges for hapless little ones the League supports 213 cots, in addition to others at the two institutions for incurables, and the convalescent home at Felixstowe, and, when we remember that Dr. Barnardo has under his care no less than 700 cripples and incurables, besides the healthy children in the homes proper, you will realise the need of such a useful band of children as the Young Helpers.

The great platform looked delightfully pretty. Centrally, in front of the grand organ was the smart-looking band, which played with a taste which was no doubt stimulated by the eager encourgement of the thousands of young helpers from all parts of the vast hall. Right and left sat choirs of six hundred little girls, dark frocked and white pinafored, their hat trimmings varied in colour, gleaming charmingly in the limelight rays in pink or amber, sage green or cream. How they enjoyed themselves, and how their little friends, the helpers, fluttered handkerchiefs and cheered in a glow of satisfaction at beholding so many boys and girls of the gutter saved from the pinch of hunger and the sorrows of slum homes in the dark and dismal plague spots of our land.

A burst of music from the organ, as the choir sprang to attention, and with a glorious ring sang:

> Pity the weak, the worn, the sad,
> Lighten the heart of the sorrow-clad,
> Give them a lift, 'twill make you glad—
> Glad with joy divine.

Then came a brisk drill, very military, finishing with a grand march of lads in army or navy dress, to the skirl of bagpipe and the boom of the band. Then came the "tug of war"; surely, there never was such a long rope pulled at before, "whoop" bauled the sailor boys, "o-ver," tugged the soldier boys, and as first one cheery party and then the other conquered in the struggle, one could not but agree with the chubby little helper who remarked, "aint they stronger than they used to be!."

Yes, O chubby one! These were the boys of ragged clothes and white wan faces, haunting the streets by day, sleeping under carts, or finding a windy apartment with a score of others under the dry arch of Waterloo Bridge. Now they stand, stalwart and manly, nodding acknowledgements to their delighted audience, and are soon to be despatched, as many thousands of their kind have been before, to a new home in Greater Britain. The choir chants an action piece, humorously bewailing the sorrows of being "crammed" with grammar and mathematics (but it was only fun, you know, for they know the value of education too well to treat it lightly); and the arena is filled with little girls in sage-coloured dresses, carrying ready for flag drill. Agile and willowy, those little girls drilled to perfection, especially when a troop of them, taking up skipping ropes, tripped to the rhythm of the band.

Then we had nursery tales especially arranged for the wee ones—when bad Brother Fox outwitted a farmer, and got clear away with a fat goose; when adventurous Master Frog was gobbled up by a lilywhite duck; and when, around the prostrate, arrow-pierced Cock Robin, there stood the obviously guilty sparrow, the fly, the kite, the bull, and all the other notabilities familiar in the days when we wore little frocks and sat in high chairs. Some young helpers I fancy looked a little guilty when the part song told of the wreckage made with books and buttons, ink and plates by one "Mr. No-bod-ee," but they cheered up when after a procession of helpers to present purses and receive badges from the Duchess of Somerset, an enormous sheet was stretched athwart the organ, and upon it, as the electric suns went out, was flashed a lovely series, view after view, illustrating the extent and thoroughness of the work, from the moment when a homeless child enters to the day when the girls are safely homed in Canadian farmsteads, and the lads are settled in vigorous manhood, amid the prairie lands and golden corn fields of Ontario or far Manitoba. Saddening pictures of the Home hospitals, gratifying ones of the brisk carpentering and tailoring shops, the dormitories and bakeries of Stepney, and the girls' model village at Ilford, and thrilling ones, showing some of the

during the past year, brought a plentiful recognition in cheers, and, I fancy, in tears also.

So concluded a remarkable afternoon, interesting, instructive, and, though often raising an insistent smile, yet full of a tender pathos; for who could look unmoved upon the platform's great body of reclaimed childhood without bowing the head at the remembrance of that pitying heart of Divine Love, which, while it sufficed for the need of the great and the strong, could also bend down in grace to the helpless babe, saying, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Result of Prize Competition.

This is the largest competition we have had yet, and I hope we may ever go on increasing in numbers.

My young friends have done excellently this time, and it is very pleasing for me to see the continued thought and care bestowed upon the papers.

Many of the names are quite familiar ones now, and I hope to find them, as well as many fresh ones, in our future competitions for a long time to come.

Some of my "nephews" and "nieces" evidently found the acrostics rather puzzling, as they were not answered in all the papers. But I want you to remember that in a prize competition it is those who do their paper the best as a whole who gain the rewards, so do not get discouraged if you find one question too hard for you; but do the rest of the paper as well as ever you can, and then there will be no reason why you should not be one of the successful ones. Now, I hope you will all persevere with the weekly questions, and not forget what is the real object of our "Bible Searcher."

Galatians.

1. Whom did Paul take to Jerusalem with him?
2. What did Paul do after God had called him, and whom did he see?
3. Why did he withstand Peter?
4. What is called our schoolmaster, and what is it to do?
5. Write out the verses in which we are told (a) not to be weary, (b) how the law is fulfilled, (c) to stand fast, (d) we are the children of God.

[Children under ten do 1, 4, 5 (a), under thirteen 1, 2, 4, 5 (a).]

Personal.

Several of my "nephews" and "nieces" have given only references this week; but the answers must be WRITTEN out, and the chapter and verse given as well.

EVELYN AND GWENNIE MOIR.—I was pleased to have your letters, and should be very glad to distribute the pincushions and text-books you are making.

H. JAS. CHENEY AND DOROTHY COOPER.—I admired your somewhat novel cards, and always appreciate photographs.

KENNETH J. VINING.—You seem to be having a good holiday. Hope you will be successful in your examination.

BLOSSOM DAVIS.—You may certainly send your answers in on a post-card if you find they are not too long.

AILEEN GARDNER.—You may answer the questions set for those under ten during this quarter, but if eligible for the next competition you must enter for your actual age.

EDITH SAUNDERSON.—Very glad you are going to join again. The answers must be written as well as the chapter and verse.

THOMAS GROOMBRIDGE.—Thank you for your letter and all the good wishes it contained.

DAISY MARRETT.—I am so sorry to hear you have been ill.

MAUD EDDEY.—I shall hope to hear that you are much better next week.

WILLIE AND MAY CHRISTIE.—Many thanks for the book. I expect to find it very interesting.

BERTIE STEELEY.—As you are so young you need not write in ink. Write out the answers as well as the chapter and verse.

FRANK MEDCALF.—Glad to see your name once more.

The Railway Mission.—A meeting of Railway Mission workers was held at 1, Adam Street, Adelphi, on January 9, for united prayer on behalf of the work among railway men throughout the world. Mr. R. Nixon, secretary, said they had been gladdened by the conversion of many railway men at the various branches during the past year. Several new centres had been opened, and a missionary had been sent to work among railway men in India. An additional missionary had also been sent to South Africa. New doors for extending the work are opening on every hand at home and abroad, but friends are greatly needed.

A Series of Special Services for waiting upon God have recently been in progress at New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, N. Some four meetings were held each day, the pastor, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, being assisted by Revs. W. Fuller Gooch, G. H. C. Macgregor, Gregory Mantle, and C. G. Moore. The week-day conferences at 6.30 p.m. were found to be so profitable spiritually that it is intended to hold similar gatherings on alternate Saturday evenings during the next three months—viz., January 28, February 11 and 25, March 11 and 25, at 7 p.m. This is an attempt to promote the realisation of Christian fellowship in conversation upon the things of God.

Evangelistic.

Rev. Henry Montgomery in Dublin.

THIS pastor evangelist has just concluded a ten days' mission in Dublin. It was hoped that Mr. Montgomery's mission would have followed up the Convention in October last, but circumstances made it impossible, and it was arranged that the mission should commence in the closing days of the Week of Prayer. Mr. J. Stuart Holden, who was to have assisted Mr. Montgomery by taking the afternoon Bible readings and special meetings for young men, was laid aside by illness, and thus the whole burden devolved upon Mr. Montgomery.

The special feature of the mission was the afternoon Bible reading. The subject which Mr. Montgomery was led to take up was Pentecostal Power and the need of the Church and its members of an apostolic baptism of the Holy Ghost. With a rare knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and a heart on fire with zeal for God and love for a perishing world, he urged the need of fuller consecration and a greater faith in the all-sufficiency and availability of the Holy Ghost. The attendance increased at the afternoon meetings until the minor hall was crowded. It has been decided to follow up these meetings with a weekly meeting on Friday afternoons for special prayer for the manifestation of the power of the Spirit.

The evening Gospel services were well attended, and under the tender and faithful appeals of the preacher deep and saving impressions were made upon many hearts. Numerous cases were dealt with in the after meetings.

The Dublin Evangelistic Choir, under the leeadership of Mr. T. K. Camby, rendered valuable assistance, and the solo singing by Miss Lucy Montgomery was very effective and greatly appreciated. A large number of ministers of different denominations were present during the mission, especially in the afternoon. D. M.

Evangelists' Movements.

Rev. Mr. LYALL (Chicago) recently conducted special meetings at North Berwick, when there was reason for praise for evident soul anxiety and decision for Christ.

Rev. Mr. BAIRD, U. P. Synod evangelist, has finished a week's Gospel meetings at Beith, N.B. His subjects each evening have been illustrated by limelight views. There has been much interest and evident blessing, particularly among the young.

Rev. R. BALGARNIE'S Mission at Brecon has been attended by evident manifestation of the Divine blessing. All the free churches united in it, and the services were crowded every night, some persons coming eight and ten miles to attend them. A large spiritual harvest has been reaped by the various churches.

The Lord has been giving much blessing at a special mission at present going on in the Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow. The meetings are being conducted by Mr. HILL, Evangelist. The attendance has been large, and from the beginning each night there have been inquirers in very considerable numbers.

Mr. WM. FORBES visited Brlstol on January 6 for the purpose of his "theatrical Mission." He was successful in arranging for a meeting of ballet girls, who to the number of four to fifty listened to Gospel addresses given on the 11th at the Y.W.C.A. rooms in Berkley Square. He also conducted an Evangelistic Mission at Premett Street Mission Hall from January 8 to 12.

Mr. P. COHEN has been conducting a ten days' mission at Hyde that has been attended with much blessing. Some have decided for Christ; backsliders have been restored, and Christians of various churches in the town have been blessed. The lecture "From the Synagogue to the Cross," was especially blessed to many. Another cheering result of his mission is an increased desire on the part of the mission workers for a thoughtful study of their Bible. Mr. Cohen is now conducting a few days' mission at Salford.

Evangelists' Engagements.

MR. W. MONRO COLLINGS.—Jan. 22-Feb. 5, Croydon; Feb. 11-March 6, Feltham.

MR. E. P. TELFORD.—Jan. 15-26, Goole.

MRS. E. L. BAEYERTZ.—Jan. 22-Feb. 6, Dumfries; Feb. 25-March 13, Southport.

REV. A. T. JONES.—Jan. 18, Risca; 22-31, Duckpool Road, Newport, Mon.

EVANGELISTIC MISSION.—Kilburn Hall, Kilburn Gate, Sundays at 7, Messrs. Philip R. Hurditch and Alfred C. Burley. Malden Hall, Haverstock Hill, Sundays at 7; Jan. 22-29, Mr. H. W. Taylor. Eccleston Hall, Eccleston Street, Sundays at 3.30 and 7, Mr. P. GARRIOCH.

MR. NEWTON JONES, Jan. 21-26, Markham Square, S.W., 28-Feb. 6, Canterbury; Feb. 11-20, Bridgwater.

MR. JOHN ELLIOTT.—Jan. 22, St. Marychurch, Gospel Hall; 29, Torquay (Warren Road).

Scottish Notes.

The U.P. Presbytery of Dundee recently discussed a report on Sabbath Observance. It was agreed that a series of special sermons should be preached against opening shops on Sundays, Sunday excursions, and other evils.

The Soldiers' Home at Piershill, Edinburgh, continues to serve a most useful purpose in providing a place of Christian resort to troops in barracks. At the annual meeting several officers spoke highly of the influence of the Home, and an increasing attendance of soldiers was reported.

A deputation, headed by Lord Overtoun, visited the meetings of the Glasgow U.P. Presbytery, with the same object as that of the recent deputation to the Free Church Presbytery—to enlist sympathy and co-operation in view of the coming Gospel campaign in the city. The Moderator of the Presbytery expressed the assurance of hearty support.

A new institute for telegraph messengers in connection with the work of the Postal and Telegraph Christian Association has been opened at Edinburgh. At the opening meeting over 200 messengers were present, when addresses were delivered by Rev. G. Wilson, Miss Synge, and others. A cheering feature of the meeting was the testimony of many of the messengers as to how they had been won for Christ through the work carried on under the association.

London and suburbs are losing two of its younger Presbyterian ministers by the removal of Rev. H. Norwell, of Islington, to Helensburgh, and of Rev. Carnegie Sampson, of Wallington, to Renfield Free Church, Glasgow. On the other hand Scotland is furnishing a pastor to College Park, Willesden, in the person of Rev. J. Oliver Dick, assistant to Dr. Black of Inverness. The recent settlement in Dingwall of Rev. J. R. Macpherson, late of Kinnaird, will be of interest to Keswick goers; Mr. Macpherson is one of the less prominent speakers at the famous convention.

The annual conversazione of the Glasgow Y.W.C.A. took place on January 12 in the City Hall, which was filled in every part. The chair was occupied by Mr. J. Carfrae Alston, and addresses were given by Rev. J. M. Witheron and Rev. Dr. Wells. The report of the hon. secretary, Mrs. Oatts, showed a membership of 2,872 in thirty-nine branches, which included a branch for Board School teachers, a union of hospital nurses, and two junior branches. The association possesses two institutes, both fully taken advantage of. Mr. Alex. Sloan, for the honorary treasurer, submitted a satisfactory financial statement, the association being self-supporting. He congratulated the members on the amount of work done at so little cost. Bailie Dick gave a hearty speech.

A Pastoral Letter has been addressed by the Rev. Dr. Whyte, Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, to the native ministers, elders, congregations, and Christian workers in the Synod of Kaffraria and in Natal. In it he says that they in Scotland are filled with sorrow on hearing that there are divisions amongst them, and he beseeches them to become "perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment." He further says: "If you are divided and cut off from us, can we together fight against heathenism? Do we not rather give the enemy cause to blaspheme? Moreover, if wrong has been done anyone, or if the brethren think that wrong has been done them, is there no remedy but division and strife? If any brother had anything against anyone he should have asked the Church to hear him, and they would see that justice was done."

Obituary.

PASTOR E. MONOD.

MARSEILLES has had a great loss in the person of a much-respected pasteur, Ed. Monod, whose name is well known in the Christian world. He was one of a numerous family, and brother to Pasteur Theo Monod, of Paris. He was a true disciple of Christ, a poet and man of letters, and his death is deeply regretted by all.

REV. JOSEPH BEASLEY.

The death is announced of Rev. Joseph Beasley, which took place somewhat suddenly, at his residence, The Paragon, Blackheath, last week, in his eighty-seventh year. He was educated at Barnet Congregational College, and commenced his ministry in 1836. At first he held pastorates in Tasmania and Australia, and became assistant to the famous Rev. James Sherman, at Blackheath, and afterwards succeeded him in the full pastorate.

PREBENDARY JOSEPH W. REYNOLDS.

The death is announced of Rev. Joseph William Reynolds, one of the prebendaries of St. Paul's Cathedral. Born in 1821, Mr. Reynolds was trained for a business life, and his knowledge of modern languages opened for him a promising career. He determined however to enter the ministry; and having passed through the theological course of King's College, London, with distinction, he was ordained in 1849 to the curacy of St. Peter's, Belper. In 1854 he was appointed principal of the Operative Jewish Converts' Institution. The Archbishop of Canterbury gave him the M.A. degree on account of his work amongst the Jews. In 1859 he became incumbent of St. Stephen's, Spitalfields, which he held for twenty-five years. He was appointed, by the Bishop of London, to a prebendal stall at St. Paul's in 1880, and to the rectory of St. Anne and St. Agnes, Gresham Street, in 1882, both of which he held till his death on Thursday last. While at Spitalfields he devoted himself to the contest between science and religion, and he is best known by his book, "The Supernatural in Nature," quickly followed by "The Mystery of Miracles," and other works of a like character.

VISCOUNTESS PORTMAN.

On Wednesday, January 4, in the stillness of the night, the home call came suddenly to the Viscountess Portman. Though of exalted social rank, she was a sincere and humble follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. There are many on the estate of Bryanston and elsewhere who to-day are mourning the loss of a true and sympathising friend.

Lady Portman was brought to the Lord more than thirty-five years ago, and from that time had a strong desire to win others for the Saviour by every means in her power. Although shrinking from publicity, her name as a Christian worker may not have been widely known until, in 1894, she became president of the London Division of the Y.W.C.A., in which, as well as in the Blandford Branch, she took great interest, and which she supported liberally. The Christian Colportage Association and the work of the Evangelisation Society claimed a large share of her sympathy and support.

It was in the quiet of her own home, however, in Bible-classes for her servants, and mothers' meetings for those living on the estate; in the sending forth of the little booklets she wrote for each new year, and which were scattered far and wide, that her influence was most felt.

DR. R. PRINGLE.

Brigade Surgeon Lieut.-Colonel Robert Pringle, M.D., passed away suddenly, after less than two hours suffering, on Friday morning last, at the age of sixty-six. The call, so sudden, was a great shock to his many friends. So full of vitality and energy as he was, he seemed destined to live to ripe old age, as some of his ancestors had done.

He received his appointment to the Bengal Medical Service, and joined his regiment three years before the Mutiny. Though piously brought up, his heart and tastes were then wholly in the world. But some of the scenes he witnessed in that trying time, and especially the death of a loved brother, were the means the Lord employed to awaken him and bring him unto Himself. From that time onward, both in India and at home, he never wavered, but was decided and outspoken for his Master—never ashamed to confess Him before men.

Into the Army Temperance movement, then at its beginning, he threw himself heart and soul, and that movement owes more to him than is generally known. He retired and returned home in 1883, taking up his residence in Lewisham. He attached himself to St. Mark's Church, Greenwich, under the ministry of Rev. G. Elder, and ever since has been one of the most zealous and indefatigable workers in every department of the work of that congregation. As superintendent of the Sunday School he won the affection of the scholars, and through affection ruled them. But his sympathies were world-wide, and were enlisted in every kind of work which was carried on for the Master's sake.

On the Wednesday evening preceding his death Dr. Pringle conducted the weekly prayer meeting in St. Mark's Schoolroom. On Friday he rose as usual, conducted family worship, and sat down to breakfast, of which he did not much partake. Within half an hour he was writhing in the agonies of angina pectoris. Among the last words he spoke to his wife were these: "Quite happy, quite happy; I know whom I have believed." Thus he passed away in perfect peace.

The funeral service was held in St. Mark's, Greenwich, on Wednesday; thereafter in Lewisham Cemetery. Our friend leaves behind him a widow and seven daughters, to whom we tender our deepest sympathy in the loss with such suddenness of so loving a husband and father.

MR. W. T. BERGER.

The two heads of families of Messrs. John and Samuel Berger, of the Five Houses, Homerton, were well known and much respected. An unmarried sister had been brought under the influence of the Gospel by some Methodist preachers, and she gave herself to the task of praying for all her nephews and nieces. Her prayers were heard, for nearly every one was brought to a saving acquaintance with Christ. William Thomas Berger, the son of Samuel Berger, after rather a wild life, was converted through his cousin, Capel Berger. The young men soon began to work for God, and preachings were commenced in the village by Wm. Berger, in which I took part.

At the time of which I speak there was an outburst of spiritual life; it led to breaking bands from Episcopal and Dissenting fellowships, and a gathering was formed very much in harmony with the "Brethren," though preserving an independent responsibility, which saved it from some of their errors. The meeting drew many spiritual Christians, and it had the reputation with many of being "a nest of love." For many years Wm. Berger was associated with the worship at this meeting, and frequently took part in it.

Very soon the missionary cause came upon the carpet, into which he entered with enthusiasm, and with his devoted wife, Mary Van Sommer, gave heart and soul and growing means to missions in the great field of China. His labours in the rice factory at Bromley, and his improvements in manufacture brought him in a large revenue, and his many patents increased it; but his growing wealth was consecrated to the Lord, and his zealous efforts for this wide field at Reigate, and afterwards on his estate at Saint Hill, East Grinstead, were continued through many years. When Mr. Hudson Taylor assumed the responsibility of the China Inland Mission, and left for China with a party of seventeen and children, Mr. Berger agreed to carry on the home department of the work. Saint Hill became the Mission House, whence a vast correspondence issued. Not a few of the brethren were in a measure trained there for the work; this is narrated in the first volume of the story of the China Inland Mission.

The beloved Mrs. Berger maintained a wide correspondence with the missionaries, and for several years this arduous work was maintained, till it became too heavy a charge, and was then handed over to a council of Christian men. Mr. Berger subsequently retired from business, and had a château in Cannes for the winter, and another in the mountains for summer. From Cannes the home call came on the 9th inst., our brother having attained the goodly age of eighty-four.

The acquisition of wealth had no effect in damping Mr. Berger's zeal for the Lord's work. He dispensed it widely and with a glad heart, and never entered into a case of helping one in distress without minutely considering details. He had a sound judgment and unfailing confidence in revealed truth and a considerable grasp of it. He was large-hearted and recognised every true Christian as a bosom brother.

The close and constant work of the mission shortened Mrs. Berger's life, and he subsequently married a Christian Swiss lady, who devoted herself to care for him in his great sufferings.

George Pearse.

FATHER CHINIQUY.

The Ottawa correspondent of The Times telegraphed on Monday night:—"Father Chiniquy, who occupied a prominent place in the religious life of Canada for many years, died at Montreal to-day. He was formerly a Roman Catholic priest, but in 1858 he seceded from the Church of Rome, taking a congregation, numbering over a thousand, with him. Subsequently he was ordained a minister of the Presbyterian Church of Canada."

Charles Chiniquy was born on July 30, 1809, at Kamouraska, in the Province of Quebec. He was educated for the priesthood, and ordained at Quebec in 1833. As parish priest of Beauport he became much concerned with the effects of drunkenness among his flock, and, joining the Oblate Fathers in 1846, he gave himself up to a crusade against the alcohol habit. A man of remarkable eloquence, his success was such that about 200,000 persons are said to have enrolled themselves as total abstainers at the missions conducted by him throughout Lower Canada.

In 1851 Father Chiniquy migrated at the head of about 10,000 of his fellow-countrymen to Illinois, where they established a settlement at Kankakee. In 1858, however, the priest left the Church of Rome, and a large number of his flock went with him. Thenceforward he devoted his powers of oratory and his extraordinary energy to a campaign against the communion in which he had spent the first fifty years of his life.

The opposition he now encountered matched his own militant fervour. The French-Canadians, friendly enough to English Protestants, have little patience with deserters from their own ranks; and Mr. Chiniquy made patience doubly difficult by the bitterness of his attacks on the faith of his former friends. Intense admiration gave place to hatred equally intense. With characteristic recklessness Mr. Chiniquy carried his war into the heart of the enemy's country. Serious disorders occurred on his visiting Quebec in 1859, and Mr. Chiniquy was himself wounded.

In the following year the ex-priest, now a Presbyterian minister, spent six months in the United Kingdom, giving 182 addresses in the course of his tour—a record which he surpassed during subsequent visits in 1874 and 1882. In July, 1874, he was stoned after speaking against Roman Catholicism at Antigonish, Nova Scotia. Two years later he was struck down at Halifax, N.S., and the church in which he preached was injured. In 1879 he visited Australia, always on the same errand, and was roughly handled at Horsham, in Victoria. A few months later Hobart Town, Tasmania, was thrown into an uproar by his activities, and the passion they evoked in the lower class of his opponents; but the bodyguard of Orangemen who rallied round him here and elsewhere saved him from serious injury. In 1884 he was attacked on board a steamer at Montague, Prince Edward Island, and was rendered unconscious. A somewhat similar incident occurred at Escanaba, Michigan, in 1891; and stormy scenes marked his ministrations in many other towns.

Preserving his bodily vigour to a marvellous degree, Mr. Chiniquy, at the age of eighty-seven, in the autumn of 1896, crossed the Atlantic again to obtain support for a Protestant school he was establishing among the French Canadians of L'Islet. After fulfilling many lecturing and preaching engagements in this country under the auspices of the Protestant Alliance, he returned to Canada, but not to rest. Writing in the autumn of 1898 to the leader of a remarkable Protestant movement among the priests of France, this doyen des évadés was able to say: "I have entered my ninetieth year in perfect health. My hand does not yet tremble. My sight and hearing are as good as at the age of twenty, and the last sermon I delivered gave me no more fatigue than the first, which I gave when I was scarcely twenty."

Mr. Chiniquy wrote much, generally in a controversial strain, his principal work being "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome." A Montreal newspaper, The Daily Witness, was laid under the Romish ban for reporting Father Chiniquy's sermons in 1876 and has remained under it to this day.

Gospel Slides for India.—Rev. G. W. Park, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, Gujarah, India, is desirous of getting a set of lantern slides on the life of Christ for use in his work in India. Any friend who can help him in this direction should address him, Kallvindsgatan 15, Norrkoping, Sweden. He returns to India next month.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

TO the intense satisfaction of those who attended the meetings last week, the Ten Weeks' Bible School has opened with great promise. The gatherings have been large, and the students have been people of sincere purpose, earnestly desiring help in acquiring a fuller knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures. Professor White opened courses of study in nine centres, and the way he threw himself into the work was a help and an encouragement to many. Particulars of the addresses will be found on p. 16.

Those who have been praying for Revival have not been unmindful of the great need for the Word of God to be re-instated in the hearts of professing Christians as the standard of faith and the authority on matters of practice. Dr. White's work is calculated to promote this very desirable and urgent object; also, let us trust, to bring to an end, in the experience of many, the sad "famine of hearing the words of the Lord." We commend the Bible School to the prayerful interest of our readers; its success on intellectual lines seems assured, but Dr. White will not be satisfied with less than definite spiritual results.

The desire having been expressed by country and other friends who are unable to become students of the School in person, but yet wish to benefit by Professor White's teaching while in this country, to have these lectures by correspondence, the Y.W.C.A. have decided to start a Correspondence Class for the benefit of such, at a small charge per week for the ten weeks. Both gentlemen and ladies will be admitted to the Class. Further particulars may be had from the Secretary, Correspondence Class, Bible School, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

From time to time the Pope of Rome receives patronage to which he may excusably attach a false value. British peers bow at his feet, and now and then a prince or princess exchanges gracious words with him. These visits may not mean much so far as the friendly callers are concerned; but as recognising pretensions at once preposterous and blasphemous, they are not only undesirable but mischievous. We observe that the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, in the course of continental travels, purpose calling upon "his Holiness." This is much to be regretted. Our duty to the Pope and the system of which he is the head is to keep open eyes upon them; by no means is it wise to extend courtesies and show favours that are sure to be used to our prejudice and hurt in the interest of "Holy Church."

The Pope has just founded a Beda College at Rome, "mainly for English Catholic converts who purpose returning as missionaries to England." In the letter granting a constitution of the college, the Pope makes mention of those "whose goodness and loyalty to the faith" have made them forfeit their temporal goods by professing the [Roman] Catholic faith, i.e., by giving up their livings in the Church of England or in other bodies. These men have at any rate acted honestly; the trouble is that so many are Papists at heart, and yet will not give up their positions, but do the Pope's work while enjoying the emoluments and opportunities of influence of the Anglican Church. The present chaotic and abnormal condition of affairs in the religious world is largely owing to this fact.

A leading Catholic paper, while allowing that the "three heterodox empires, the German, Russian, and the British, are the greatest Powers of Europe in our time," and that no Catholic State can compete with them, accounts for this superiority by the differences that exist in external organisation, and by "the remains of Catholicism that survive in the populations of these empires." This is an extraordinary argument. Setting aside Russia as in many senses out of the comparison, it amounts to a confession that the remnants of Catholicism in Protestant countries are more potent for progress than the undivided sway of Catholic influences in the decadent countries. Those who resort to such reasoning must be hard put to it to prove their case. Blindness follows bigotry, and those who ignore the palpable evidence that Protestantism and progress are wedded in every instance, while the reverse is true of Roman Catholicism, must be living in "a vain show."

The growth of the peace sentiment among the nations is a good sign of the times. Our own Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that for some time to come our best and safest policy is to cultivate and develop the possessions we have, and cease adding to them. The best men in Russia seem to be of the opinion that the wisest thing for that country to do is to cultivate what it has. Thoughtful men in Germany and in France are quietly pointing out, in the lull after the noise, that nothing could be worse than a war, whoever wins; the winner would be a loser. Mr. Rhodes has just been saying to Bishop Hartzell, of the American Industrial Mission in Africa:—

> What we want is the intertwining of mutual interests on behalf of humanity on the part of English-speaking people throughout the world. In that way we can prevent war. What we want is universal peace.

No doubt there are angry and selfish passions in the nations ready to flame out at any provocation, but this fact makes the other fact to which we have called attention all the more gratifying.

The entente cordiale between the British and the Egyptian Governments is matter for warm congratulation. The Government of the Soudan will for some time require generous and peaceful measures. Mutual understandings such as now exist should secure complete harmony in administration. Free Trade will help to develop the resources of the Soudan, but the abolition of slavery will secure equal rights and liberties for all. With an open door in Egypt for missionary enterprise the Gospel will yet triumph and win glad trophies for the Redeeming Christ.

The lust of money in America is highly demoralising, a contemporary says:—

> During the past few months thousands of people have doubled and trebled their incomes, while hundreds have made actual fortunes through the enormous rise in the value of stocks which followed the close of the war with Spain.

Names of millionaires are then given who have "cleared millions since August last." This has been down in transactions on the Stock Exchange which should, perhaps, in all honesty be denominated reckless gambling, that under other circumstances would be punishable by law. Much evil will inevitably follow, for stories of these enormous profits appearing in the newspapers are having the effect of stimulating wholesale speculation among all classes.

If Chrysostom found it necessary in his day and in the worldly city of Constantinople to be incessantly pointing out the insufficiency of earthly things to satisfy the souls of men, and to be bringing eternal and spiritual things to bear upon the conscience and the regulation of life, it certainly is necessary now in every part of our country. There is need to iterate and reiterate that a "man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

There is need to let the light of the eternal world shine into this world. And there is also need to point to the judgment to come, and declare that every man must give account of the deeds done in the body, whether good or bad. Just so far as we live under the powers of the world to come shall we regulate our life here with a due regard to that which is beyond. As the balancing powers of all the heavenly worlds are necessary to keep this little planet of our earth safe in its place, so things visible must be controlled by things that are not seen.

It is sometimes asserted by "modern" theologians that no reference is made anywhere in our Lord's teaching to the "Fall of Man." Rather, our fallen state is the basal truth on which all his appeals and work are grounded. It is assumed in the first word in his preaching: "The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye, and believe the Gospel" (Mark i. 15). This was not addressed to the so-called lapsed and lost, but to all. The same thing is implied in his teaching about the New Birth to Nicodemus (John iii. 3), and about conversion to his disciples (Matthew xviii. 3). His Gospel is, in the first instance, a method of rescue, and not till afterwards a means of growth. Redemption is its primary characteristic. Spiritual development follows only as a corollary and necessary result. And, therefore, the doctrine of repentance, of conversion, should ever be placed in the forefront of all evangelistic appeals.

Is not the dearth of conversions, the slow growth of the churches, and their unsatisfactory condition, largely due to the clouding of this initial and fundamental Christian truth? There can be no widespread and thorough revival of religion in the land till the weeds and brushwood of human fancy are cleared away from the realities of life, and the "axe is laid to the root of the tree." The Gospel is not a plaster of reformation applied to the outward sores of humanity; it is a remedy for sin, which is the cause of all spiritual and social diseases. Let all preachers and Sunday-school teachers and workers among the young grasp this primal and universal need, and announce the duty of repentance as the condition of receiving all the benefits of religion, and a beginning will be made in the right direction. There is no sphere in which "the first step counts" so much as the spiritual. The end is involved in the beginning.

"Why could not we cast him out?" is a question often asked by such as have toiled in vain in their endeavour to reform the world and the Church of some foul and distressing evil. And Christ's answer comes to all, "This sort goeth not out save by prayer and fasting." Lack of faith, lack of prayer, lack of self-discipline—these are the fatal obstacles to successful spiritual effort. By faith we range ourselves on the side of God; by prayer we range God on our side; by simplicity and self-discipline we fit ourselves for efficient and perfect service. These three conditions, if earnestly fulfilled, break down all barriers between our will and the divine will, and equip us with supernatural resources for the accomplishment of that will on earth. But few indeed are they that so prepare themselves for the high test of bringing the world to Christ.

Excellent service to the cause of social morality is being rendered by the Daily News in its articles on "Overcrowded London," which bring into prominence an evil that is "always with us," though it seems as far off from practical solution as ever. Ever since the "Bitter Cry," of fifteen years ago, occasional attempts have been made to deal with this question, and many people, who know nothing of the facts, are under the impression that the trouble is being met by model dwellings and County Council schemes. These papers are full of facts, which show this to be a pure delusion.

It is simply appalling to be told that one-fifth of the population of London dwell together in an overcrowded condition, and that one-tenth spend their lives in single rooms, with three, four, and more others; and this in pure contravention of the law. The detailed revelations of squalor, misery, and filth brought to light just now, read like a sick and impossible dream. Beds are let for eight hours at a time to different persons, and are thus occupied night and day; in some places it is common for persons to sleep under the beds. After describing how, in one home, (a one roomed "home"!), the dead body of a child was placed "until morning upon the only shelf in the house where they kept the food," the special correspondent says:—

> That is not so bad as the family I was told of elsewhere, who sat up all night to keep the rats off the dead body of a child. Neither is it to be compared with the case heard before a Police-court magistrate, when the Medical Officer of St. Giles asked for a closing order in respect to houses where the rats had made large holes in the rooms. He stated in evidence that in one of the rooms children had to take turns to keep awake during the night to prevent the rats attacking the others in their sleep.

Another case is that of a woman, seventy-five years of age, who died in a back parlour last October. At the inquest, the coroner's officer stated that—

> All he found in the room were a lot of old rags covered with vermin. He had got smothered himself with the vermin. The room was in a shocking condition, and he had never seen anything like it. It was abominable. Everything was absolutely covered with vermin. There was bread and butter on the table, but it was also covered with vermin.

Here is a problem which deals with conditions of peace, not war. How to meet it is the question. The facts should be known to the nation at large, and a great public opinion created, as the first stage to reform.

According to the Publishers' Circular, there was a serious drop in the output of fiction during the past year. The supply is still over-abundant, for the total for 1898 was over 1,700 novels, "mostly rubbish." It is at any rate encouraging to hear that in the view of publishers generally, while "the swarms of new readers from the board schools keep up the demand for sensational stuff, the next generation will be wiser." There is plenty of room for this improvement. The present generation has probably wasted more time over trashy novels than on any other form of "amusement."

The attitude of our Government towards slavery in East Africa is a just cause of pain and disappointment among lovers of freedom. Ten years ago Her Majesty's agent at Zanzibar received the following communication from the Foreign Office:—

> I am directed by the Marquis of Salisbury to instruct you to warn all missionary societies against harbouring runaway slaves without making any exception. No legal right to do so can be claimed, and when a refuge and asylum are granted in extreme cases of peril and out of humanity, it is done at the risk of the person giving the shelter.

For obeying this instruction, which was itself illegal, the missionaries of the C.M.S. were, in 1897, upbraided by the Government as having acquiesced in it! Bishop Tucker, however, has since found out that British law does not require runaway slaves to be given up. He writes to The Times to vindicate the action of the missionaries between 1889 and 1897, and to say that they have reversed it, and now obey the real law. A deputation to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs last week did not elicit a very satisfactory answer from that official. As a nation, we must not be dragged into fellowship with slave-holding Mohammedan Powers in prolonging the curse of slavery, with all its attendant horrors

The murder of Mr. Fleming, a British missionary in China, and one of his native assistants, is another evidence of the lawlessness of those in authority, for some of them did this deed. The ruling classes are the haters of missionaries and of all change. Mr. Fleming was a good man. According to a Reuter despatch, he was a very willing helper, truly zealous in his Master's cause, in studies exceedingly persevering, always wore a smiling, happy face, and was respected by all. He has been "counted worthy" to suffer—"to suffer," and thus to open the way for others. Mandarin bigotry will not rule China always; in every Christian whom it slays it strikes a blow at itself. We note in this case that a native evangelist shared the honour of martyrdom with our countryman, and that a native teacher escaped to tell the tale. China has given some noble martyrs and confessors, and their "blood will be the seed of the Church."

Perhaps if the glory of missionaries were put a little more in the background, and the glory of Christ a little more to the front, we should receive a more abundant blessing from God.

This sentence is from the letter of a missionary to a contemporary, in which he points out the peril of a too sentimental sympathy on the part of the public with workers in the foreign field. He complains that the religious newspapers that reach him from home tend by their exaggerated eulogy of missionary workers to destroy the simplicity and humility of their Spirit, and to breed a pride and priggishness which is the worst enemy of those who are placed by friends on a pedestal of heroism. It would, perhaps, be well for us to remember this sometimes and to exalt the Master rather than the servants. And it is not the missionary alone who is in peril of being spoiled by hero-worship. Our popular ministers need a double dose of grace to bear with the adulation that is often lavished upon them by their friends and admirers.

It is well known that there are no races so hard to convert to the faith as those who follow Mohammed. There may be many reasons for this, but undoubtedly one of them is that the average Mohammedan is more faithful to the outward observances of his religion than the average Christian. The devotion of the former to the daily rites and prayers enjoined in the Koran and his entire indifference to the sneers and scoffs of others are in striking contrast to the absence of any visible sign of grace or habits of outward reverence and unity which frequently mark the conduct of professing this. Only a consistent Christian life can make an impression.

Straws are proverbially known to tell us which way the wind blows. A Sunday or two ago the stormy weather had the usual effect on the size of London congregations. It was remarked in several suburban churches that the thinness was most marked among the young men. One fond mother excused her sons' absence to her minister on the score that they were very particular about spoiling their toilet! Are we falling upon effeminate times? One would not think so to watch the courageous way in which young men will brave the elements at a great football match. The effeminacy is shown only in regard to the things that pertain to the soul. There is a loud call for preaching a masculine Gospel, for appealing to the manhood of our nature. "I speak to you young men because ye are strong."

There are a million less scholars in our elementary schools than there ought to be. Since the class of habitual criminals is recruited from this "derelict million," there is a pressing call for a better organisation to meet this alarming condition of things, which is due to the obstinate truancy of children and the selfishness of many parents who keep their boys and girls at home for their own purposes. Ignorance is one of the most fruitful causes of vice and misery, and while education is no panacea against the root-evils of society, it is a valuable handmaid of moral and religious training. So long as sectarian animosities hinder the development of our educational machinery all true reformers will be hampered in their work, and the church of Christ cannot fulfil its function as it ought. Lack of spiritual unity among his followers has evil consequences that penetrate far beyond ecclesiastical limits, and injuriously affect the national welfare in many subtle ways.

The Theology of Christian Science.

BY JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., BOSTON, U.S.

IT is important to insist that Christian Science is much more than a system of therapeutics, and that it deals with the questions commonly classed as theology. If it healed the body and stopped there, the witnesses to the Gospel of Jesus Christ would leave its consideration, for the most part, to the medical profession, which would be alone competent to deal with it; but when it appeals to the Bible and to Jesus Christ, when it philosophises about the mysteries of soul and spirit, and, in a word, assumes to interpret Christianity and even substitute a new religion in the place of it, it is time for the ministers of the New Testament and the prophets of God's Word to throw themselves across its path.

Very recently, a Boston daily presented its readers with a symposium on the question, "Is the practice of Christian Science dangerous to human life?" It was participated in exclusively by Christian Scientists and physicians, as became the circumstances; but, with a single exception, the latter could present no convincing argument why the former should not practice the healing art as well as they. The single exception was the plea that, through ignorance or indifference, the Christian Science doctor might become responsible for the spread of an epidemic. In fact, the symposium was a failure so far as checking the spread of Christian Science was concerned, and left the impression that, in the face of all the medical men could say against it, it was bound to grow. It demonstrated in other words, that the whole affair must be approached from an entirely different point of view, and that to circumscribe its power, the members of our churches must be brought to see its real nature in the LIGHT OF THE REVEALED WORD.

Among the exponents of the "Science" in the symposium referred to, was the editor of the Christian Science Journal, who presumably would say the strongest and freshest thing in its behalf, and who may be relied upon as an authority when he declared it "implies much more than mere physical relief and cure." "Its teachings are based on the Bible," he went on to add; "and the Bible, read and lived in the light of Christian Science teachings, becomes, not an abstract theory, but a concrete fact. It (Christian Science) enters into the very warp and woof of our existence. It is a regenerator and a saviour. It saves the soul as well as the body. It is in short the Christianity of Jesus Christ and the Apostles revived!"

Is not this theology? Is it not a new religion? Who are the persons to deal with this—medical practitioners or ministers of the Gospel?

And what are these teachings, "based on the Bible," which are to "enter into the very warp and woof of our existence," and become our "regenerator and saviour" from both a spiritual and physical point of view? What may be called the special features of this revival of the primitive Gospel? Our editor assures us without hesitation that it was revealed from heaven by "Almighty God, through the author of the Christian Science Text-book, 'Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures,'" Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy. If we turn to that text-book we find, so far as its shallow and ill-balanced utterances can be understood, that it denies the personality of both God and man as well as Satan, the reality of matter and sin, the truth of the Atonement and of prayer, and, indeed, about everything else commonly conceived of as pertaining to the Christian religion.

Is it possible that any enlightened Christian believer is prepared to substitute such a text-book for the Bible, and such a woman as Mrs. Eddy for the inspired apostles and prophets, and even Jesus Christ Himself? Are they willing, even for the sake of physical healing, should it follow, to allow this spiritual poison to enter into the very warp and woof of their existence? Does it at all resemble the teachings of the New Testament? Which is the safer and the more correct, to read the Bible in the light of Christian Science, or Christian Science in the light of the Bible? "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no light in them" (Isaiah viii. 20).

Let it not be imagined that, after all, the utterances of this editor may be those of an individual, and not of a class. A Buffalo newspaper still more recently has reported verbatim the lecture of a "doctor of divinity," now a Christian Science practitioner, who identifies Mrs. Eddy as the "woman clothed with the sun," in Revelation xii., and as the "mighty angel" of Revelation x., giving us the spiritual interpretation of the Bible in the "little book open." "Thus," he fearlessly proceeds, "we prove that Christian Science is the second coming of Christ, Truth, Spirit. As was promised, this is the Spirit which should testify of the truth!" While of ideas as this suggests insanity on the part of one who utters them, what shall we say of the millions of intelligent and kindly people who are coming to believe them, and are falling into the snare which they set for them? Should not the child of God tremble to be mixed up in any way with such a system? Our doctor of divinity feels it necessary to protest that the votaries of this cult do not, as some think, worship the woman thus highly exalted; but how long will it be until they shall count it a privilege to do so?

How the development of such a heresy in our midst calls upon professing Christians, pastors, Sunday School teachers and parents, to be more diligent for themselves and those committed to their care, in rightly dividing the Word of truth! How blinded are they whose salvation is comprehended in a healthy body, all unmindful of a diseased soul! Who would sell his birthright for a mess of pottage? Who would barter an eternity of heavenly joy for a few years less of earthly pain? Not that the alternative is always present, to be sure, but the temptation is very subtle, and too many of our homes and churches are already bearing sad witness to its power. "Flee from idolatry," says an Apostle, "I speak unto wise men, judge ye what I say."

Bible Flower Mission.—An occasional letter expresses gratitude for the Christmas gifts sent in by so many kind friends, the supplies of all sorts received since Christmas have been unusually scanty. "May we earnestly beg for a constant supply of small evergreen, as it is invaluable for making up, with everlastings, into bouquets? Please also remember the Relief Fund, now quite exhausted, but upon which we are sure to have many demands before long."—Mrs. Turton, is Hon. Sec. and Supt., 110, Cannon Street, E.C.

Thoughts for Parents.

SELF-DENIAL.

Endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.
—2 Tim. ii. 3.

THE benefits of self-denial are great in child training. It is the duty of every parent to deny a child many things which he wants; thus he is trained in self-denial and endurance. It is positively cruel to give him all he asks for. The grace of "doing without" can be taught best by example. No habit of self-denial for others will impoverish your life.

Self-denial is a virtue seldom attained except by early domestic training. If a child is allowed from infancy to indulge his own impulses and wishes, regardless of the good of others, there is small chance that he will master them in manhood. To know ourselves as a help to others is an honest source of joy.

Spare no effort to cultivate generosity towards others; a methodical self-denial for the poor, and for God's work at home and abroad. When selfishness is exhibited, do not lecture or scold; rather picture some hero who has opposite traits of character. Speak of noble men and women who have endured hardness.

FRANCES S. HALLOWES.

The Gardener at Gethsemane.

IN a very interesting and finely-illustrated account of some Palestine experiences which Mr. I. D. Sankey contributes to the Christian Herald of New York he says:—

"We visited the Garden of Gethsemane, which lies in a deep valley on the east side of the city, at the foot of Mount Olivet. A high stone wall surrounds the Garden, preventing one from seeing anything within. We walked along the eastern wall, beset by a dozen or more wretched lepers, crying for 'Baksheesh,' until we found the gate leading into the Garden. It was opened by the guard, and when we entered we found an iron picket fence, through which we could see everything within the Garden but could touch nothing. There were olive trees, two or three tall cypress, and a quantity of small shrubbery.

"These with some bright flowers were all that could be seen. We were anxious to get some little memento of our visit to this sacred spot, and seeing an old man working among the flower beds we called to him, intimating that we would be glad to have at least a single flower to take away. He soon understood our wish, and, going to a bed of flowers near one of the oldest olive trees, plucked a handful and gave them to us. We felt very grateful, and taking a silver coin we offered to pay him for them, but he shook his head, made the sign of the Cross on his breast, and with a smile returned to his work. We looked at him in amazement.

"This venerable man was the first person we had met in either Egypt or Palestine who had refused money when it was offered. As we turned to go away we heard one of our party say, 'God bless the old gardener of Gethsemane, and may his tribe increase.'"

Hebrew Christian Union.—The annual social meeting was held in the Mildmay Conference Hall on January 17. A very good company of both sexes assembled. Mr. Israel Sunlight, the energetic secretary, has resigned his post in response to a call to the mission field. Words of counsel and encouragement were spoken by several friends.

A Good Work among Men is being prosecuted at St. Peter's, Dartmouth Park Hill, N. (vicar Rev. J. F. Osborne), under the active direction of Rev. A. Hart. For six years meetings have been held on Sunday afternoons with a present average attendance of 500, addressed from time to time by such speakers as Archdeacon Sinclair, the Bishop of Stepney, Prebendary Barlow, Rev. A. R. Buckland, M.A., Rt. Rev. J. E. C. Welldon, D.D., Bishop of Calcutta, and others. Their powerful and earnest addresses have been warmly appreciated by the men, who have come in large numbers—sometimes from 600 to 800. Among prospective speakers are the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Islington, Bishop Barry, the Archdeacon of London, and other well-known men. Needless to add, the "annual social," lately held, was a time of great enthusiasm, the Bishop of London being in the chair.

Protestantism in the 16th Century.

III.—Tyndale's Bible.

By MARGARET A. ROLLESTON.

THE story of how we got our English Bible has the fascination of a romance Its translators suffered exile and even death; its circulation was forbidden; but, nevertheless, copies were read in secret and handed down from father to son as valuable possessions. Wycliff, Tyndale, Coverdale, Rogers, Cranmer, are names which might well be written on the title-page of our Bible to remind us what was the cost of its purchase; and of these the one which claims the place of honour is that of William Tyndale, "the Apostle of England."

Tyndale was born about the year 1485, and was educated at Oxford and at Cambridge, at which latter university he came under the influence of the Reformation movement. The New Testament became his constant companion, but it was not till after he left the scholarly society of Cambridge that he learned how needed a translation of the Scriptures into English was.

In 1521 he accepted the position of tutor in the house of Sir John Walsh, at Little Sodbury, in Gloucestershire, and there at table he met many of the neighbouring gentry and clergy. As was natural, when Luther's defiance of the Pope was filling everyone's thoughts, the conversation generally turned on religious subjects; and Tyndale, who always took care to bring with him the Greek Testament, was ever ready to support what he said by Biblical proof. Such a method of argument was both novel and alarming to his opponents. They declared, as many a Romanist does to-day, that the Scriptures made heretics, that the unlearned could not be expected to understand God's Word when even they, learned priests, could not; that everyone could find what he wished in the Bible, and that they (i.e., the Church) had given and explained the Bible to the world. Tyndale answered that the Scriptures were a that in reading them He must be ever in sight, otherwise they will prove "a den of thorns;" just as "God teaches the eagles to find their prey, so He teaches his hungry children to find their Father in his Word;" and that far from having given the Scriptures to the world, the priests, the representatives of the Church, had done all in their power to hide and even burn them. The Papacy could not save the Church in the storm of life; what the Church needed was "the anchor of faith after having dipped it in the blood of Christ."

In addition to his duties as tutor to the children of Sir J. Walsh, Tyndale acted as evangelist in the villages near, and in so doing roused against himself bitter opposition. He soon realised that "without the Bible it is impossible to establish the Laity in the truth;" and as few could read it in the original tongues he determined, with God's help, to devote himself to the task of translation. So great was the opposition excited against him that he had to take refuge at Hamburg, and there and at Wittemberg the work of translating the New Testament into English was completed.

In 1526 copies of this precious work reached England, and, in spite of the prohibition issued against them, were rapidly circulated. Tunstall, Bishop of London, had a copy publicly burnt at St. Paul's Cross; but light had dawned, and was not easily to be extinguished. During the rest of his life Tyndale occupied himself in revising his translation, in translating parts of the Old Testament, and in writing theological treatises which had considerable influence in advancing the cause of the Reformation in England. His opposition to the divorce of Catherine of Aragon won for him the bitter enmity of Henry VIII.; an order was issued for Tyndale's arrest, and had the despotic king had his way, the outspoken reformer would have met his death six years sooner than he actually did.

In 1535 Tyndale, when at Antwerp, fell a victim to a plot formed by his enemies in England, and at Vilvorde in the Netherlands on October 6, 1536, he passed through the fiery ordeal to his rest. As the flames enveloped him he cried: "Lord, open the eyes of the King of England!" His prayer was not long in being answered. Before his death, and probably unknown to him in his prison cell, had appeared Coverdale's translation of the Bible, in which Tyndale's rendering of the New Testament and the Pentateuch had been incorporated. Miles Coverdale had undertaken the task at the instigation of Cromwell, who then stood high in the royal favour, and in 1537 a third edition of this Bible was issued and licensed by the king. In the same year also appeared Matthew's Bible, a translation consisting mainly of Tyndale's and Coverdale's work, annotated with notes of a Protestant character. The editor, John Rogers, took the name of Matthews to avoid persecution, but nevertheless suffered martyrdom in the reign of Mary. Many versions of the Scriptures have followed that of Tyndale, but the labours of the translators have been rather those of revisers, for every version issued by Protestant scholars has borne the impress of the early martyr by preserving the which speaks to the heart of the most ignorant as well as to the ear of the critic.

We cannot easily estimate what we as a nation owe to our open Bible, and, therefore, under God, to William Tyndale. As a Roman Catholic pervert has said: "It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of the national seriousness." God has given to man three revelations of Himself—that in Nature, as the God of Power; that in History, as the God of Justice; and that in Jesus Christ, as the God of Love. In the Bible we have the record of God's great revelation in Jesus Christ; and we, on the eve of the 20th century, may well pause before allowing the authority of a Church to take the place of that of the Bible in our land. In the Bible, as in nature and history, God has left difficulties to our faith, but the remedy is not, as the Romanist tells us, to shut our Bible and listen to the priest, but prayerfully to study more its sacred pages.

"Faithless Priests."

IN a letter to The Times of Monday last, Sir William Harcourt comments upon the resolutions passed at a recent meeting of High Church clergymen at Holborn. The resolutions defended Popish practices, and set conformity to Church usage before the obedience to their bishop which they promised at ordination. Sir William describes their conduct as a deliberate defiance of the law and of the authorities of the Church, and calls them "faithless priests who are and have long been compassing the betrayal of the Church to which they profess to belong."

Protestant Outlook.

THE Bishop of Worcester (Dr. Perowne) has sent forth a peculiarly instructive and timely treatise, entitled "The Doctrine of the Lord's Supper cleared from certain misconceptions" (3s. 6d. Elliot Stock). The treatment is able and soundly evangelical. In his preface, Dr. Perowne maintains that the questions now agitating the Church of England are not merely questions of forms and ceremonies and ritual, but questions which touch the true expounding of vital and essential doctrines. With abundant reason he says:—

If ritual meant nothing more than external observance, it might be of comparatively little importance; but when those who advocate its use do so on the ground that it is the means of setting forth to the Christian congregation doctrines which are certainly not those of our Church, and when we are told that ritual is valued only on that account, then we cannot too carefully inquire what the doctrines are which are thus supposed to be shadowed forth; and we are bound, if they are "strange and erroneous doctrines, contrary to God's Word," with all diligence to banish and drive them away.

* * * * *

It has become the practice of many members and ministers of the Established Church to rail at Protestantism. This is a great recoil on the past, for England has the grand historic distinction of having been the leader and defender of the Protestant cause. To her, weaker States have looked for encouragement and aid, and between 1649 and 1658 they never looked in vain; her money, her arms, her influence in the councils of Europe were willingly placed at their service. The Pope and all his vassals feared her. Dr. Merle-d'Aubigné wrote in 1847:—

Geneva has always reckoned on the affection of the mighty and Protestant England.

Leader in Protestantism, she thus became leader in liberty, in progress, and in material wealth and power. Is she now to step down from this high vantage ground and join the line of poor abject dying nations which wait on the will and on the word of the Vatican? The spirit of religion and the old English spirit have died out of her if she does; and that we do not believe.

* * * * *

We pointed out last week that every time the Ritualists, for the last sixty years, have done anything peculiarly outrageous, there has been an outcry; they have held their ground; the storm has subsided, and then they have proceeded to do worse. Appearances point that way in this crisis. The bishops have declared for a compromising settlement, and Sir William Harcourt has apparently decided not to ask Parliament to abolish the bishops' veto. He will trust to public opinion to keep the bishops up to the mark. This is assuredly a vain expectation; never in the past has public opinion weighed much with the bishops.

In the course of an interview with a correspondent of the Echo, Mr. Walter Walsh said of the various secret societies in the Church of England:—

Their main object is the corporate re-union of the Church of England with that of Rome. They do not believe in individual conversions, but wish to transfer the Church as a whole to the rule and guidance of the Pope.

A Roman Catholic priest recently said that Ritualism in the Church of England was a "nursery for Rome." Cardinal Manning has borne testimony to the same result of the Ritualistic movement. The E.C.U. is officially pledged to the same object. Lord Halifax has again and again said that there is no object dearer to his heart than re-union with the Church of Rome.

"The contest is not one merely against vestments and candles and positions, but is a fight with the false doctrines associated with these, and with a widespread and powerful conspiracy to undo the whole work of the Protestant Reformation, and to restore the English Church and the English nation to communion with the Church of Rome.

There has been a secession from the congregation of the Dukinfield Parish Church on account of ritualistic innovations. A section of the parishioners have formed a separate congregation, being determined, as they state in a circular, to secure to themselves the means of enjoying the form of Church service to which they have always been accustomed. "We are now," the circular goes on to say, "erecting an iron church, at the cost of £250, to seat 250 persons. We propose to call it the 'Wycliffe Memorial Church.' It is not our intention to form a sect. We propose attending other churches to partake of the Lord's Supper where that ordinance is properly administered by duly ordained clergymen of the Church of England."

Two curates of St. Agnes, Sefton Park, having publicly advocated habitual confession, the vicar (a High Churchman) acting at the instigation of Bishop Ryle, has called upon them to resign. The vicar of another parish in Liverpool (St. Margarets, Anfield) has offered the offending curates places on his staff, assuring them of a warm welcome.

SUNDAY, Jan. 29. LEVITICUS VIII.

THERE is a minute correspondence between this chapter and Exodus xxix. It might have seemed sufficient for the Holy Spirit to have said generally that Moses carefully and exactly did as God had commanded; but the force of this general command would have been less impressive than the exhaustive and careful enumeration of the particulars, in which Aaron's obedience complied with Moses' exhortations.

This may be enough to carry with us for to-day. We have no right to omit obedience in any one particular of God's commandments.

There is surely nothing more healthy, or delightful, in Christian living, than to establish such a relationship with God, that we keep up an incessant conversation with Him; giving praise for each revelation of his character; gratitude and thanks for each new exhibition of his tender care; resignation for his correction and reproof, and obedience to his commands.

MONDAY, Jan. 30. LEVITICUS IX.

The newly-consecrated priests here enter upon their ministry of intercession, sacrifice, and benediction—the sin-offerings for themselves and their house, in the first instance, and for Israel in the next; the burnt-offerings, also peace and meal-offerings.

Then there was the double blessing; first, as Aaron stood against the altar (22), and afterwards, as he came out of the tabernacle. We cannot but find here the analogue to the double blessing which our High Priest gives his Church. When He had come down from offering his supreme sacrifice, which was burnt offering, peace offering, sin and trespass offering in one, He blessed his people. As He was parted from them, He blessed them and was borne upward into heaven. But we expect another blessing from Him, when He shall come from out the Heavenly Temple and extend his hands in benediction on his completed Church, and say, "The Lord bless you and keep you; the Lord cause his face to shine upon you and be gracious unto you; the Lord lift up his countenance upon you and give you peace." And his voice will be heard, and his prayer shall come up to his holy habitation, even to heaven.

In the meanwhile the heavenly fire comes forth from before the Lord—the fire of the Holy Spirit, which never fails to consume—i.e., to feed upon the fat of the burnt offering. Directly we present He accepts. No sooner is our all given than the fire comes forth. Jesus does not bless alone; He baptises in the Holy Ghost and in fire.

TUESDAY, Jan. 31. LEVITICUS X.

This was a sad and memorable day for Aaron's house.

It was a day of death (1-11). From the prohibition of verses 8-11, it would appear that Nadab and Abihu were under the influence of strong drink, and partially intoxicated, when they offered strange fire before the Lord. Their offence was terribly avenged, because it was necessary, from the outset to show, at whatever cost, that there could be no deviation from the ordinances which had been clearly laid down and specified. We should watch and pray lest in our meetings for exhortation and prayer we introduce strange fire—the fire of our own emotions, enthusiasm, or excitement.

It was a day of tearless grief (6, 7). Aaron and his sons were forbidden to manifest their grief after the usual method, lest they should appear to challenge and repine against God's will. Though their hearts were bleeding with natural sorrow, their will and spirit must be so filled with the presence of God, and so absolutely taken up with the justice of his dealings, that there would be no apparent collision or variance between the God of truth, and his chosen servants.

It was a day of mercy and forgiveness (16, 18). By eating the sin-offering the priest bore as it were the sin of the people. But, on the present occasion, it had been burnt. The anguish and fear which overpowered their hearts, disturbed the ordinary routine of service. Aaron, also, seems to have felt that there were spiritual aptitudes to be considered; and that it was more glorifying to God to disobey in the letter than risk spiritual unfitness — a thoughtfulness which God admitted. Better not to do than to do wrongly.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 1. LEVITICUS XI.

It is a mistake to think that these were arbitrary distinctions. The animals and other creatures, which were ruled out of the dietary of Israel, are most of them those which, by universal consent, man has disallowed; and, perhaps, all of them would be similarly dealt with if we were guided by the highest sanitary considerations. Probably this book of Leviticus is the highest sanitary code in existence, and to this the uniform good health and old age of Jewish communities is doubtless attributable.

Is it not extremely interesting that God made that which was of supreme importance for the health and well-being of his people to be a matter of religious requirement towards Himself. What He prohibits is that which man would himself forbid, if he knew as much of his nature and its requirements as God does; whilst God's most rigorous requirements and our highest welfare are one. But judgment is always tempered with mercy, hence the exceptions of verses 36, 37.

But there are other considerations. These distinctions in respect of food severed the people from the rest of men, who were careless of them. They thus became a holy—i.e., a separated people; and were called upon to carry their separateness into every department of life.

THURSDAY, Feb. 2. LEVITICUS XII.

In the birth of children the Easterns have always made great contrasts in their reception of boys and girls. In the one case, joy and exuberant welcome; in the other, silence, almost sorrow. Alas for women! how bitterly have they suffered for their mother's sin! But in this more beneficent code there was no distinction made between the birth of son and daughter, save that the time of seclusion for the latter was twice as long. The sacrifices were identical, "for a son, or for a daughter."

The sin-offering recalls the words of Genesis: "Adam begat a son in his own image," and of the Psalmist, "In sin did my mother conceive me."

The burnt-offering indicated gratitude and consecration. Its spiritual counterpart is given in the song of Hannah.

We cannot turn from this chapter without noticing the tender provision for the poor, whose means sufficed not for the more expensive gifts; and remembering how thankfully the mother of our Lord availed herself of it, when she entered the temple to present herself and her child, with two young pigeons, borne by her gentle hand, in their wicker-basket. Jesus, our Lord, became a poor man's child, that through his poverty we might be rich.

FRIDAY, Feb. 3. LEVITICUS XIII.

The directions given in this chapter are minute and particular, because there were scars and scalls that might be confused with leprosy. It was, therefore, important that none should be consigned to the leper's awful lot unless their leprosy were incontestable. Repeated scrutiny, the delay of week after week, the benefit of every doubt—all was done that mercy could devise to preserve the suspected person from being classed with lepers, until the case was proved against him. A vivid illustration of the principles on which righteous judgment proceeds.

"The quickening of living flesh" (10, mar.) which was the virus of the leprosy, rendered the man utterly unclean. Or in New Testament language, "The minding of the flesh is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." But if the plague be all turned white (13), if it be turned into a dead white scall covering all his flesh, he is clean. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

Surely this is a marvellous illustration of the principles on which judgment should proceed. God will not condemn until the proofs of guilt are incontestable. There will be delay, repeated investigation, the consideration of all that can be urged in default. Before a plant is adjudged to be a tare, or a professed Christian treated "as a heathen man and a publican," there must be every possible endeavour to restore.

The exclusion of the leper from society, the perpetual cry of Unclean, the muffled lip, all testify to God's abhorrence of sin, and remind us that into that city can enter nothing that defileth, or worketh an abomination, or maketh a lie.

SATURDAY, Feb. 4. LEVITICUS XIV.

The leper might be healed and restored to his old place in Jewish society; but not without an elaborate ceremonial.

The two living birds illustrate the two aspects of our Saviour's mediatorial work: that He died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that He rose again. The blood sprinkled over running water tells of the prevalence of his never-ceasing intercession. But the bird dipped in the blood-besprinkled stream reminds me of Thee my Saviour! As she flew to her native woods, scattering a cloud of spray from her wings, so didst Thou fly to thy nest in thy Father's bosom. There is here a premonition and anticipation of thine Ascension!

The blood of the guilt-offering was placed on the right ear to show that the senses were cleansed and consecrated; on the right thumb to show that the deeds of the man, and on the right toe that his ways had passed through the processes of purification and sanctification. Have our senses, hands, and feet been cleansed and consecrated thus?

It is good to learn also that the leper was anointed with the oil, because this is the emblem of the Holy Spirit, as though to teach that senses, hands, and feet, which had been prostituted to the use of sin, may not only be cleansed by blood, but anointed by the Holy Spirit for high and heavenly ministry.

Revival:

What it is, and How it can be Obtained.

By Rev. E. D. SOLOMON.

II.

TO have a Revival of religion we must recognise its true source, and use the best means to promote it. We must look beyond the preacher to God. We do not always do that. We too commonly trust to an arm of flesh, and it fails us, and always will.

No human agency can be the source of a spiritual result such as conversion or renewed spiritual life. Without the spiritual power of God the most eloquent and impassionate preacher will speak in vain; but with that power the simplest Gospel utterances must tremendously tell. Without the direct coming of the Spirit of God our most perfected arrangements will end in nothing but superficial excitement and sentimental tears—a merely nervous galvanism, which soon passes away. With "the Baptism from on high," the better our preparation and arrangements to get at men and to attract and bring them within that sphere of the Holy Spirit's influence and power, the greater will be the saving results and the more numerous the converts.

I am stating truths that are familiar to us all, but they need restating and emphasising, because our great danger is of looking too much to the human instrumentality, and too little to the one and only source of spiritual power. But if, looking to that Divine source we prayerfully and earnestly use the means, ordinary or extraordinary—revivals and conversions are certain.

We sometimes misquote Scripture by saying, "Paul may plant, Apollos may water, but God must give the increase." The Bible does not say that. The Scriptural statement is more encouraging by far. It is this: "I (Paul) have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. So, then, neither is he that planted anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase."

If we use the means necessary for a revived life, such as meetings for special prayer and pointed faithful preaching; if we deal with sinners earnestly and faithfully in the name of Jesus, and look to God, and to God alone, for the power that transforms and saves—that revived life to the Church generally, and those conversions are not a question of haphazard at all, but are a Divine necessity. We plant and water, and God to us, as to the Apostles, gives the increase. That increase is certain.

Before sinners can be brought to their knees in repentance, believers must be brought to their knees in consecration and believing prayer. The only way to "get revivals up" is to get the quickening power down. "Have you any enquiring sinners?" asked one minister of another. "No," was the quick reply, "because

WE HAVE NO ENQUIRING SAINTS."

Spiritual effects must follow if we put our hands of prayer and faith on the spiritual power. The apostolic method is our model in every age.

"Tarry ye in . . . . Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high," said Jesus. "Ye shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you." . . . . "These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren." . . . . "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come they were all with one accord in one place"—still praying, still interceding for the heavenly power.

Any result? "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost."

Any other result? "And the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls!" What accomplished these great reviving soul-saving results? It was the power from on high! May we pray for it earnestly, unitedly, continuously! If we do so, as surely as God lives He will send a similar baptism on us. "O Lord, revive thy work!" And what is his reply to those who believe? It is this:

"I have glorified my Name, and I will glorify it again."

RECOLLECTIONS OF 1857-8.

DEAR SIR,—As you are writing reminiscences of the Revival in 1859, perhaps it would interest your readers to know something of the earlier movements preparing the way for that great awakening. You have already referred to the interest aroused in Ballymena, through the prayerful efforts of a lady, and the spirit of expectancy in which the country waited for a blessing which came in 1859.

Along with a friend I came over from the United States in the summer of 1858; we came across just for a holiday. Having passed through and taken interest in the American revival of 1857, the people on this side were glad to hear the news. You will recollect this great revival was not promoted or led by any remarkable evangelist, like D. L. Moody, it was the result of a great financial crisis. So many Christian merchants had been spending their whole energy in accumulating money, that they seemed to forget their chief end; they had a rude awakening when they saw their dollars taking wings, and they began to learn the lesson that this disaster was inteuded to teach. They gathered together for prayer and humble confession. I have seen the largest hall in Philadelphia crowded out at midday for weeks together. The a Y.M.C.A. was instituted; indeed, a revolution in favour of Christianity came over society at that time.

Having introductions from some of our American friends to their relatives in the North of Ireland, my friend and I went over for a little trip in the Belfast steamer from the Clyde. In reading the newspapers on board we noticed a rather amusing article, making fun of a certain Rev. Thos. Toye, who was said to be holding absurd meetings in his church in anticipation of a coming revival. We made up our minds to go that very night to see for ourselves. On reaching the church we were surprised to find it full. The minister was certainly quite original, but evidently a man of strong faith. He walked up and down the passages during the service. As he passed where we were sitting a gentleman drew his attention to us as young men just arrived from the United States. Mr. Toye at once seized on us, and insisted upon our coming to the front and telling the STORY OF THE REVIVAL THERE.

We were so much taken by surprise that nothing would induce us to face such a crowd without some little preparation. He would not leave us, however, without getting a promise from us to come back next day, which was Sabbath, and address his congregation. Having got this he at once went forward and announced that two young men, fresh from the scene of the revival in the United States, would occupy the pulpit on the following night. In fulfilment of our engagement we went and could hardly get into the building, the passages were filled, and every available corner occupied. This was in 1858, and shows the intense interest that had already been awakened in the north of Ireland by the news from America.

In visiting a friend who lived near Ballymena, we were called upon by the young men you have alluded to, who had heard of our arrival in that neighbourhood. They organised a meeting on very short notice. It was held on a bowling-green; people stood as closely as they possibly could, and completely filled the green, keeping each other dry, although it was a wet night. The attention and interest was very marked, and it was evident that the work of God's spirit had already commenced. We heard afterwards that many on the way home were seen kneeling by the roadside, refusing to go further until they had found peace with God. One man was wakened by hearing a noise in his back yard, and on going out was surprised to find his careless neighbour wrestling with God in prayer.

At Coleraine great interest was also manifested. We spent our second Sabbath there, and had meetings in three different churches. Having occasion to send some things to a laundry, I noticed on their return to one of the articles; it was a request for prayer for the careless brother of the Christian girl in the laundry, signed by herself. When we got as far as Portrush we found that the good news had hardly reached it. Two ladies who were there for their summer holidays insisted on our having a meeting in the Presbyterian church. I think I still see these godly women standing on the road and urging the passers by to come into the meeting. These ladies were the Misses Harley, who long had a boarding school for young ladies in Glasgow; they went afterwards to Montreux, and there were the means of getting that beautiful little Presbyterian church erected.

These are old stories now, and most of those who took an interest in these meetings have passed away to their reward. These reminiscences may interest some of your readers and awaken a prayerful longing that, under God's blessing, history may repeat itself in this respect, and that very soon. I may mention that at the time I am referring to three of our leading evangelical ministers in Glasgow were holding united meetings for an outpouring of the Spirit, which prayer was answered abundantly in the year following. Two of these have since then been called home, and have now doubtless many stars in their crown. I need hardly mention their names, Dr. Somerville and Dr. Andrew A. Bonar.—Yours very truly,

Geo. Macfarlane.

Oxford Letter.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

TERM begins this week and already we seem to feel the influx of new life in the city. Term comes as a relief to very many who depend almost entirely on the 'Varsity for employment. To tradespeople it means a few busier weeks; to lodging-house keepers long hours and in many cases entire absence from the means of grace, and to hundreds of college servants an incessant round of duty, sometimes at the highest pressure. To the Churches it comes as a call to increased watchfulness that no opportunity be lost for influencing the men, and prayer that the agencies on foot for their spiritual help may be blessed.

We record with thankfulness the success of the men's service at Saint Aldate's on Sunday afternoons. There has been a steady increase each Sunday. It is hoped the work will afford scope for the efforts of some undergrads who love souls, and who are willing to visit public-houses, and to do other aggressive work.

"When thou makest a dinner, call not thy friends . . . . lest they also bid thee again." This seems to be the motto of the Mayor (Mr. T. H. Kingerlee), who has issued a series of invitations, first to the day school children, then to the elementary school teachers, then to the aged poor, and on Thursday last, to the members of the various P.S.A. Societies. Some 1,400 or 1,500 guests were present, and Mr. Robinson Souttar was the chief speaker. Mr. Souttar is an old friend of Christian work in Oxford, and he took the opportunity of speaking on the importance of the home-life.

The British Chautauqua.—A conversazione in connection with this organisation was held a few days ago in Trinity Presbyterian Church, Stratford, E., when Rev. C. Anderson Scott, of Kensington, delivered an instructive lecture on "The Gospels: their Text, and How it was Transmitted and Restored." In terms easy of general comprehension he told the story of the great Greek manuscripts, early printed editions, and modern textual criticism. The interesting results of the investigations of the various scholars who have edited standard texts were brought into view, and their value shown as presenting the sacred Scriptures in their primitive purity and integrity, ready to hand for use by those who would translate them into the common tongues of the people. Rev. A. Jeffrey, minister of the church, presided over the meeting.

Are We Right?

A SERIOUS MISSIONARY QUESTION.

I WANT to call attention to a matter which is pressing upon me very seriously. It is this: Are we doing the best we can for China?

And what I mean is not—Is the Christian Church doing what it might for China? It certainly is not. Nor yet—Are we, who are doing the work, as zealous and self-denying and prayerful as we might be? We certainly are not. I mean this—Is what we are doing the best thing we can do?

I have nothing startling to point out; nothing new to say. What we are doing is known. The missionary societies know; the Christian Church knows; the missionaries know; and, speaking generally, all seem satisfied. No suggestion that anything is wrong is heard or thought of. I hesitate, therefore, to say what is in my mind. How can I but be mistaken in believing that to be wrong which God's honoured servants in the churches and societies, without question, apparently believe to be right?

Nevertheless, I will say it, and it is this: The various churches at home are sending out their missionaries to new lands to divide the native Christians into "parties." And I believe it is wrong. Missionaries are sent to set up their respective churches side by side, and that means to divide the Christians into parties—it is the same thing.

I do think we ought to be very honest about this matter, and I say deliberately, missionaries are sent to heathen lands practically pledged, and in many cases actually pledged, to set up their respective churches. They are sent to this province of China, and at this moment the few Christians in this province are being divided into parties or sects, and I ask

IS THIS RIGHT OR IS IT WRONG?

The main object of the missionaries, and of the societies which send them, is not, of course, to set up their own churches, but the Church of Christ. Everyone knows that; no one would question it for a moment. But this does not alter the fact that missionaries are sent on the understanding that they set up the churches their societies represent.

When a missionary bishop ordains a missionary in China, he becomes a clergyman of the Church of England, or Anglican Church. When a native at the same time receives precisely the same ordination, he also becomes a clergyman of the Church of England, or Anglican Church. Is it not the same with the other churches?

Everybody knows that the object of the various missionary societies is to evangelise and make disciples among the heathen. But one society advocates the Wesleyan system, another the Church of England system, another the Baptist, and so on. A missionary clergyman is expected to make a declaration, which cannot honestly, I think, be regarded as anything less than a solemn promise to set up the Anglican church; and should any still say it is not the Anglican church, then what church is it? A man, no matter how orthodox and respected a member, or minister, of his church he may be, cannot go out to the heathen as a missionary of the society which is conducted with his church unless he virtually promises, or at least tacitly consents, to set up that church wherever they send him.

Put then in the briefest way: The churches at home are sending out their missionaries to heathen lands to

DIVIDE THE CHRISTIANS INTO "PARTIES."

It will be said: "What is one to do? We must have order: there must be some form of organisation." Does this really answer the question? Does it make wrong, right? I cannot believe it: there must be a better way. And I think we are responsible if we do not care, and do not try to find it out.

The question in my mind is this—Does the Lord Jesus send his servants deliberately to start divisions in new countries?—for that is really what it comes to. If so, then it is all right. If not, then there is a better way. He knows all the circumstances and all the difficulties, and yet He tells us to go, if not to start divisions, then to work on some other plan.

Of our divisions at home it is sometimes said, "a little variety is good. The different parties emphasize different truths, and stimulate one another. This is useful." Are these divisions, then, the work of God's Holy Spirit? I ask you to look at the sects into which the Church of Christ at home is split up. Look at their attitude one towards another in the past. Look at their attitude to each other to-day. Is the feeling that exists between Christians of different denominations a right feeling? Do the different churches or sects help one another? Do they truly love one another? Do these divisions really conduce to the building up of a strong, united, Church of Christ?

On the contrary, we know well, the attitude of the Christian churches towards each other is unchristian, and most deplorable. It is the shame and weakness of our Christianity, an untold hindrance to Christian life, and fellowship, and power everywhere. This is not the work of the Holy Spirit.

Here I should like to say that at present in China speaking generally, there exists a very friendly feeling between the different Protestant churches. THE MISSIONARIES AND THE NATIVE CHRISTIANS OF THE VARIOUS DENOMINATIONS REGARD ONE ANOTHER AS BRETHREN, RECEIVE ONE ANOTHER, AND TO SOME EXTENT CO-OPERATE. Let me admit this very fully, and write it in capitals. Thank God that it is so.

Nevertheless the germ of the monster evil alluded to has been introduced, and is already working in China. The Christians are being divided into separate sects or parties. Day by day seeds are being sown, and the inevitable result is already beginning to show itself. And who is responsible? We are responsible. The missionary societies are sending out their missionaries, directly or indirectly, pledged to set up their different denominations in the same heathen country, in the same province, often in the same town, or, it may be, in the same street. THE CHRISTIANS ARE BEING DIVIDED, AND IT IS WE WHO ARE DELIBERATELY DOING IT. To the mind of one who has been thirteen years in the country, and who has watched this thing taking root, and insidiously spreading, it is inexpressibly sad. One cannot shut one's eyes to what it must lead to, and is leading to.

"The native Christians would disagree, and form sects in any case." Have we a right to say this? Let us remember who is "the Husbandman." The Chinese, too, are particularly homogeneous and a conservative race.

But supposing it were so, are we thereby justified in forestalling them, and adding to their possible divisions our own? Some people introduce opium into China, and excuse it much in the same fashion!

To my mind it is horrible to contemplate that, in days to come, the divided Christians, despising, almost hating one another, should be able to turn to the missionaries who may still be amongst them, and say: "You see all this. You tell us it should not be, BUT WHO SOWED THE SEEDS?"

It is not too late to do something now, if only we are willing. What a strange "if," and strange that it should be such a big one!

In another paper I hope to deal with the subject a little further.

J. HEYWOOD HORSBURGH.

Berlin.—Pastor Julius Rohrbach, writing from 28, Krumme-strasse, Charlottenburg, says:—"During the first week of January we had meetings for prayer every night at each of our halls with increasing interest. During the second week I held a daily course of Bible study with a good number of believers at Charlottenburg, which was blest to many in deeper love for his Word and fuller consecration to his service. This week we had Gospel services every night at Moabit with encouraging results. The work has grown beyond our strength, which is but weakness. We pray for helpers to come over."

The Lord's Call.

A FEW FACTS.

OUR Saviour's last command to his disciples was "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." Therefore, so long as there lives a human being who has not heard the Gospel, this command is binding on the Church, and on individual believers.

2. Jesus Christ tasted death for every one: therefore it is possible for every one to be saved.

3. Hundreds of millions of our fellow creatures in heathen lands are living and dying in ignorance of this fact—nineteen centuries after it was first made known!

4. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved;" but "how shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?"

No argument is needed to prove that if our Lord's command is to be obeyed, and if the heathen are ever to hear of the love of God, some of his redeemed ones must be willing to go, and others must be equally willing to aid in sending and maintaining those who do go. Now, I would urge you, my reader, to prayerfully put to yourself

THESE QUESTIONS:—

1. Am I in my right place or not?

2. Does my Saviour want me to leave all dear to me and go forth to preach the Gospel in heathen lands?

3. Am I willing to place myself unreservedly in his hands?

4. If convinced that my place is at home, am I doing all my Lord requires of me, and all that my love toward Him should prompt me to do in aiding those who have gone forth at his command?

But if, after much waiting upon the Lord, you feel quite sure that He would have you serve Him in foreign lands, continue to wait on Him till your future path is made unmistakably clear; then go boldly forward with set purpose to overcome all obstacles, and all through life "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." You may then depend on Him to supply all your needs and feel sure of the fulfilment of his promise, "Lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." I am often asked, are required for foreign mission work.

1. Spiritual. Unmistakable conviction of God's call to this service. Love for souls, and proved ability in dealing with the spiritual difficulties of others. If you have never won a soul for Christ at home, it is improbable that you will do so in other lands.

2. Mental. Ability to learn a foreign language; to plod on patiently, undaunted by difficulties; to adapt yourself to strange surroundings, and harmonise with other workers. Self-control. Persons subject to frequent fits of depression, or of irritable temper, should stay at home till these defects have been conquered.

3. Physical. Soundness of body is essential; also power to endure fatigue, and extremes of heat or cold; good digestion, with absence of fastidiousness in respect of food.

4. Educational. I put this last, but not because it is of least importance. Granted the other qualifications mentioned, the best educated man will make the best missionary; but there are spheres of service for many who have not had the advantage of high-class education, and many such now occupy eminent places among missionaries. A sound English education, such as would be required by a bank or mercantile firm, will suffice, with the addition of a thorough knowledge of the Word of God. You should have definite views on Scriptural subjects, for it would be unreasonable to go out as a teacher of others, with no clear ideas of what to teach.

It would be beyond the scope of this letter to expatiate at length on this subject, but what I have said will show you that the principal qualifications for mission work in foreign lands are:—strong faith in God and his Word; love for souls; ability to learn and to teach; soundness of mind and body; courage and patience; and education sufficiently thorough to enable you further to develop all your mental powers, by subsequent study and observation.

I would commend for your prayerful study, Proverbs xxiv. 11, 12; and Ezekiel iii. 17, 18. "The Lord give you understanding in all things."

The School for Bible Study.

THE Ten Weeks' School for Bible Study, conducted by Professor W. W. White, opened on Tuesday last week with a gathering in King's Hall, W.C. The assemblage was large, and included many Christian workers. Facing several hundreds of earnest men and women, young and old, the professor might well feel that his work in London was being inaugurated in most promising circumstances. The demonstration occupied precisely one hour, and it was explained that this length of time would uniformly be observed in the series of lessons.

From the outset, Professor White made it clear that he has ulterior as well as immediate aims in his work. While addressing the intelligence, he seeks to reach the heart; and this is his desire with disciples of Christ as well as with outsiders—the former for service, the latter for personal salvation. Having read 2 Cor. iv. 1-6, in which the Apostle emphasises sincerity and fidelity in Gospel ministry, he suggested of Scripture into three parts: Pre-incarnation Time: the Old Testament; Incarnation Time: the Gospels; Post-incarnation Time: the Acts to the Revelation. Of course, the Lord always will be incarnate, so post-incarnation time applies to all time since "the Word was made flesh."

Where should we begin to read the Bible? He had heard of a young man who felt stirred to study the Book; and he determined to begin at Genesis i. and consider every problem and difficulty as he went along. After he had been at work two years, he was still in the second chapter of the first book! A preferable way to study the Bible is to take a bird's-eye view of the whole in the light of its central Figure—Jesus Christ. There is a tendency nowadays to allow the good and difficult to stand in the way of the best and simple in Bible study; but coming as he had from India, where for two years he had witnessed the spiritual need of millions of heathen, he felt constrained for the future to throw himself more and more into the fundamental teaching of the Word.

It has been said of Isaiah liii. that it could not have been written if Jesus had not been coming. That might be affirmed of the entire Old Testament, even by one investigating history from a purely secular standpoint; with equal truth it may be said of the New Testament that it

WOULD NOT HAVE BEEN WRITTEN

if Jesus Christ had not come. Thus, having shown the central position occupied by our Lord, Professor White presented the Fourth Gospel for study as a beginning of the course. He sketched a scheme on the canvas, and after giving general information regarding the book and its contents, he asked the audience to associate every chapter with one prominent incident or fact described therein. This method yields valuable results in enabling one to localise the contents of Scripture; and by connecting other matters with the main facts, a very serviceable familiarity with the Word is attained. Under this head the ollowing were the main results:—

JOHN'S GOSPEL.

Chap.	Chap.	Chap.
1. John t. Baptist.	8. "Father."	15. Vine.
2. Cana Miracle.	9. Blind Man.	16. Holy Spirit.
3. Nicodemus.	10. Shepherd.	17. Lord's Prayer.
4. Samaritan.	11. Lazarus.	18. Garden.
5. 38 years' infirm.	12. Greeks.	19. Grave.
6. 5,000 Fed.	13. Supper.	20. Resurrection.
7. Feast of Tab.	14. Mansions.	21. Galilee.

Of the first chapter, it was remarked that Trench called it the Eureka chapter, because of its frequent records of "finding"; chapters v. and vi. both speak of numbers; the latter deals with bread, and is followed by one in which water is introduced (vii. 37, 38). The reason for chapter viii. being designated "Father," was found in the threefold use of the word in verses 39, 44, 49. The latter clause of verse 36 of chapter xii. is the point of departure from the record of Christ's public manifestation to that of a more private character in the company of his disciples.

Proceeding, Dr. White indicated the frequent use of the words "witness" and "believe" as showing the object of the Gospel—testimony with faith ever in view (xx. 31)—and passed on to speak of the confirmatory power of careful study. When he was a child he was taught that the Bible was true because it was the Word of God; he believed that still, but he had also come to conclude that it is true on other grounds—because, as a human writing, it stood the most exacting test. After a study of the argument of chapter v., it was maintained that the opening clause of verse 39 should read in the indicative rather than the imperative mood, "Ye search the Scriptures," &c. Christ had referred to John's witness, and appealed to the works which he had done in his Father's name, and now he directed attention to which were searched with confidence by the Jews, but without due reference to their true object. "These," said our Lord, "agree in the same testimony, which John the Baptist and the Father Himself bear regarding Me." Those who rejected Christ did so, not because of insufficiency of evidence, but because they would not believe (v. 38, 40). It is not in the Scriptures that we have life, but in Christ, to whom all Scripture refers. "Ye will not come" is still the explanation of man's rejection of Christ; not a matter of intellect, but of feelings, heart, will. In some concluding words, Dr. White intimated that, though he had come to England to address Christian people, that was not his sole and

ULTIMATE OBJECT.

He hoped others would be brought to the meetings, and there hear the Word of God. In America and India, as well as in England, many are praying that a great awakening may attend the study of the Scriptures during the three months now begun.

Professor White's reception in the other centres was equally cordial—in Kensington Town Hall later on Tuesday evening, and in Morley Hall, Hanover Square, on Wednesday afternoon—two lessons. Taking up Mark's Gospel on the second of these, the Professor rehearsed its general contents and illustrated its specific character. In the sixteen chapters nineteen miracles are recorded, as follows:—

MARK'S GOSPEL.

Chap.	Chap.	Chap.
1. Demon, Fever, Leper.	6. 5,000 Fed. Walking on Sea.	11. Withering of Fig Tree.
2. Sick of Palsy.	7. Syrophenician, Deaf Stammerer	12. Husbandmen.
3. Withered Hand.		13. Mount of Olives.
4. Calming of Sea.	8. 4,000 Fed. Blind Man.	14. Jewish Trial.
5. Legion, Issue, Jairus.	9. Transfiguration.	15. Roman Trial.
	10. Bartimeus.	16. Resurrection.

Chapters ix. and xiii. are both mountain scenes. The first nine chapters deal with the Galilean ministry of Christ, the remainder with the Judean. This Gospel records things coming to pass, being done, and is well explained in the words of Acts x. 38: "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with Him." A characteristic word is "straightway" which occurs forty-one times; the Greek word being uniformly so rendered in the Revised Version. Though this is the Gospel of activity and of "going on," it speaks frequently of Christ's retiring from public view in circumstances favouring the inference that this was for prayer. It was as Man, in the power of the Spirit, that Christ lived among us; and after his deeds of power—when virtue had gone out of Him—He went to the Father for a renewal of strength. Herein is a lesson and an example for all who work for God.

On Thursday afternoon, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, Professor White dealt with Matthew's Gospel; in the evening, in Mildmay Conference Hall, the prophecy of Amos was the subject of study. By way of preliminary a survey was made of

in which twelve periods were distinguished:—

Ante-diluvian	The Wandering	Divided Kingdom
Post-diluvian	The Conquest	Judean Kingdom
Patriarchal period	The Judges	Period of Captivity
The Bondage	United Kingdom	Restoration

Having explained the relation of these periods, and the nature of the experiences involved, Professor White indicated the place of the prophets in the days of the kings and afterwards. Singling out Amos for special attention, he spoke of his times and labours, and analysed the book bearing his name. The audience could not but be impressed with the tact of the prophet in delivering the messages he had received from God, speaking first of Israel's oppressive neighbours, and then of the favoured tribes themselves. The denunciations were set in their truly serious light, as was also the sycophantic conduct of Amaziah, the priest, in chapter vii., "O thou seer, go, flee thee away," &c. Before the politicians of Israel entertained fears in that direction, Amos prophesied the subsequent captivity. The treatment was mainly introductory; but it was lucid throughout, the old prophet being invested with a striking personality which excited a deep and intelligent interest in the oracles received through him.

[The Wednesday meetings will in future be held—at noon in Queen's Hall, Langham Place; at three o'clock in the Polytechnic, Regent Street, W.]

Chicago Bible Institute.

ACCORDING to the annual report, 506 students were enrolled in the Bible Institute last year, being an increase of twenty-eight over 1897. These figures do not include non-resident students, of whom there are quite a number, chiefly married students, who live outside with their wives. The students come from thirty-two States and territories; eighteen foreign countries were also represented, upwards of forty students being from the United Kingdom. It is thus seen that the students come from all parts of the world, and when their training is finished they scatter to all parts of the world, over 130 old students being in the mission field.

The special features of last year's work included a summer course extending over the months of June, July, August, and September. The purpose of this course, was to accommodate college students and ministers who could not attend the Institute for a longer time. Ninety-three passed the special examination at the end of this course last summer, and received certificates.

The Bible Institute Extension Lectures are also proving very successful this winter. At present this branch of work is confined to the Evening Bible Classes, of which five are held each week in different sections of Chicago and suburbs. Upwards of 6,000 members are already enrolled, and some marvellous testimonies have been given as to blessings received at these classes. They are now planning further extensions in the direction of correspondence courses in Bible study and in music.

The Colportage department, whose purpose is to issue handy volumes of stories and sermons by such men as Mr. Moody, Dr. Talmage, and other leaders, also reports continually increasing interest and operations.

One very pleasing feature in connection with the work here is the deep interest among all sections of the Christian church for Bible study. The work in the Chicago Avenue Church goes on with ever increasing interest. Something like 2,500 children and others gather on a Sunday afternoon in the Sunday school, this being almost the largest school in America.

It has been my joy to preach here eighteen times a week in the various churches and in the prison, and to lecture to the students in the Institute, and we have had the privilege of pointing very many to the Lord Jesus Christ in our after-meetings. Our meetings at Willard Hall, in the central part of the city, at the noon hour for business men have been very largely attended. CHAS. INGLIS.

THE LATE

Miss Hester Needham.

SOME time ago there went home one whose life and work ought to be had in remembrance. HESTER NEEDHAM was born in January, 1843, and was the younger of two sisters. Her childhood was spent in happy homes in the country, with a short period of school life at the sea. She was clever but not strong, and had to spend some weeks at one time on her back, owing to a weak spine. Before she was twenty her mother died, and, as her sister had already married, she and her father were left together.

From that time she seemed to grow rapidly in the Christian life. She was remarkably qualified to shine in society; and when they settled in London she arranged dinner parties and went out a great deal with her father. But side by side with this, she regularly visited St. George's Hospital to read to the patients. More and more work of the kind was added, such as district visiting and Sunday school teaching.

Then came a great undertaking—the transformation of the "Rose and Crown" gin palace, Knightsbridge, into a coffee tavern, with lodgings for men. She was the instigator of this scheme; for months prayer was made for it daily, until friends and funds were raised up, and the thing was done. When this was put on a firm footing, her thoughts turned to the young women in the neighbourhood. She had visited them in shops and workrooms and knew their needs. Again the daily prayer began with effort and thought; and before very long, in 1878, a house in Brompton Road was found, which has ever since been known as the "Princess House." This became the home of her branch of the Y.W.C.A. For eleven years this Princess House was Miss Needham's daily work and interest.

In 1886 her father died; she then took the adjoining house to "Princess House," living in two small rooms, and using all the rest of the house in connection with the work. After a year or two she felt that other parts of London needed help, and, in turn with various devoted workers, she went to Walworth for a month at a time; hiring a room, and trying to bring some Christian light and love into the lives of the working-girls there, who were of the very wildest character.

In the midst of all this full, useful, and flourishing work she began to be impressed with the feeling that God was calling her to go elsewhere; but it was some months before it was shown to her where He would send her. At the close of a large public meeting in April, 1889, a small pamphlet was given to each one on leaving. This was a letter from Miss Barclay on her way out to China as a missionary. In it she mentioned some place in Sumatra which, forty years before, had asked for Christian teaching, and for all these years there had been no response. This was God's call to our friend, and before twenty-four hours had passed she had said "Yes" to the call; though what or where the place was, or under what society she could go, she knew not.

After much inquiry she found the country was under the Dutch Government, and missionaries had been sent out by the Barmen Mission in Germany, although not to Mandailing, the district in question. She went to Barmen; offered herself; was accepted.

On Christmas Eve, 1889, she arrived at Pansur na Pitu in Sumatra, and there she stayed for three years. For the first few months she was busy learning the language; but, by God's help and her own aptitude for languages, she very soon got to work; with a native Christian man she went to visit the villages round and hold meetings for the women. They visited more than fifty villages, under great difficulties, going on foot through streams, over rough wooden bridges, up steep mountains, through rice fields—and all this in the tropics!

The interest kept her up for some months; then her spine gave way and she had a time of great illness and pain. From September, 1890, until her death in May, 1897, she hardly ever even sat in a chair, but was obliged always to lie flat. But this, she said in her strong faith, "rather helped the work;" for the Battas came to see the Christian aspect of sickness and trouble—that of patience, brightness, and perfect trust in God.

She had more to bear than we know of—the pain, weakness, and depression of her bodily condition, the death of the missionary's wife with whom she was living, and many other things.

Through all she was constantly at work. Prayer-meetings, meetings for women and for children, filled her days. She built a "Princess House" at that station, where she lived with a native girl as servant.

The work was very greatly blessed there, but in January, 1893, she moved on to another station, where she seemed more needed. She was carried there on a bed by four men, and again lived in a missionary's family till a mission-house was built. Here she had a larger sphere of work, chiefly in a night school for girls, seventy or eighty coming, who slept on the native mats in the large room after school, going home at daybreak to their work. She had much encouragement here.

All through these years she was waiting and watching for an opening to go south to Mandailing. At last, in July, 1895, the time came; again she bade good-bye to all her friends, and set out, accompanied by a native Christian, his wife and little children, and a native Christian young woman, with their attendant bearers and porters, on the fortnight's journey to Mandailing. She parted with nearly all her few possessions, and lived like a native as to food and clothing. For nearly two years she witnessed for Christ in that dark semi-heathen, semi-Mohammedan land. She was forbidden by the Government to teach or have any distinct mission work; but was more than content to show to the people what the life of a Christian family is. She had an ever open house for any one who wished to see, or hear, or have conversation; in every way she sought to sow the seed and start a work which she trusted might be watered and carried on by others.

In all this life, Miss Needham said she was perfectly happy, and that each year was more full of joy than the last; but all was done in increasing weakness and suffering, partly owing to the bad climate.

During her fatal illness, the only European within thirty miles, a missionary, was most kind to her. She was nursed by three faithful native Christian men. When the final call came she had her wish of having only her dear natives with her at her death.

It is impossible, in a short sketch, to give any idea of her life; her entire consecration, joyous faith, and singleness of purpose; her deep love and constant prayer; united with this, her strong will, bright cleverness, and attractive power. Her life was a living sermon to very many; her letters, sent regularly for seven years and a half, were an inspiration to all who had the privilege of seeing them.

It should be added that Miss Needham, who had aided liberally in the London work, went out to Sumatra entirely at her own expense; and that there, with her own means, she built two "Princess Houses" and maintained several Christian teachers.

Theological Students and Missions.

THE students of the Free Church Theological Colleges in London have lately been considering what efforts they can make in view of the financial condition of some of the leading Missionary Societies. It appears that these are all more or less hampered with annual deficits, which in some cases are allowed to accumulate, and in others are only cleared from time to time by spasmodic efforts. This state of things greatly interferes with aggressive work, and in some cases necessitates the curtailing of work already established. The students emphasise the fact that systematic giving in a measure more adequate to the claim of the societies should be aimed at, rather than the mere taking of collections, by which Christians are too often allowed to ease their consciences.

A "plan of campaign" has been issued and sent to several of the leading Baptist, Congregational, and Wesleyan chapels in London and the suburbs, asking that the students may be allowed to organise and address meetings, where they can give information as to the needs, claims, and possibilities of the foreign missionary movement. We notice they take the watchword "The Evangelisation of the World in this Generation." The matter has been taken up by all the London Free Church theological colleges—viz., Pastors' and Regent's Park, Cheshunt Hackney, and New and Richmond. Further particulars may be had on application to the hon. general secretary, Mr. F. J. Shipway, Regent's Park College, N.W.

Other Lands.

First Days in India.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

IT was in the early dawn of the day before Christmas that we reached Bombay. I was on deck at six o'clock, just before sunrise. A haze of clouds above us was glowing in crimson; before, slightly to our right, a low range of hills, the brightening glow in the sky above them, indicating that the monarch of the day was slowly approaching from that direction. The light became more and more brilliant, the Southern Cross died out in light, some hand withdrew the last curtain, and the sun stepped out, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race.

A little boat, rowing hard, brought the pilot aboard; the white-clad ship's officers handed her to his care, and came down from the bridge; the steamer resumed her course, but slowly, and we were soon anchored in one of the finest natural harbours in the world.

It is, perhaps, two hours before preliminaries are settled and we are allowed to land. A launch brings us to the landing-stage, where a little group awaits us. My heart is in my throat. This is India; these are the men—Mr. Anderson, of the Student Volunteer Movement, the foremost—who have planned this tour; and as we cross the bridge they warmly welcome us.

A few hours in Bombay, full of interest, and then the train for Poona. We ascend for five hours, rising 2,000 ft. above the sea level, and in the brilliant moonlight reach the ancient capital of the Mahrattas. But what words can describe the magnificence of that railway journey! The fantastic shapes of the mountains, the plains at their foot, the wooded valleys scooped out like vast saucers, the glimpses of far extended tracks of country. The eye wearies and seeks some standard of measurement, so baffling are these immense elevations and distances.

On the platform, a little crowd lingers to greet the overdue train, for even here Christmas makes a difference. Before we may descend, a doctor enters our carriage (for we are from Bombay, an infected area) and feels our pulses. He passes us as healthy, and we alight. Our kind host, Mr. Bailey, grasps us by the hand, welcomes us, introduces us to a native pastor, a group of village missionaries, and others, and places us in his ghari (a light four-wheeled carriage). We are swiftly driven through the town to his bungalow.

VERY KIND AND HOMELIKE

is the greeting of his wife and himself to the tired travellers arriving, travel-worn and homesick, on Christmas Eve!

Mr. Bailey formerly served in India in the 6th Dragoons. He then returned to England, and became secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Cork. By a strange providence, whilst there he received the means which enabled him to return to India as an honorary missionary. He came direct to Poona to take up the work which Mr. R. P. Wilder had inaugurated among the two thousand Brahmin students being educated here for Government service. Three times a week some fifty or sixty of these meet with him over the Bible; and when it is remembered that the members of this gathering are perpetually going forth to all parts of India, it is evident that this work is fraught with the most important possibilities.

I shall never forget my first service in India on Christmas morning. Awaked at six in the cold dark morning; choti-harzi (little breakfast) at 6.30; service at 7.30; a spacious church filled with India's children; two large schools of sweet girls, one of boys, many adults, who sing unmistakably "Hark! the Herald Angels." The native pastor conducts the first part of the service, and I preach: "Fea not. . . . unto you is born a Saviour;" sentence by sentence translated. Fear not the penalty of sin, Jesus saves by his death; fear not the power of sin, Jesus saves by his life; fear not the mystery of death, Jesus has passed and repassed. The heathen fear; but we rejoice in certain knowledge of the love of God in the gift of Christ.

The heat in the middle of the day is intense, and we dare not venture out till the evening service at six o'clock. The spacious church is now filled with English people, and my beloved brother, Bishop Thoburn, accompanies me to the pulpit, and commends me to God. That is the first of memorable meetings, characterised by profound attention, eager response, and the MIGHTY PRESENCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

And who are these? To begin there are some fifty missionaries connected with the Poona and Indian Village Mission, most of whom have come from Australia and are scattered over an area of 100 miles radius, living among the villagers, principally in the native states. This is Mr. Reeve, the founder and director of the Village Mission; and this, Rev. J. Small, of the Free Church Mission, with his colleague, Mr. Torrens; and this, Rev. Mr. Bruce, of the American Mahratta Mission, who has printed and circulated some three million tractlets in the vernacular; and this, Rev. W. C. Whiteside, of the C.M.S, and his colleague, who is in charge of the Divinity school; and here, Rev. W. W. Bruère, Mr. Hill, evangelist of South Africa, and Rev. D. D. Fox, of the M.E. Mission. Here are one or two officers of high rank, several Christian soldiers, officials from the Government offices, a large contingent of lady missionaries, and many native pastors and Christians.

After our early morning meeting, on one of the days at Poona, we drive through the native town, appalled by its teeming thousands; visit the native bazaar, deafened by its clamour; witness the domestic life of the people, bewildered by the multitude of unfamiliar scenes. There are the little shops, the sellers sitting cross-legged behind their wares; men squatting in groups talking, or pouring through the narrow thoroughfares in every variety of dress; or being shaved as they sit on the ground, their barbers opposite them; the women, carrying water-jars, washing at the fountains, balancing the babies on their hips; little naked black-eyed children in swarms; slender, graceful girls; oxen slowly dragging carts with disc-like wheels; the sacred cow, garlanded, going quietly from house to house for food and caresses; here and there a native carriage, the close-drawn blinds and armed footmen indicating that high-caste Hindu ladies are within.

On another morning we visit the great heathen temple of Parbutti, founded some two hundred years ago, and interesting as the place where the last Hindu wife was burned on her husband's bier in 1815. We saw the spot. The temple crowns the top of a lofty hill, and is reached by about one hundred very broad stone steps, which the Prince of Wales climbed on his elephant when he visited the spot. At the foot we crossed a river, in which sixty Hindoo widows from Pundita Ramabai's Home were recently baptised. What a significant contrast! Above, the heathen temple, dirty, tawdry, out of repair, the scene of indescribable abominations under the name of religion—the focus of the unspeakable and here, the simple Christian rite, in the Name before which those rites must disappear, and of members of that unfortunate class, whose wrongs cry to heaven, but who, through the Gospel, are already being saved, sanctified, lifted to an honourable life, and fitted for holy service.

A half-naked priest, who was educated in a mission school and speaks English, offers to conduct us round. He seems one of the most despicable of men, for, to hear him speak, and to judge by his sneers, you would judge that he has lost all faith in his gods, and yet he clings to the temple for the revenue it brings—unless, indeed, his sneers are assumed, the better to ingratiate himself with us.

The noise of drums in the loft above the entrance calls to worship, and groups of natives, bearing offerings, are ascending with us. Within, there are three small temples at the corners of a square and one in the centre. Each is cupola in shape, the top gilded. The three are about four feet deep, and barely high enough to admit of a priest standing erect. In two of them naked priests, except for their waist band, are offering little vessels filled with milk, rice, vegetables, and as they do so recite prayers. Our guide says while the priests feed on what is left. I notice the ringing of the bell to awake the god, the swaying of the body, the votive offerings, which recall what one sees in Roman Catholic and Ritualist churches. That is the god of wisdom, hideous, with elephant head; and that of light, and that of love. Yonder is Siva, the Destroyer, and here a garlanded stone effigy of the Bull, lying in front of the idol shrine. From a coign of vantage in the surrounding wall we have a marvellous view of Poona, on the further side of the valley; and immediately below is a village, with perhaps twenty houses in it; the priest says that there are perhaps 1,000 people living there, sometimes seventy in a house, and this is a fair specimen of the 1,700 villages which lie within a five-mile radius of Poona, the immense majority entirely unevangelised and ignorant of the very name of Christ.

We drive thoughtfully along the cactus-bordered roads to our happy Christian home, with its texts and comfort, its hymns and open Scripture. How great the contrast! But we remember that it is written, "The idols He shall utterly abolish;" we know that the Father has given these sites and these heathen to his Son for his inheritance; and we anticipate the time when the idol shrines which we have visited to-day will be utterly neglected, and snakes and squirrels shall make their undisturbed home in the abandoned shrines. But more workers are sorely needed; not only missionaries, but Christian people who will come to live in this beautiful city for Christ's sake. And indeed, in this lovely air, with these cool nights, it would seem as if there can be no peril to health; whilst the assistance that private Christians may render to missionaries is simply incalculable, even apart from any acquaintance with the language. "And I heard a voice saying, whom shall I send, and who will go for us?"

TO MY LARGER CONGREGATION.

I want in a few words to record God's great goodness in the Bombay Mission just closed. In six days, I have addressed fifteen meetings, and have had many private interviews with missionaries and natives, and feel that the many prayers offered on our behalf have been graciously answered.

The morning Bible readings in the Presbyterian Church have been specially attended by missionaries and Christian workers; but in the afternoon gatherings in a large central hall, considerable numbers of natives have also been present, and have listened with deep attention to the addresses on deliverance from sin and the power of the Holy Spirit. The expressions of thankfulness for help received have made me feel that it would have been worth crossing the ocean if for no other purpose than to hold these meetings in the second largest city of the Empire.

My wife and I have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Peel, of the C.M.S. Mission, who have shown us the warmest kindness. We have been welcomed by the Bombay Missionary Conference at a special gathering, and I have had opportunities of preaching for the Episcopal Methodists and Baptists, besides holding a conference with native pastors. Mr. and Mrs. Eddy of the S.V.M.U. are now travelling with us to the North-West provinces, where we are anticipating great blessing, as there has been much prayer and preparation. Again I entreat for prayer, that God may graciously use his word mightily, that on all this thirsty land there may come a plentiful rain.

Bombay, January 2. F. B. MEYER.

In the Nizam's Land.

LAST night a woman, who a year ago shouted curses at us as we passed through her village street, and who refused even water to the thirsty outcast Christian in that same street, was sitting amid a listening crowd of women telling the story of Jesu Swami. Two years ago these dirty jungle women banged their doors in the faces of the lady doctors; now they are singing Christian lyrics in their rice fields. In the brilliant moonlight they speak one to another of the wonders of Jesus. Instead of hiding their faces from the white faced "feringee" they are crowding at the rate of 500 per week from far and near, either to the busy Medak dispensary or to the touring medical camp at the village markets.

Our district is swiftly becoming a large and joyful family. When you first began to help us, we had forty Christian children in our schools; to-day we have 170. Then we had only two jungle schools; to-day there are eight. Since then six chiefs of the outcast villages have become Christians, and their people are being received family by family as they are prepared to endure the inevitable persecution. At our monthly gatherings are parents who tramp thirty, forty, and fifty miles. They sleep by their children, and return home with a song in their hearts and a meal (which you have helped to give them) tied up in their ragged dress.

Eighteen months ago we received our first little village girl in the old whitewashed stable; her pitiable request was for a dub's worth (half a farthing) of toddy. Now she, like all the others, is a pledged abstainer. The other day she was overheard teaching her mother the Lord's Prayer before they lay down to sleep.

I wish you could be at our service to-morrow. There will be ten boys playing their beautiful Indian fiddles, and the whole school will be dressed in clean white clothes which they have made themselves. One little boy will walk up the aisle with a big basket of rice on his head; it is his father's thankoffering—for a year ago, in the terrible famine time, we watched night and day to save the young child's life.

Whilst telling you of the way in which God has rewarded your loving help, I must also petition for your further kindness and sympathy, that we may extend your Christlike work to every village within our reach. EMILIE POSNETT.

Industrial Missions.

THERE seems to be some likelihood of a long-felt need in the Mission Field being supplied. The Industrial Missions Aid Society, whose objects are to find employment for native converts, and to raise funds for missionary purposes, is commencing to establish mission industries in connection with existing missionary effort. Ahmednagar, in the Presidency of Bombay, is the spot chosen for the immediate establishment of an Indian carpet factory, the first of a series of industries proposed to be started in different parts of India. A missionary stationed for some years in the town, pointed out to one of the directors of the society, who visited India last year, the opportunity Ahmednagar presented for the establishment of a mission industry on the lines, and with the objects, of those set on foot by the Industrial Missions Aid Society, and invited the Society to commence operations there at once, promising the hearty co-operation of his own mission, also undertaking to supply a carpet factory with about a hundred trained hands per annum from amongst the youths who are taught carpet-making in the Technical School of the Mission.

The advent of the I.M.A.S.'s factory will be a great boon to the missionary, as, hitherto, there has been no opening for the hands he has trained, owing to there being no carpet factory in the neighbourhood. The services of a practical man, who was in training as a missionary at Harley College, have been engaged, and he is now on his way to India to superintend the work of the factory.

The Industrial Missions Aid Society (interdenominational) will be glad to hear from any missionary or other person willing to co-operate in the establishment of mission industries in India or elsewhere. Communications should be addressed to the Secretary at the offices of the society, 10, Paternoster Row, E.C.

The Zionist Movement.

AT a meeting on Sunday last, to inaugurate the formation of the English Zionist Federation, Sir Francis Montefiore remarked upon the rapid progress of the Zionist movement, in spite of the contempt and calumny of those who did not understand its aims or appreciate its fundamental sentiments. It was objected, he said, to Zionism that it was not orthodox; but as their liturgy teemed with passages supplicating that they might return to Jerusalem, he concluded that those who made that objection did not consider it orthodox to believe in the efficacy of prayer.

Then it was objected that the soil of Palestine was too poor and barren for cultivation. That allegation appeared to him to be so serious that he determined to make a searching investigation of the subject. He found that though much of the soil was, from an agricultural point of view, in a very unsatisfactory state, this was entirely owing to the land having, for many years, been shamefully neglected. In the opinion of men who had closely studied the matter, and who could speak with authority, if a proper system of agriculture were introduced into Palestine, the land would again become very fertile, and capable of supporting a population ten times larger than at present.

Many Jews have a great aptitude for mercantile and commercial undertakings, and Palestine was a country in which, from its geographical position and for other reasons, the mercantile and commercial resources might easily be vastly increased. If they should ever be appalled by the magnitude of the task that lay before them, or be disheartened by the malignity of their enemies, let them remember that Zionism was the beacon light showing them the way to the land towards which the hearts of all good Jews must ever lovingly incline—the land which belonged to their ancestors, and which the highest of all authorities had declared should yet again be theirs.

An Important Work in France.

IN a very central part of Paris, in the place near the side entrance of the Palais Royal, is found the depôt which serves admirably to advertise, in large characters, Bibles and Gospels for the British and Foreign Bible Society. Here also the Religious Tract Society has its stores advertised with equal prominence. Such prominent characters catch the eye of the passers-by, whether on foot or on the many omnibuses. Not a few come in for the inspired Book, and hosts of applications come from all parts of the country for supplies of tracts, mostly from persons in humble life, and some few with offers of payment.

Not a few ask questions concerning this Evangelic Propaganda, and many are glad to have instruction in the way of life, and have their difficulties removed by the lady who places herself at their service with kindness and courtesy. The foreign traveller will find here a salon for repose, and materials for writing a letter, and all supplies for distribution according as he requires them, also journals and reports of the various societies.

The inception of this agency took place in 1876 on the platform of the Mildmay Conference Hall, and it has made its way from year to year with increasing usefulness. At present its great want is the material aid for printing and distributing tracts over a wide region in France at this critical moment. Such assistance can be sent to the Religious Tract Society, St. Paul's Churchyard, London, E.C., for this purpose, or to M. Vasseur, No. 4, Place du Théâtre Français, Paris.

Lord's Day Rest Association. — A New Year's address issued by this association refers to the struggle at the London County Council on the question of Sunday concerts, and the resolution of the Council that the holders of music licences should not open on Sundays "for private gain or by way of trade." A proposal to omit from the music licence the words prohibiting Sunday opening was defeated by 79 votes against 8. In defiance of the clear terms of the licence, the clear votes of the L.C.C., and the clear words of the Lord's Day Act, the concerts on Sunday afternoons and evenings for money at the Queen's Hall are still in full swing. At Birmingham and Derby the magistrates refuse to allow Sunday concerts for private gain. At Edinburgh, Cowes, and Bournemouth the local authorities have refused to allow Sunday band performances. The Sunday labour involved by Sunday concerts is shown by the fact that at one concert which had been arranged at the Alhambra Theatre, 350 performers were advertised, including an orchestra of 70 professionals.

Home Missions.

Home of Industry.

OUR much esteemed friend, Miss Annie Macpherson, sends out an occasional paper, which contains many interesting details of her stewardship, and of her fellow workers during the past year. We subjoin some extracts:—

Continually, in Bird Fair, among the young men or young women, the children, Mothers' Meetings, on the street by the Bible-barrow, in the homes of the poor, or in our varied correspondence, we have had the joy of witnessing for our precious Lord. From these some have become our best fellow-helpers, working for their living among the masses, thereby coming in close contact with souls who in these days of terrific temptations and pleasure, so called, need continual watching over. During the year, we have had our appointed trials and difficulties, which have made the promise sweet, and have given new life to prayer; grace has been provided, and every need supplied. Through the providential leading of our Father, we did not send our usual second party to Canada. The children are still in the Training Home, and will be the better for the extra care and schooling.

We are still strongly convinced that there is plenty of room in our loved Dominion. There is no land on earth where children are loved for their own sake so much. There, our youngsters, having been carefully trained, are soon amalgamated with the people, and grow up naturalised; so that they are unknown as former emigrants to the officials of the New Act, but they record from lists of the united arrivals from varied sources, the number to be about 30,000. We look back on the busy past 30 years, interspersed with the 66 voyages to and fro that several of us have taken to Canada, with thankfulness, as pioneers; none of us have a regret, but we are full of gladness.

In the past year, tidings from Canada tell of about a dozen who have married; some of them have spent their honeymoon at our Home in Ontario, others have settled in the United States, or in farther North West provinces of Canada. Others have saved their earnings and are now students at Toronto, Chicago, and Nyack, whilst two have gone as missionaries to South America, and to Ikwezi Lamaci in Natal. Another grown-up, sent in a time of need, knowing nought of it, fifty dollars as a thankoffering; he is now travelling for a firm in a new town in the North West.

CHILDREN'S TRAINING HOME.

It has been great joy to receive the little ones for testing and training during the past year, and to see the changes wrought in these sorrow-laden children, won by love to place confidence in us as their friends, and then patiently taught the way of Life. Our aim is to train them to be useful in their spheres of life. Many of them have never known what "home-life" is, and have no idea of obedience or good behaviour. It is very touching to see the delight on their little faces when, cleanly clothed, they are shown their comfortable little bed with its white sheets—a new experience altogether! We remember a boy, who had been badly treated by a drunken father, writing his first letter to a respectable aunt, telling her that now he could go to bed at nine o'clock, and could sleep all night long, and not be disturbed! The poor boy had often been turned out of the miserable bed to get drink for his wretched father.

Some of our little ones have widowed mothers struggling against the direst poverty, who once knew better days; and the poor women's tears of gratitude are most touching when they visit their children, and find them comfortable and happy. Others are quite friendless, and though very young, have already tasted deep sorrows in their lives.

Several aged widows have been called "home" during the past year, and many others seem to be just on the border-land, so very weak and ailing are they. Yet, in spite of their aches and pains they love to come to their sewing class. Our light airy school-room is such a pleasant change from their close little rooms, to say nothing of the hot comforting cup of tea, and bread and butter, or sandwich, when the funds will allow; also, the sixpence which is invaluable to these poor old bodies. These are the temporal attractions, but we believe that many of our widows value the spiritual help they receive.

Another year of plodding, earnest work among our young women has gone by, and we have constantly recognised our Father's guiding hand and faithfulness towards us in all the details of the work. Our sewing classes have been most satisfactory, the number of members the highest, and the attendance the most regular we have ever known. The girls appreciate the bright, cheerful evenings, and except during the twenty minutes devoted to the Gospel address, which is often eagerly listened to, and always in perfect silence. The "Christian Band," too, has gathered in good numbers week by week, and we have been encouraged to see how gladly they come together for an hour's study of God's word. Once a month our Saturday evening prayer meeting has always been set aside as a missionary night, when letters and reports are read, followed by earnest prayer for missionaries in the field. This year we felt it should take a more practical form, so invited the girls to bring their own material, which should be cut out into native garments, and then spend a good portion of the evening in working at them; to our surprise, so willingly did these hard-working girls spare both time and pence, that we were able to send about 130 articles to India, including many dolls, &c.

Visiting the factories and workrooms still forms a large portion of the work. In many of them we have had much joy and encouragement during the past year, and some have confessed themselves on the Lord's side, as the result of the weekly messages to which they have listened. We come across very sad stories in the lives of some of these toiling ones; one poor woman has had two operations for cancer, and is in constant pain; but she must work on as long as she can, before she is forced to go to the dreaded infirmary, there to await the sorrowful end. In another workroom a girl far gone in consumption, the only support of her aged mother, works away her little remaining strength at shoe-making. We urged her to take a few days rest, but the only answer was, "I must go on as long as ever I can for mother's sake." How we long to help such as these, by brightening their burdens, or by giving them rest in fresh country air. A kind friend who has a little home in Epping Forest, often generously receives a girl free of cost. Perhaps some one who reads this, and has a country or seaside home, would receive some of these needy ones to enjoy God's beautiful earth.

A Seamen's Mission.

THE Portsmouth and Gosport Seamen's Mission held its forty-sixth anniversary meeting on January 13, under the presidency of Mr. R. C. Morgan.

Mrs. Cook, the superintendent of the Mission, said that since the suspension of the coasting work many friends were led to believe that the Mission had ceased to exist, whilst in reality the work nearer home has been carried on more successfully and efficiently than ever before. According to its motto, "Glory to God and salvation to men," it does not confine itself to seamen alone, but takes hold of every opportunity to proclaim the Gospel of Christ, taking in all the branches of a general mission. In the course of last year a steam-launch was bought, which has proved a great factor in supplying sailors of all nationalities with Testaments and text-cards in their own languages. Seed thus scattered is being carried off into far countries, and his word will not return void.

There is a prospective expense of about £150 for repairs at the Bethel. Mrs. Cook expressed the hope that as her Heavenly Father was rich, his stewards would share in the financial burden, and help in various other ways, such as in sending parcels of books, warm articles, or anything that can be made use of by the sailors. This mission, as the report will show, has been doing much for comparatively little money.

Mr. Coffin followed with an account of his and his brother's evangelistic visits to the different vessels, and of the great joy with which their gifts were generally accepted. He touched upon incidents in connection with their personal dealings with souls that were full of encouragement to the workers.

Mr. Durrant, the predecessor of Messrs. Coffin, said that the initials of the Portsmouth Gospel Seamen's Mission pressed upon his mind four things needful to a successful worker.—(1) Prayer, (2) Gospel, (3) Steadfastness, and (4) Might of the Holy Spirit. He also gave touching reminiscences of his own experiences last year among th esailors.

The Rev. C. Tanner (Ch. of Eng.) wrote his regret at his inability to be present. Rev. J. S. Wyard (Congl.), Rev. Mr. Lovell (Union), and Rev. Mr. Pearson, Wesleyan Army and Naval Chaplain, as well as Capt. Riley and Mr. Hogben, expressed their hearty appreciation of the mission in model addresses of brevity and comprehensiveness and point.

The Chairman, who had known the mission almost from its origination by the late Mr. Henry Cook, expressed his deep sympathy with the work as at present carried on. Mrs. Cook's address is 47, Stoke Road, Gosport, Hants.

The Christian Community.

THE New Year's gathering of this most usefu society took place recently at the Memorial Hall, Bethnal Green. The chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Seagram, who gave a thoughtful address, noticing various forces which are ranged before the Christian worker in the present day, and which he must combat. Mr. R. C. Morgan's words which followed did not fail to prove an inspiration to all who heard them. Mr. Geo. Nokes treated the meeting to one of his unique speeches—a combination of sturdiness and pathos. Mr. J. A. Branch also spoke briefly.

At the close each male member of the society was presented with a valuable book on behalf of Sir George Williams, and the lady workers were also presented with a volume, the gift of Mr. Morgan. A. B.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Kettering Y.M.C.A. has, by a campaign, increased its membership from sixty-three to over two hundred.

The Croydon Y.M.C.A. is doing excellent work under the direction of the newly-appointed secretary, Mr. F. S. Higman.

The members of the Leicester Association have entertained, for the tenth time, 750 of the poorest children of the town to a substantial tea.

A successful conference on the "Inner Life of the Association" was held at York Y.M.C.A. The gathering was a most enthusiastic one, and a practical discussion took place.

The Richmond Y.M.C.A. has held its annual meeting, which was addressed by Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson and Rev. J. Alford Davies. A large debt which hampered the association has been removed through the kindness of several warm friends of the work.

The Prayer Room at Aldershot, sanctioned by the military authorities for the use of the members of the Soldiers' Christian Association, was opened last week. The room has been comfortably furnished, and will doubtless prove a great boon to the many Christian men in this large camp.

Mr. Allan Frost, of Newport, Mon., has been appointed secretary of the Calcutta Young Men's Christian Association in succession to Mr. A. P. Stockwell, resigned. Mr. Frost has for some time been in training at the Bible Institute, Bothwell Street, Glasgow, and formerly rendered valuable honorary service in connection with the Bath and Bournemouth Y.M.C.A.'s.

A large company of friends of the Wimbledon Association assembled, by invitation of the president, Mr. A. A. Head, and Mrs. Head, for a New Year's reception on the 13th inst. Different departments of the work were reported on, and showed that a varied and interesting programme was being carried out with much usefulness among young men. The debt on the excellent premises which have been acquired for the association at a cost of £2,200 is now entirely liquidated.

Mr. William Hill reached Madras from South Africa a few days before the opening of the week of prayer for young men in November, and conducted an Evangelistic mission for three consecutive weeks in connection with the Madras Association. Bible readings were given every morning during this and the following week, the interest was maintained throughout, and a number of men avowed their purpose to follow Christ. Mr. Hill proceeded to visit Hyderabad, Poona, and Bombay Associations.

A North London Mission.

PROMINENT among the problems still confronting the churches stands the question of the evangelisation of the poverty-stricken masses in the dreadful districts of our great cities, where squalor and vice may be said to reign as twin monarchs. The orthodox chapel, left high and dry in the midst of crowds whose only sanctuary is the bar of the low public house, is apt to become only the resort of a few earnest souls whose fervent appeals to the hard-hearted, God-neglecting multitude meet with no more response than callous unconcern or an occasional surly oath.

It was to grapple with such a condition of things that, ten years since, Rev. G. H. Turner vacated his position as superintendent minister of the Free Methodist first London circuit, in order to devote himself to one of the most difficult positions Methodism had to offer in the Charlotte Street chapel, situated in a dingy back street in that network of thoroughfares which lie due north of Pentonville.

The building was old and all but empty, and its unattractiveness was emphasised by the brilliantly decorative, if gaudy allurements of neighbouring public-houses. In the absence of any practical effort to deal with the housing question, the poor had swarmed into the small but only available dwellings of the district in such numbers that the miseries and evils of overcrowding were only too apparent. However, by the blessing of God, much has been done to counteract evil influences. The chapel, re-furbished, and conspicuously neat amidst its sombre surroundings, stands out as a notable public resort. It has been enlarged by one-third; but is still too small to accommodate the people.

This noteworthy result has not been achieved by the adoption of vulgar methods or by the substitution of amusements for the Gospel, but by faith and unremitting toil. A band of house-to-house visitors bridged the gulf between the pew and the hearth, and still keeps a watchful eye upon the ever-changing population. Open-air meetings held four times a week, a lodging-house brigade, a maternity charity, and many other useful subsidiary works contribute their quota of help, and, whilst popular interest is aroused to a remarkable degree, it is cheering to find solidity of result. Not the mere securing of a crowd, but the glorifying of God in the salvation of souls is the end for which the minister and his wife, with the "sister of the people" and the workingmen office bearers, constantly toil.

What may be designated the Social Wing, is a bright vermilion-coloured building, prominently situated on the Caledonian Road. The ground floor is a cheap food depot by day, and a reading and recreation room by night. Upstairs is a girls' parlour, and even the basement is partly employed as a club, where are shepherded some of the young fellows, who, having only the right to use some usually turn for a more preferable resort to the street or the drinking bar.

In such a district, as may well be imagined, there are many dark stories of suffering amid the tragic annals of humble Christian poor. Paralysis and cancer gain additional horror in the slums, and the utilisation of the cooks and ranges of the depôt for the alleviation of physical agony is a kindly, indeed, necessary, albeit expensive step.

The work, which has aroused interest in many of the denominations, continues to be well worthy of attention, but it has attained success at the expense of injury to the health of both the minister and his wife; nevertheless, in spite of this, and of the obvious fact that they work in the stress of a chronic financial struggle, there remains to them the satisfaction which must come of the establishment of a sound aggressive church amid one of the most poverty-ridden regions of one-roomed London. Mr. Turner's address is 513, Caledonian Road, London, N.

Friendless and Fallen.—The New Year's Prayer meeting in connection with the Homes and Open-all-night Refuge was held at Exeter Hall last week. There was a large attendance. Rev. Evan H. Hopkins gave an appropriate and stimulating address. Mr. J. J. Drysdale, chairman, said that during the past year a large number of applications had been received for admission, and an increased number had been placed in homes. A recent paper surveying the work of the past year will be sent post free on application to Mr. W. J. Taylor, 200, Euston Road, London, N.W.

Life of Henry Drummond.*

THE name of Henry Drummond raises many memories. Going back twenty-five years we make his acquaintance as a prominent worker in home evangelisation. As the years passed he became generally known for his remarkable influence upon young people, a large number of whom he won to Christ and encouraged to take up a definite position in religious matters. A more widespread distinction awaited the Christian student of science, as the author of books that had a large circulation; although his claims to expound revealed truth and spiritual experience by the laws of the natural world, and to deal with moral and physical phenomena on the lines of Evolution theories, were contested and criticised alike in the name of science and religion. The individuality of the late Professor Drummond was striking, from whatever standpoint viewed. He appeared in several distinctive parts on the stage of life, and was influential in a degree that he could hardly have realised when he was taken from us less than two years ago, in the forty-fourth year of his age.

The great variety of the parts filled by the man who in a short time did so much preaching and teaching, travelling and writing, invests with peculiar interest the biography written by his intimate friend, Professor George Adam Smith, D.D. Though the bond between subject and author was a close one, this book is no mere eulogium; sometimes, indeed, the candid criticism seems a little intrusive. From first to last this memoir is eminently readable, and goes far to answer the prescription of a friend who told the author that an adequate life of Henry Drummond would be "the history of a fragrance." The opening appreciation, "As we knew him," whets the appetite for the story in its details. The friendliness and sympathy of Henry Drummond explain much of his success in work among the young; his sincerity and rational resource attracted older folk to him, and led them to unburden their hearts with unusual freedom in the course of religious conversation.

Coming of a family resident for some generations near the town of Stirling, Henry Drummond was brought up with care, and in an Evangelical atmosphere. At school he was a favourite with his seniors, a natural mode of life developing animal spirits for the playground as well as intellect for the study desk. We follow the young man to Edinburgh University, where he soon showed a leaning towards scientific investigation, and to New College in preparation for the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland. His mind had been exercised about God's goodness to him personally, and he early took part in mission work among the poor. Even in these days there were indications of views that were afterwards elaborated in the books by which his name gained such widespread celebrity. In general conceptions, however, he was practical and sober, as he showed in an essay, read before the college theological society, on "Spiritual Diagnosis," in which he maintained that a minister could do far more good by button-holing individuals than by preaching sermons. In the language of a fellow student:—"The essay was understood to be purely speculative; but within a month Mr. Moody had arrived, and in his meetings Henry was putting his speculations into practice." This brings us to the time of the great mission in the United Kingdom, held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey in 1873-1875.

Of this mission a good account is given, forming one of the longest chapters in the book. Henry Drummond had started operations in the Riego Street Mission of St. Cuthbert's Free Church, when the American evangelists appeared on the scene, and he watched the opening of the movement with earnest concern; and along with other students he attended in the inquiry room at Edinburgh, saying a helping word to persons in spiritual distress. Afterwards for some time he was in the thick of the work on the platform—first visiting other towns, and telling of the revival in Edinburgh; afterwards holding meetings in places where the evangelists had conducted missions, including Sunderland, Belfast, Derry, Dublin, Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield, Birmingham and London. With comrades from the college, Drummond did a remarkable work in the course of his travels. Large numbers of people professed conversion, and inquirers poured into his ear stories of their sins and sorrows. What he saw compelled him to write:—"To me the whole matter seems an unreal dream. It is impossible to realise it. I suppose it was never meant we should." Regarding the things he heard in the inquiry room, he said: "I have felt I must go and change my very clothes after the contact." And this was work by a theological student not quite twenty-three years of age! Wherever he went Mr. Drummond was specially used among young men; and for this Mr. Moody employed him with great freedom and every confidence.

The interrupted college course was completed, though evangelistic endeavour was not altogether surrendered. In 1877 the young man was appointed lecturer on Natural Science in the Free Church College, Glasgow. Six years later this office was raised to a professorship, which Henry Drummond filled during the remainder of his life. Meantime he had seen the world a little. Early in his college course he had passed a semester at Tübingen; shortly after entering upon the lectureship he took charge of the Free Church station at Malta, and travelled in North Africa and on the European continent. His other journeyings included a holiday in the Rocky Mountains with Professor Geikie in 1879; a plunge into East Central Africa in 1883; and a visit to the New Hebrides Group in 1890. Copious extracts are given from his diaries of travel. With the publication of "Natural Law" Mr. Drummond appeared before the outside world in a new light; the book was pulled to pieces by the critics, but he received rebuke as well as flattery with great calmness of spirit. Those who read both sides at the time will not object to Dr. Smith's remarks on the book, although they fairly constitute a criticism, in spite of the writer's statement that "it is not within the province of a biographer to criticise."

In subsequent writings Professor Drummond developed more fully his views of Evolution, particularly in "The Ascent of Man." This led him deeper into scientific controversy and further from Christian co-operation. Yet the pages tell the story of his drawing-room addresses on Christian life, as well as of Continental travel, of work among students in America in 1887 on the invitation of Mr. Moody, and of a visit to Australia, also arising out of the steadily growing Student Movement. Many memories are revived by the mention of his various booklets, addressed to Christian people. There is a chapter on "Boys and the Boys' Brigade;" and, in an appendix, reports are given of several addresses delivered to students of Edinburgh University in 1890.

A survey of the "Life" reveals excellence that we gladly acknowledge. Those who had the privilege of the Professor's acquaintance—and came under the spell of his personal charm and attractive writing—will read the biography with peculiar interest. In our estimation, the earlier chapters have a deeper interest than the later ones. In the case of Professor Drummond, like many others, speculation on scientific lines stood in the way of Christian service at once definite in form and efficient in method. Hence the divergent attitudes of his friends as his fame became established: some applauded, others experienced sorrow at the practical closing of a career of evangelistic usefulness. Yet withal the "Life" is replete with animation, and its pages are full of instruction.

"With Thee."*

INTO the dark, Lord Jesus,
Into the dark with Thee.
There hath come to my heart a calling apart,
And a whispered, "Follow Me!"
Take Thou my hand, Lord Jesus,
In thy mighty clasp divine;
Hold it so close, Lord Jesus,
That it tremble not in thine;
For my heart shrinks back from the unknown track,
And my feet tread falteringly;
And into the dark I follow—
Into the dark with Thee!
Into the dark, Lord Jesus—
Is it the dark with Thee?
Nay, Thou makest the night about me light,
And mine eyes—mine eyes shall see—
Shall "see the King in his beauty,"
In the land that is far away;
Shall see in the heaven sunshine,
The path that is hid to-day.
Then why should I fear what the untried year
May bring to mine or me?
Into the dark I follow—
Nay, into the light, with Thee!

Young People.

Laurie's Faith.

POOR Laurie! Everything went wrong with her at school that morning, and a heavy cloud had hidden away all the sunshine of the usually bright little face; but what was the matter, neither governess nor her companions knew.

Perhaps if Mrs. St. Clair, the head mistress, had been in the schoolroom, she might have been able to discover some clue to the mystery; for Mrs. St. Clair was the one person in the world who had unbounded influence over her little motherless pupil, Laurie Rivers.

True, her father loved her passionately, and indulged her in every possible way; but he was a great student, and spent nearly all his time among his books.

The morning dragged slowly on to Laurie, as mornings have a way of doing when things are going cross; and at last, it was time for the Scripture class, which Mrs. St. Clair usually took herself, but her place was filled this morning by the English governess, Miss Rose.

Laurie either did not answer at all, or replied to the questions addressed to her very indifferently; until at last upon Miss Rose's remonstrating, she said passionately:

"I don't want to answer the questions, and I don't want to hear about God; for I don't believe He loves me the least little bit."

There was a little hush of consternation after this outbreak, and for a moment neither governess or girls spoke. Then Miss Rose said calmly, "Laurie Rivers, I am ashamed of you. You had better leave the class if that is how you feel."

At last school was over, and with a sigh of relief but not pleasure, Laurie was preparing to put on her hat and cape to go home, when Miss Rose laid her hand on her arm, saying quietly, "Laurie, Mrs. St. Clair wants to speak to you."

Mrs. St. Clair was sitting at the writing-table in her study as Laurie opened the door. One quick glance only at the child's face revealed to her what had remained else during the morning—that Laurie had some secret trouble. Without a word, she held out her arms, and in another second Laurie was wrapped close in that tender embrace, and was pouring out all her sorrow between bitter sobs and tears.

Ah, me! It was such a terrible sorrow to that lonely loving little child-heart; and though to the tender woman listening, who had tasted some of the bitterest drops in life's cup (for Mrs. St. Clair was a widow, and had left her husband and baby daughter sleeping side by side in a far-off foreign land), the cause of the grief must have been so tiny, she showed no sign of this, but only drew Laurie closer, comforting her with loving words and kisses. So it seemed quite natural that poor Laurie should sob in this heartbroken way, just because her Persian cat, Fluffy, had gone out the night before, and had not been seen or heard of since!

For did not Mrs. St. Clair know how lonely that little motherless girl often was; and how Fluffy was her almost constant companion, trotting beside her in the garden, and often lying at the foot of her bed while she slept, curled up in a huge soft warm mass of grey, silken fur.

"Mrs. St. Clair," Laurie's voice was very shaky, "will you ask God to send Fluffy home again? I have been so bad, and said I didn't believe He loved me, that I daren't ask Him; but PERHAPS HE WOULD HEAR YOU."

Mrs. St. Clair's eyes had a very sweet expression in them, as she answered, "Yes, Laurie, I will certainly do what you ask; but little one, you must pray too, and if you have had hard thoughts of your Father's love, tell Him so, and ask his forgiveness.

"And now, dear, I think you must run home to dinner," Mrs. St. Clair continued, "but"—with an anxious glance at the child's flushed face and bright eyes, for Laurie was very delicate—"this is the Wednesday half-holiday; if you would invite me to tea with you, Laurie, I could come to you this afternoon."

"Would you really?" Laurie's hug was expressive; and Mrs. St. Clair was rewarded by the bright look of pleasure which shone on the little tear-stained face.

Laurie was all ready to receive Mrs. St. Clair when she arrived at Roselands early in the afternoon; and Mrs. St. Clair had guessed rightly when she so willingly gave up her afternoon of quiet, to give Laurie what she knew was the greatest pleasure in her power, that the little excitement of having a guest to entertain would keep her thoughts from dwelling too incessantly on her lost pet; and it was only by a long-drawn sigh now and then that Laurie showed she had not forgotten.

When tea was over, and it was getting dusk, Laurie crept into Mrs. St. Clair's arms again to have one of the talks she loved

ABOUT "MOTHER."

Mrs. St. Clair had been Laurie's mother's dearest friend, and so, of course, she knew all about her; and then she had a lovely way of talking, which never made Laurie sad, just as if God was the most tender loving Father anyone could imagine, and Heaven, his beautiful Home, waiting for every one of us, to which every day was bringing us nearer; where our dear ones, who had reached it first, looked forward with brightest joy to the happy time when all would be together again, and when good-bye would have been said for the last time, for ever and ever.

Mrs. St. Clair had been silent for a minute or two, and Laurie was lying dreamily looking into the fire, when there was a soft, peculiar scratching at the door. In a second Laurie was across the room with the delighted exclamation,

"Oh! Mrs. St. Clair, it must, it must be Fluffy!" and, in less time than it takes me to write, the door was open and Laurie's dear lost pet was safely cuddled in her arms.

Mrs. St. Clair was almost as pleased as Laurie, and I am afraid Fluffy was petted and made much of, and altogether spoilt in a shocking manner; instead of being scolded for all the trouble he had caused.

But, as Mrs. St. Clair kissed her little friend good-night, Laurie whispered, "I have thanked God for sending Fluffy back, Mrs. St. Clair, and I'll never, never say He doesn't love me any more, even if Fluffy gets lost again."

"The Christian" Bible-Searcher.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 160).

1. A woman whose son was born when she and her husband were old (Genesis)?
2. A wise woman who pacified an angry man (Samuel).
3. The grandmother of Timothy.
4. A queen who was punished for disobedience (Esther).
5. A wicked queen (Kings).
6. An unbelieving disciple (John).
7. A man who meditated in the fields at eventide (Genesis).
8. A governor who "feared the Lord greatly" (Kings).
9. A Pharisee who came to Jesus by night.

The first letters of each, read downwards, spell a rich blessing in Christ Jesus, which I trust all my "nephews" and "nieces" possess; and if not, that they will seek it without delay.

ANSWERS TO LAST WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER. (No. 159.)

1. He went with Barnabas and took Titus with him also (ii. 1).
2. He conferred not with flesh and blood; but went into Arabia, and afterwards returned to Damascus. Three years later he went to Jerusalem and saw Peter and James (i. 17-19).
3. Because before certain Jews came from James, Peter ate with the Gentiles, but when they were come, he withdrew, fearing them of the circumcision (ii. 12).
4. The law. To bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith (iii. 24).
5. (a) Let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap if we faint not (vi. 9). (b) For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself (v. 14). (c) Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage (v. 1). (d) For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus (iii. 26).

About Books.

From Siva to Christ (1s. Marshall Bros.), by Mr. S. Arumugum, is a graphic recital of the author's spiritual experiences and evangelistic labours.

Joyce Maxwell's Mistakes (6d. Chas. H. Kelly) is a pretty little illustrated book, which conveys in agreeable form a great deal of information of the Chinese mission field.

Gold and Glitter. By Jeanie Ferry. (1s. 6d. Robert Culley.) This temperance story, of self-sacrifice for the sake of conscience, and of the sorrows of the drink habit, will be an excellent gift-book for earnest-minded young people.

A new monthly is The Puritan, a magazine which appeals specially to Free Churchmen, but which contains articles, stories, and other items of general interest. (6d. J. Bowden, Henrietta-street, W.C.) The first number is varied in contents and fully illustrated.

A Window in Paris, by Marianne Farningham (5s. Jas. Clarke & Co.), fulfils its purpose to intensify a horror of war by describing incidents of the siege of Paris in the last Franco-German struggle. The book will interest any reader, and we believe will help forward the movement making for peace in no small degree.

The Penny Man and His Friends, by Eleanor F. Fox (1s. 6d. C.M.S.), illustrates in a unique and delightfully original way the work of medical missions abroad. If any friends find it difficult to interest young people in the most important Christian enterprise of our day, let them circulate copies of this clever and finely-illustrated book.

A Marvel of Mercy (Alfred Holiness) is a pithily written sketch by Rev. H. Codling of the conversion and experiences as a City mission worker of Mr. H. Davis, who, formerly a profligate character, was converted under the preaching of Mr. Moody, and has now for some twenty years laboured with much acceptance among the slums of Bermondsey and Southwark.

There is always much that is good in Regions Beyond, the annual volume of which is rich in missionary intelligence. Work on the Congo and in Peru occupy a prominent place, and the spheres filled by men trained in the East London Institute come in for sympathetic notice; but the interest is wide as the world, and the information presented deals with many lands and peoples. The pages are fully illustrated, and cannot but prove helpful to students of missions. (Partridge & Co.)

A Life for Africa. By Ellen C. Parsons. (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) This life-record of Rev. A. C. Good, a young American missionary in Equatorial West Africa, forms a valued addition to the rapidly-growing literature of the once Dark Continent. Besides being an ardent missionary, Mr. Good was given to scientific study, and if his life had been prolonged he would have rendered still weightier service to God and humanity. We trust some who read the narrative will be baptized for the dead.

In The Lost Crown (2s. 6d. Marshall Bros.), Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman gives us a volume of sermons for which he "makes no claim to literary excellence." Nevertheless, this very helpful book expresses aptly, with deep pathos and a wealth of illustration, many stimulating truths. Its study is well calculated, not merely to please, but to lead to strenuous and devoted Christian effort. Of the Power of a Surrendered Life. (2s. 6d.) A companion volume on the higher life, alternately contemplative, appealing, and instructive; but well worthy of careful reading throughout.

Mr. Budgett Meakin's long promised standard works on Morocco, its people, and its history are to be published at last, Messrs. Sonnenschein having arranged to bring out the history in April, and the descriptions of the people and the country at intervals of a few months. As one of the special objects of his labour has been to place important and much-needed facts in the hands of every missionary in the country, special arrangements have been made for missionaries only (applying to the author before publication) to be supplied at less than half price, and it is hoped that many friends of missions will avail themselves of this opportunity of providing the workers in Morocco with these valuable helps. Each volume will be profusely illustrated, and issued at about 16s.: the special offer for missionaries, limited to one copy apiece, being a guinea for the three. Mr. Budgett Meakin's address is 58, Parliament Hill, Hampstead, N.W.

The Twentieth Century New Testament is a translation into modern English made from the original Greek. It is the work of a band of scholars, neither a revision nor a paraphrase, and is based on the text of Westcott and Hort. The version is to be completed in two parts, the first of which, containing the Gospels and Acts, is before us. (1s. 6d. W. T. Stead, Mowbray House.) To criticise such a work is easy, for in addition to questions of rendering, there is ever that specific and overshadowing inquiry, not merely as regards words but the resolution of idiom—What is Modern English? This work has features that will hardly be welcome to Christians with whom the forms and phrases of the ordinary version are associated with blessed teachings and experiences. Others, however, will find the pages suggestive. A prefatory note intimates that the edition is a tentative one, and that the translators invite criticisms and suggestions from readers.

A timely book is Spiritual Christianity versus Romanist, Anglican, and Free Church Priestcraft, by E. Gough, B.A., Congregational minister, Barrowford, Nelson, Lancs. (2s. 6d. Gay & Bird). Originating in a newspaper correspondence, the work lacks shape and compactness. Mr. Gough is candid and outspoken, and occasionally disposed to employ vituperation in the place of argument. Generally, however, he is a worthy advocate of Reformation principles, and his pages are a useful contribution to the controversy against Rome, alike as to arrogant assumption, false doctrine, and superstitious practice. In his concluding chapter, Mr. Gough well says of Romanist officials:—"If they will be priests, and will bring in an altar of man's making, I can only say—perish the altar! May the hammer of the iconoclast soon find it out! If the Roman official will be a priest, I can only say—Let him begone from the spiritual Church of the Redeemer. On that holy ground priestcraft is a pestilential anachronism."

A second edition, with appendices and indexes, has been issued of Rev. Alexander Patterson's thoughtful book, Greater Life and Work of Christ, as Revealed in Scripture, Man, and Nature. (1 dol. 50c. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago.) The book is not a life of Christ in the usual sense; it is not a review of the earthly existence of our Lord. This "Greater Life" is divided as follows:—Christ in the Eternal Past; Christ in Creation (the Word); Christ in the Old Testament Age (Jehovah); Christ in His Earthly Life; Christ in His Present State and Work; Christ in the Day of the Lord (King of kings, and Lord of lords); and Christ in the Eternal Future. By distinguishing times and manners the author applies Scripture references to one or other of these phases of Christ's work, or dispensations of God's dealings with man. The treatment shows in a way the marvellous part assigned in Scripture to the Son of God. A perusal of this volume will help many to an enlarged view of the Divine purpose in grace and glory.

Professor Witton Davies has for years been giving attention to Oriental languages and literatures; and those who follow the transactions of learned societies and study periodicals devoted to Biblical philology and archæology are prepared to welcome his book on Magic, Divination, and Demonology among the Hebrews and their Neighbours; including an Examination of Biblical References and of the Biblical Terms. (3s. 6d. James Clarke & Co.) The prefatory statement, that the pages comprise a dissertation presented to the University of Leipzig, preliminary to the author being allowed to proceed to the examination prescribed for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the University, accounts for much in the shape and character of Dr. Davies' treatise. Beyond that, it is sufficient to say that the pages are evidently the result of wide reading and much thought; and while we may question some of the views and generalisations, we do well to be thankful for such an accumulation of information on a subject which, to most, must be abstruse as well as mysterious.

"Diamonds from South Africa" is the title of a bright little magazine, issued especially to interest and instruct members of the Young Home Helpers' Union of the South Africa General Mission. The pages relate, in simple language, stories of work in the needy fields of South Africa, and from first to last they are very readable. (One halfpenny monthly. Marshall Brothers).

International S.S. Lessons.

February 5.

"The Healing of the Nobleman's Son." John iv. 43-54.

Golden Text.—"Jesus said unto him, thy son liveth; and himself believed, and his whole house."—John iv. 53.

Galilee (43).

AFTER the two days' delay, caused by the interview with the woman at the well and the result of it, Jesus proceeds into Galilee. It was at this time a most prosperous province, with a population of some three millions of people (Josephus). The land was very fertile under the work of the industrious inhabitants. It had considerable commercial contact with the outside world. No wonder that from the midst of these intelligent, industrious people came the hard-working disciples.

The Prophet at Home (44, 45).

Jesus would not be accepted as a prophet in Galilee, because it was there he had worked with Joseph, the carpenter. He had to go to Jerusalem and become acknowledged there as prophet—by his words and works. Then when the Galileans, who had been present at the feast and heard what was thought of Him in Jerusalem, carried back the news to the north, the people would much more readily listen to his teaching.

The teacher can illustrate this by that which happens to every boy who leaves his native village, comes up to London, and, doing well, returns for a time to his native place.

Montaigne said that in his own country he had to purchase publishers, everywhere else publishers purchased him.

Lesson.—We must try to be the first in recognising and speaking of the goodness and ability in others. Don't wait until everybody else is shouting the fact in your ears.

Seekers after Jesus (46).

The nobleman was probably an officer under King Herod Antipas; either in the army or the Court. He had doubtless heard of the power of Jesus manifested at Cana, so came to meet Him there.

Lesson.—People feel no need for shelter except in a storm. The trials of life drive us to God much more than our successes. He is willing to receive us then, and to help us out of all our roubles. We should make a friend of Him at all times. He can enhance our joys just as well as soothe our sorrows.

Practical Faith (47).

Faith must prove itself by works. The nobleman came to Jesus at Cana. Instances of small faith:

(1.) To pray for forgiveness and still to bear the load of sins.
(2.) To ask for God's guidance and blessing on the morrow, and then to spend half the night in worrying about it.

Instances of large faith:

(2.) The girl who, going to a prayer-meeting, where they were to pray for rain after long drought, took an umbrella with her.
(3.) All who, when they ask of God, take steps to obtain the answer and prepare for the blessing.

Jews and Samaritans (48).

The Jews were always seeking after a sign. They wanted miracles. How different was the faith of the Samaritans, which required no visual wonder to kindle or sustain it!

Little Grows to Much (49, 50).

He wishes for the direct presence of Jesus, and thinks the cure is impossible without that. He had not yet enough faith to believe that Jesus could "speak the word only." The fact that he went home at Christ's bidding proved his growing faith.

"They that know thy name will put their trust in Thee." "The Lord hath been mindful of us." Therefore "He will bless us." The small faith only needs to be used; it multiplies in the use.

The Family Tie.

The nobleman pleaded with the earnestness of faith for his child. Teacher should dwell on the love of parents, and enforce the duty of affectionate obedience in return. We should be thankful for the love which binds us in families.

Evangelistic.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Margate.

THE mission held here January 7-16, under the auspices of the Free Churches, was a season of much blessing. On account of the inclement weather the audiences suffered at the beginning, but large gatherings crowned the close of the mission. For lack of a large public hall, three of the churches were utilised. For Sunday, January 15, special arrangements were made by taking the Grand Theatre, formerly the Royal Assembly Rooms. Here an assembly of about a thousand men gathered in the afternoon and about two thousand persons in the evening. The evening meeting was one of unusual power and blessing, great numbers rising to signify their desire for prayer.

On Monday afternoon there was a largely attended Bible reading, when most practical and helpful counsel was given concerning Christian stewardship. In the evening, at the closing meeting, a large congregation filled Ebenezer Baptist Chapel, and overflowed into the spacious schoolroom. The chapel was fairly filled for the after meeting, and enquirers were requested to walk into the schoolroom, which large numbers did. Here were those who, as Christians, had been quickened, backsliders reclaimed, and those who had sought and found Christ during the mission and that night also in the service. It was most inspiring to see young men and women rising one after another in rapid succession, and declaring that they had accepted Christ as their Saviour. A solemn and reverent spirit pervaded the meeting. Showers of blessing have fallen upon our town in answer to the fervent prayers of many years. The Free Churches have never before been such a power for good. We thank God for the National Council and for the work it is doing throughout the land. B. B.

A well attended series of special evangelistic services has just concluded at Elland Edge, Rastrick, Yorks, in connection with the Baptist Church.

Captain Tapp, of the Royal Artillery, paid a visit to the Shankill Road Mission, Belfast, lately, and gave some stirring addresses, which were much appreciated and greatly blessed.

Mr. J. J. Sims has been conducting a mission at Coatbridge, N.B., with many signs of deep interest and evident awakening on the part of many. A number of the ministers have taken part.

Miss Woollard has concluded a three weeks' mission in the Primitive Methodist Church, Somercotes. The chapel has been crowded throughout the mission, and many decided for Christ.

Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, of Burnley, has concluded a five days' mission at Horeb Union Church, Padiham. The services have been much appreciated, and attended with great blessing.

D. Muxworthy, Pastor.

Mr. James Shields, of the Evangelisation Society, has concluded a fifteen days' united mission at Westbury, Wilts, which has proved a time of great spiritual refreshment to believers, and of salvation to the unsaved.

A ten days' mission at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. to City men by Rev. E. J. Kennedy, made a most auspicious commencement on Monday evening. There was a very large attendance, and much spiritual impression was produced. The mission continues till Tuesday next.

Mr. H. Thorne has conducted a united mission at Spalding under the auspices of the Spalding Sunday School Union. Notwithstanding the unpropitious weather, the congregations, both at Bible readings and Gospel services, were good, and the results were very gratifying. Not only were a number of young people constrained to yield themselves to Christ, but believers were strengthened, and the various churches were brought into closer touch with each other.

J. Wilson.

From the first meeting to the last during the recent visit to Hawick, of Messrs. Weavers Brothers, there was the manifest power of the Holy Spirit. Although the weather was exceedingly stormy, the attendance was remarkable; the hall seats 1,000 people, and on the Sabbaths quite a number could not find entrance. The enquiry room has been filled with anxious ones. There has been quite a move among young men of the town. Many country people have come ten and twelve miles. Believers have been called to a life of fuller consecration. James Tait.

At the request of the Evesham Free Church Council, Mr. Telford has held an eleven days' mission in that town. The largest hall in the town was engaged, and the attendance steadily increased from the first, until towards the close neither standing nor sitting room could be found for all who wished to attend. Mr. Telford's vigorous and faithful preaching of the Gospel was much blessed, numbers responding at the close of each meeting to the missioner's earnest appeal for an immediate decision for Christ; many of these were young men.

A ten days' mission has recently been held at Watford under the auspices of the local Free Church Council. The missioner was Gipsy Smith. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the interest in the meetings was so keen that the audiences were never less than 1,100 or 1,200. On the two Sunday evenings considerably more than 2,000 were assembled, and throughout the mission many went into the inquiry room. All the churches taking part have received a quickening of spiritual life, and will probably have many additions to the men's membership.

A three weeks' mission, arranged by the F.C. Council, and conducted by Mr. R. H. Stafford-Smith, of the Evangelisation Society, in the Congregational Chapel, Broadchalke, Salisbury, proved a season of much power and blessing. Despite the very rough weather the chapel has been full of deeply interested and impressed hearers. Many have been touched, many quickened and refreshed. The services for children, which for originality of method and freshness of expression of Divine truths require to be heard to be appreciated, were eminently successful. It was astonishing what a grasp of the contents of the Bible the children obtained in so brief a time. C. F.

Mr. Canning, of the London Evangelisation Society, has concluded a fortnight's successful mission in Peterhead, in connection with the Free South Church (Rev. G. W. Alison). At a social meeting at the close of the mission, ample testimony was borne to the good done. Strong men have been bowed down and broken under the sense of sin, and have found a new life and hope and inspiration in the Saviour. Mr. Canning holds the old Gospel with a firm hand, and preaches it with great fervour and success. A special feature of the mission was the solo singing of Miss Dolly Donaldson, daughter of Rev. Mr. Donaldson, Free St. Clement's, Aberdeen. She is a well-trained and accomplished musician, sings with much pathos and power, and has been of great service in the mission.

Rev. A. T. Jones.—Jan., 22-31, Duckpool Road, Newport, Mon.

Evangelistic Mission.—Kilburn Hall, Kilburn Gate, Sundays at 7, Messrs. Philip R, Hurditch and Alfred C. Burley. Malden Hall, Haverstock Hill, Sundays at 7; Jan. 29, Mr. H. W. Taylor. Eccleston Hall, Eccleston Stree Sundays at 3.30 and 7, Mr. P. Garrioch.

Mr. Newton Jones, Jan. 21-26, Markham Square, S.W., Jan. 28-Feb. 6, Canterbury; Feb. 11-20, Bridgwater.

Mr. John Elliott.—Jan. 29, Torquay (Warren Road).

Mr. Charles Inglis.—Billingsgate Christian Mission (opposite Billingsgate Market), Jan. 30-Feb. 4, daily at midday.

Crime in Canada.—Some very remarkable statistics are given in the Christian Intelligencer, New York, on the question of crime in Canada, and the restraining power of religious education. "The penitentiary statistics of Canada for last year shed some light upon the influence of religion. . . . Of convicts nearly 50 per cent. claimed adherence to the Roman Catholic Church, over 20 per cent. to the Church of England, leaving the other denominations, and to none scarcely more than 30 per cent. Yet the Roman Catholics and the Church of England make not over 30 per cent. of the population. It is apparent that religious training is a chief element in the restraint of crime.

Obituary.

MR. J. C. LANPHIER.

THE death of this veteran Christian worker in America is recorded at the age of ninety. He was for more than forty years superintendent of the Fulton Street Monday Prayer Meeting, New York. We hope in an early issue to give a portrait and sketch of Mr. Lanphier's interesting career.

MRS. J. I. HILLOCKS.

For some days past Mrs. Hillocks, wife of Rev. James Inches Hillocks, had been suffering severely from acute gastritis. Very suddenly, but calmly, she passed away on Monday morning last week. Her long life of seventy-three years, and the conditions of life, gave her many opportunities of usefulness, of which she heartily availed herself. During her more public and active life—especially since 1851, when she was married to Mr. Hillocks—her kind heart and willing hand have been honoured by God in helping the poor, old and young. In "Hard Battles for Life and Usefulness," Mr. Hillocks speaks very warmly of the valued help she rendered to him.

REV. ALEX. THOMSON, D.D.

Many will hear with sorrow of the death, which occurred on the 15th inst., at Bebek, Constantinople, of the Rev. Alex. Thomson, D.D., aged seventy-eight, from 1843 to 1860 missionary of the Free Church of Scotland to the Jews, and from 1860 to 1894 agent to the British and Foreign Bible Society in Turkey. It was illness that compelled Dr. Thomson to resign active service under the Bible Society, after thirty-four years devoted labour. In a resolution adopted on the occasion, the committee of the society recognised the rare linguistic abilities and attainments which enabled Dr. Thomson to conduct the affairs of an agency embracing people of several languages. Dr. Thomson did good work in the revision of the Albanian version of the Scriptures.

REV. R. MACBETH, HAMMERSMITH.

The death is announced of Rev. Robert Macbeth, of Hammersmith, at the ripe age of eighty-three. He was trained for the Congregational ministry, first at the old Blackburn Academy, which he entered in 1840, and afterwards, from 1843 to 1845, at the newly-opened Lancashire College, of which he was one of the first students. His first charge was at Stratton, where his ministry commenced in 1845. From there he went, in 1851, to Darlington. He left the north for the Broadway Church, Hammersmith, in 1853, where he remained until his resignation in 1891, after nearly half-a-century of ministerial service, close on forty years which had been given to his Hammersmith church. Since then he lived in retirement in his old quarters, and has now died amongst the people he had so long loved and served. Mr. Macbeth was a genial, warm-hearted, and brotherly man, and enjoyed the highest esteem both of his own people and of his brethren in the ministry.

DR. MOSES HOGE.

The death is announced, in his eightieth year, of Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D., of Richmond, Virginia, U.S. The vehicle which he was driving was upset by an electric street car, and the injuries he thereby sustained proved fatal. Dr. Hoge was the leading minister of the Southern Presbyterian Church, and a few years ago celebrated his jubilee as minister of his congregation in Richmond. He was a prominent figure during the War of Secession, and was in close touch with the leaders of the secession movement. As chaplain to the Confederate camp at Richmond he was so deeply impressed with the want of Bibles in the army that he ran the blockade and came to London, where he was introduced to the late Earl of Shaftesbury, the then president of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Through his lordship's influence a grant of Bibles and portions of the Bible numbering over 300,000 and costing £4,000, was obtained, and almost all were carried by blockade-runners safely to their destination. Dr. Hoge was a preacher of singular eloquence and impressiveness. His catholic spirit made him a prominent member of the Evangelical Alliance and the Pan-Presbyterian Council.

REV. F. EDWARDS, HARLOW.

By the death of Rev. Frederic Edwards, B.A., of Harlow, at the the age of sixty-three, one of the best known Nonconformist ministers in Essex, has passed away. In 1857, as a student from Bristol College, he settled at Harlow; three years afterwards he left for South Parade, Leeds, but in 1864 returned to Harlow, and, until five years ago, when he retired in consequence of ill-health, retained the pastorate. Mr. Edwards was a man of high culture and attainments; and his influence was potent in the town and neighbourhood. He was a considerable writer, and his library was remarkably well-furnished. Mr. Edwards was deeply interested in the Grammar School at Bishop's Stortford, of which he acted as secretary. On three occasions he has served as the President of the Essex Association of Baptist churches. There are few ministers who have taken such pains to instruct their people in the work abroad, the operations of all societies being continually brought before them, his invariable custom for many years being once a month to deliver a missionary lecture. Hence the B.M.S. loses in him a warm friend and supporter.

MR. HENRY HEATH, WOOLPIT.

Many are mourning the death of Mr. Henry Heath, which took place recently at Woolpit, aged 83. In early life he laboured in Spain, and during many years resided at Hackney, where he was highly esteemed for his work's sake. Mr. Edward Henry Glenny, who was named after him, and baptized by him, and who knew him intimately, writes:—"I have never heard the slightest suggestion of anything on Mr. Heath's part unworthy of the name of Christ. No doubt he had his weaknesses and failings like others, but it is a glorious testimony to the grace of God that he thus lived for Christ without any serious slip. He was of commanding appearance, standing six feet two or three inches, with a noble brow and eagle eye, a face somewhat stern and earnest, but relaxing into a pleasant smile. Though tall he was not stout or robust looking. There was a great calmness and restfulness in his manner, and he spoke with authority.

"Some friends thought he was rather burying himself to go down to a country place like Woolpit for the last thirty years of his life. During the last few years he has moved about rather more, to the profit and edification of those who have heard him.

"On Friday, January 6, his earthly remains were buried in the little cemetery near the house and meeting room at Woolpit, beside those of his wife who predeceased him. Among those present were: Mr. McVicker, of Clapton; Mr. Bennett, of Yeovil; Mr. Brunton, of London; Mr. Geo. Fisher, of Barnstaple, representing Mr. Chapman; Mr. Jordan, of Greenwich; Mr. Pargiter; Mr. Felgate, of Hackney; Mr. Bailey, late of Hackney, now of Eastbourne; Mr. Cole, of Norwich, previously of Hackney; Mr. H. Clapton, of Bath, and Mr. Jones, of Hackney."

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. Thomas Kirkland of Toronto, a prominent colonial Presbyterian. He was a delegate to the Presbyterian Alliance meetings in Belfast, and in Glasgow. An elder in St. James' Square, Toronto, he took a deep interest in its work, acting as session clerk and Bible class teacher.—Dr. Daniel Wise, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Englewood, New Jersey, at the age of eighty-six. He was born at Portsmouth, England, and emigrated to the States twenty years later. Dr. Wise was an ex-editor of Zion's Herald.—Rev. John Morris Owen, of Mountain Ash, has just died at the age of fifty-one. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1872, and served in South Wales Circuits.—Aged 33, Rev. Frank Canvin, of the Methodist New Connexion,—Rev. Robert Gamson, vicar of Normanton-on-Trent, and one of the oldest clergy in the diocese of Southwell.—Rev. T. Bowles, late Rector of East Hendred, Berks, aged 77.—Rev. Charles Lane, vicar of Wheelock.—Rev. Arthur Canney who for many years worked amongst the poor in North Kensington.—Rev. Robert Foster, for fifty-three years Incumbent of Burpham, Sussex, aged 79.—Rev. G. A. Starkey, rector of Hawkwell, and formerly rector of Whiteparish, Wilts, aged 51.—Rev. John Wise, M.A., formerly archdeacon of Colombo, Ceylon, and for eighteen years vicar of Ramsey.—Signor Steifano Revel, Waldensian pastor, Pisa.—Mr. J. Hamilton, Kilsyth, N.B., 77 years of age.

Temperance Notes.

REV. L. M. ISITT'S mission in Manchester, now closed, has been highly successful in point of numbers attending and impressions created.

Rev. John Thorley, of Sheffield, the veteran secretary of the Free Methodist Temperance League, regards the past year as a most encouraging one in connection with his own denomination.

The Home Secretary has just issued instructions regarding the management of Inebriate Homes for convicted drunkards under the new Act, and requires that all officers and attendants in such institutions must be total abstainers.

Holland has just had a Temperance mission visit from Councillor J. Malins, the head of the Good Templar Order, who has given lantern lectures in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Den Helder, illustrative of Good Templary.

A motion proposed in the Glasgow Corporation to appoint a committee to consider the municipalisation of the liquor traffic, was revised so as to require the Committee to report upon the whole subject of the liquor traffic, and was then adopted.

At Buluwayo a prospector named James Murphy was charged with supplying liquor to natives. The man pleaded guilty, and was fined £400 or six months' imprisonment in default, the magistrate saying that the authorities were determined to put the practice down.

A plebiscite of the electors in the five towns comprising the Montrose burghs, as to whether all liquor licences should be legally terminated at a fixed period, and popular control of the trade instituted, has resulted in an overwhelming majority in favour of reform. The figures were 4,819 for, and 573 against.

A new regulation has come into force in the City of London for dealing more severely with people found drunk "on the Queen's highway." Formerly persons arrested for this offence were charitably given a night's lodging in the police cells to get sober. Now every "drunk" is asked for his name and address in the morning and is summoned.

The Dean of Guernsey (Rev. Thos. Bell) recently remarked: "In Guernsey we have had Sunday Closing for a great many years, and that with the happiest results. A year or two ago an attempt was made to reopen, by permission given to a few privileged houses in the country, to sell on Sunday; but I am thankful to say that we have just withdrawn this permission."

The following announcement is from a weekly secular newspaper, The Trimble (Tenn.) News:—"This week we have received advertisements from saloon men doing business in near-by towns, and, although the price to be paid was liberal and the money would be promptly paid, we declined to accept them. So long as we run The News no advertisements for liquor dealers advertising their goods will be allowed to appear in its columns."

Last spring when the President called for men for the army and navy, tens of thousands sprang to the call and were soon on the field for service. The cry rang throughout the land, "Remember the Maine." Less than 300 men lost their lives, and they did it honourably; but 300 men, and mostly young men, in this country die every twenty-four hours as drunkards. Shall we not hear the Master's voice calling us to action in this coming new year? Is not Christ's work far more important than any other service in the world?—D. L. Moody.

At an inquest on a woman, whose death was found to be due to "bronchitis and general debility, brought on by chronic alcoholism," it was found that the child of the deceased was in the habit of fetching gin—in which article almost the entire family income was expended. The coroner said it was a most lamentable story, this woman having for many years been spending all her money in gin. A very grave responsibility rested on the persons who supplied drink to a child ten years old. Publicans were allowed the privilege of serving drink, and certain moral duties were imposed upon them. To sell drink simply for the purpose of making money, without a thought or care of the consequences, was an awful responsibility.

The Churches.

Church of England.

The sudden death of the Bishop of St. Helena removes a colonial prelate consecrated as long ago as 1862, and therefore one of the senior Bishops in the English Church.

The Archbishop of Ontario, who only recently arrived in London, has received the sad intelligence that his Cathedral, St. George's, Kingston, has been destroyed by fire. The Archbishop has sailed for Canada.

Mrs. Creighton has visited the West London Police Court in order to have on opportunity of observing the work of a police court. She was invited to a seat near the magistrate, who explained the nature of the charges brought before him.

The new See in Eastern Equatorial Africa, which Bishop Tucker vacates in order to take up the work of the Uganda part of his old diocese, is to be filled by the appointment of Rev. William George Peel, Secretary since 1892 of the C.M.S. Western India Missions.

The Council of the Church Reform League report that over one thousand clergymen of the Church of England have joined the League, in addition to about the same number of laymen. Steps are being taken to bring the question of the self-government of the Church before Parliament.

Rev. S. J. Stone, rector of All Hallows-on-the-Wall, London Wall, has opened that church from 6.30 to 8 o'clock each morning, in order that working girls and women, who are compelled to travel to town by early cheap-fare trains may have a place of shelter and rest until the various factories, shops, and warehouses open.

The Queen has doubled her subscription to the fund for enlarging the Sunday school belonging to the parish church at Cloughton, Scarborough. The Queen contributed to the funds of the new schools in 1888, and also gave the plot of land upon which they now stand. In 1890 she contributed £225 towards the fund for restoring the parish church.

Fifty young men and women have just entered the Church Army Training Homes in Edgware Road, to be trained as Evangelists, Prison Pioneers, and Tent Missioners, Van Officers, Colporteurs, Mission Nurses, Rescue and Slum Workers. Nearly all the men have previously undergone a preliminary training in the Society's Mission Vans, for periods ranging from six to eighteen months.

At a special service held in the parish church of Broad Hembury, Devon, by Rev. C. Lister James, a tablet was unveiled to the memory of Rev. Augustus Montague Toplady, author of the well-known hymn "Rock of Ages." Toplady was vicar of Broad Hembury from 1768 to 1778, during part of which period he edited the Gospel Magazine. His "Rock of Ages" first appeared in the pages of that publication.

At a private meeting of the Association for the Furtherance of Christianity in Egypt, held at Dean's Yard, Westminster, the appointment of a bishop for Egypt was discussed and approved. It was understood that he would be suffragan to the Bishop of Jerusalem, and that an appeal would be issued for £20,000 in connection with the project. The Copts, it was stated, would welcome an Anglican bishop. It is also announced that a new Bishopric of Mombasa has been founded.

The Bishop of Dover, acting for the Archbishop of Canterbury, dedicated at Canterbury Cathedral on Thursday, the two new Vans which have been presented to the Church Army for work in each of the Canterbury archdeaconries. There was a large congregation present, the lesson read by Canon Carter (Tait Missioner), who has been appointed Van adviser by the Archbishop, and the Dean gave an address on the important part played in the work of the Church, now and in the past, by laymen, and bore testimony to the good work being carried on by the Church Army.

Congregational.

The First Congregational Church in Aberdeen is this year celebrating its centenary.

Change of address.—Rev. Alex Henderson, from West Ham to 31, Donald Road, Upton Manor, E.

Rev. Dr. Hillis, of Chicago, has been elected to succeed Rev. Lyman Abbott as pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn.

Rev. Dr. Barrett has been invited by the Nonconformist Churches of Darlington to conduct a week's mission in March.

Owing largely to the rapid growth of the population in Cardiff, the Congregationalists have been enabled to open eleven churches there during the last ten years.

Newcastle, Wellingborough, and Sandown Congregationalists will be interested to hear that Rev. A. J. Griffith, M.A., who left England for New South Wales eleven years ago, has been elected chairman of the Congregational Union of New South Wales.

Rev. W. Wood, who is suffering from illness, has tendered his resignation of the pastorate of Falmouth Church. The church has passed a resolution of sympathy, and decided to adjourn for three months the consideration of the question of resignation.

Union Church, Horsleydown (Rev. W. A. Linington), entertained 400 of the poorest children of the district, funds having been gathered from friends in the neighbourhood. The Tract Society is distributing weekly tracts and books in the lodging-houses.

The committee of the Congregational Association of Manchester and District have adopted the following resolution:—"We desire to identify ourselves with those who are striving to promote the interests of International peace and good fellowship. We heartily support the effort now being made by the Tsar to seek, by means of International discussion, the most effectual means of ensuring to all peoples the benefits of a real and durable peace, and, above all, the putting an end to the progressive development of the present armaments."

Baptist.

Dr. Angus has entered on his eighty-fourth year. Principal Vincent Tymms, of Rawdon College, has completed his fifty-seventh year.

Hopeful progress was reported at the New Year's Meeting of the Tewkesbury Church, (Rev. H. J. Preece), the addresses were hearty, and the meeting profitable throughout.

The foundation stones of St. John's Road Free Church, Tunbridge Wells (Rev. J. Mountain) were laid last week. A largely attended public meeting in support of the work was held, subsequently in the Town Hall. In all, the sum of £263 was raised.

The annual meetings of the south-west group of churches connected with the London Baptist Association were held at Northcote Road, Wandsworth. At the public meeting, Rev. Z. T. Dowen, D.D., gave an address on "The Joy of Service," and Rev. W. Townsend on "The Ideal Life." The meetings were full of stimulus.

Pastor H. E. Stone's ninth anniversary meetings were held at Abbey Road Chapel. In the afternoon Pastor C. Spurgeon preached. Sir H. G. Reid presided over the evening meeting, when Messrs. P. Bunting, Green, and Harrison were the speakers. Just over £500 was lovingly contributed by the congregation towards the expenses of renovation and the electric light installation.

At a special meeting of the Council of the Baptist Union, it was resolved to recommend to the Union, at its session next April, the formation of a Twentieth Century Fund. The following allocation was agreed upon:—£125,000 for the evangelisation of the country and Church Extension; £30,000 to help weak churches in the support of their ministers; £30,000 for the increase of the capital of the Annuity Fund; £34,000 to erect a Baptist Church House; £25,000 for educational and other objects deemed desirable by the Council; and £6,000 to establish scholarships at some seat of learning.

Methodist.

The Independent Methodist churches have fixed upon Sunday, January 29, as the day on which to call special attention to the question of temperance legislation.

The aged and necessitous among the local preachers of the Primitive Methodist churches are having special consideration at the hands of the connexional authorities.

A fire has occurred at Rev. T. Champness' "Joyful News" Training Home for young men. The flame were discovered just in time to save the building from destruction.

Newcastle district of the New Connexion body has appointed a committee, with ministerial and lay representatives from the circuits, to consider the best means of extending the Connexion in the North.

The Irish Methodists, following the example of the sister Church in England, propose to raise a fund of 50,000 guineas for Evangelistic educational and philanthropic work in the coming century.

Rev. James Thompson, President of the South African Wesleyan Conference, who has been in this country consulting specialists, and who is this week returning to South Africa, has not improved during his stay in England, and has received little encouragement as to ultimate recovery.

The first annual meeting of the recently created "Welsh Wesleyan Methodist Assembly of Wales," is to be held at Machynlleth next June. At that meeting the President of Conference is to have as his colleagues Dr. H. J. Pope, Dr. Stephenson, and Rev. John Hornabrook.

An appeal is to be issued by Rev. H. T. Chapman, of Leeds, the general missionary secretary of the Free Methodist body, for increased funds to carry on the home and foreign missions of the United Methodist Free Churches. Each member is asked to enter into a covenant to subscribe a penny per week to the general mission fund.

The Primitive Methodist mission at Walthamstow worships in a church that formerly belonged to the Congregationalists. It has been purchased for £1,400, but alterations and the erection of a new school bring the total cost to £3,000. Of this the General Missionary Committee will give £1,000, and the local church will raise £1,000, and a gradual reduction of the annual grant will be applied to the extinction of the remaining £1,000 debt.

Among the passengers who left Liverpool on Saturday was Bishop Hartzell, of the American Methodist Episcopal Church, who has charge of that church's missions in Africa. The Bishop has been in communication with the British and American Governments as to questions affecting the religious and commercial development of those portions of Africa to which his mission is attached. He sails for Liberia, Congo, and Angola, and will subsequently proceed to East and South Africa, visiting Delagoa Bay, Beira, and Eastern Rhodesia.

Presbyterian.

Rev. Dr. Marshall Lang, of the Barony Parish Church Glasgow, has just completed the twenty-sixth year of his ministry.

A new church is to be erected at the junction of Harehills Avenue and Avenue Hill, Leeds. A school hall has already been built, and the opening services were attended by crowded congregations.

A Presbyterian "retreat" was held a few weeks ago by a number of Presbyterian ministers in New York and neighbourhood at Riverdale. It lasted for three days. Brief addresses were given by several of the ministers.

Rev. J. Williams announced his resignation of the pastorate of the Memorial Hall, Cardiff, at the meeting of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire Presbytery last week. Great regret was expressed at parting with Mr. Williams, and the valuable character of his work in Cardiff was generally recognised.

According to the latest letters, Rev. Alexander Connell, the deputy of the Presbyterian Church of England, is enjoying his visit to the mission stations in China. He finds the work of visitation most interesting, and the churches and their missionaries are no doubt glad to see the new secretary of their Synod's Committee.

The excitement in the Highlands over the Free and U.P. question continues, especially as the Presbyteries that were expected to oppose the union are the very ones that are accepting it. Casting aside the example of the Dingwall and Inverness Free Presbyteries, the Lewis Free Presbytery, after a sitting of four hours at Stornoway, decided, by ten votes to five, to approve of the proposed union.

Society of Friends.

William Marshall, an American friend who is well advanced in life, in obedience to what he feels to be a Divine call, is on his way to Bolivia, in South America, and passed through London last week.

John F. Hanson, another American friend, has spent the autumn and winter in Scandinavia, and been much blessed in his work there, passed through London a few days ago on his way home. He hopes to return and complete his mission, Many open doors appear in Norway.

Much active mission work is on hand in England, both in direct Gospel preaching and in the adult and other schools. Anti-slavery and peace also claim much attention, and in various ways the friends are promoting human well-being and trying to honour Him who has brought "deliverance to the captive."

The statistical returns for 1898 show at the close of the year a clear gain of 1,464, or about 1·30 per cent. The chief gain (1,301) is in the United States of America. There are fourteen "yearly meetings of Friends" on the American continent, two in Great Britain, five on the continent of Europe, and six in Australasia, with mission stations in every quarter of the globe. The total number of "recognised ministers of the Gospel" is 1,648. From the colonies, notably Australia, it is reported that "there are tokens of spiritual life and growth, indications that these settlers come of sturdy English stock."

Personalia.

Sir W. Besant has relinquished his proposed visit to Palestine, owing to press of work.

Mr. H. Mody, of Bombay, was recently married to Miss A. J. Hall, who was connected with the Mildmay Deaconess's Mission.

Mrs. G. E. Ardill, of Sydney, received a very warm public welcome from temperance and other friends in that city on her return from a visit to the old country.

Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon will attend a reception at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Wednesday, February 8, from 3 to 5 p.m., to receive gifts for the rebuilding fund of the Tabernacle.

General Sir Arthur Cotton, R.E., K.C.S.I., who resides at Dorking, is now in his ninety-sixth year. He is still able to walk and has good health, which he attributes to abstinence from alcoholic drinks and smoking, and to his eating much less than is usual among Englishmen. When a child he was far from strong, and was not expected to reach manhood. The aged General states that he has since been "sentenced to death" by doctors on four occasions, and that his grave was dug in Persia sixty-five years ago.

Miss Irene Petrie.—A scheme is on foot for commemorating the devoted life and early death of Miss Irene Petrie, who went out to India in 1893, worked for more than three years as an honorary missionary of the Church Missionary Society at Srinagar, Kashmir, and died very suddenly on August 6, 1897, at Leh, in Tibet. It is proposed to raise £3,000 to produce annually an "Irene Petrie Fund," to provide one additional missionary for Kashmir. The hon. sec. to the fund is Miss Mary Bidder, 10, Queen's Gate Gardens, W.

The Aldersgate Mid-day.

ON Monday last the noon prayer meeting was characterised throughout by signs of manifest blessing, the testimonies as to "abundance of rain" being spontaneous and encouraging.

Mr. R. C. Morgan expressed some suggestive thoughts on the place of Bible teaching in revival work, emphasising the importance of regarding the Bible as an organic whole, and studying it accordingly. In spite of the onslaughts of false friends and of open enemies, it was still the living message; and upon its proper comprehension rested, to a great extent, the future of Christianity. The Book of Revelation, frequently the subject of slur or attack, was, the speaker considered, the very flower of the Bible, as Genesis might be called the root; but with regard to this portion of the word, as indeed of all other utterance of a prophetical character, care must be taken to avoid drawing forced deductions, and conveying unwarranted explanations thereof, in order to suit our own pet theories. We must give in the form of teaching, only what God directly gave in the Bible as such; but those who declared the gospel to the people, must first of all, in order to be properly equipped, "eat the little book," and be built up into spiritual strength by assimilating its truth. Mr. Morgan cordially advised attendance at the very helpful course of instruction now being given by Dr. White.

Mr. W. Taylor drew a lesson from the familiar passage in 2 Sam. v. 24: "When thou hearest the sound of a going (marching, R.V.) in the tops of the mulberry trees thou shalt bestir thyself." David was not to trust to the power of his armaments, or to charge on hearing the tramp of the Philistines, but to wait for the sound of marching above him. Mr. W. R. Lane spoke hopefully of crowds and blessing at Woolwich in the midst of neighbourhoods of extreme poverty and squalor; and Mr. Leonard Weaver, after mentioning a large ingathering of souls at the Great Assembly Hall, alluded to the living power of the Bible. He had upon one occasion, when dealing with a large audience of agnostic working men, taken the twenty-third Psalm as the basis of an address upon Christian joy, and followed it up with addresses, so framed as to invest the Bible with special interest in the opinion of his hearers. There was such a run upon the local Bible stores that all their copies were sold out, and a revival followed. He found great good to result from, so to speak, "throwing the Bible" at a careless, unbelieving crowd.

Among other interesting testimonies, Mr. Jai Bhai, of the Raj-i-masih, spoke of cheering news from India, and the gathering concluded with fervent prayer for a widespread revival.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

THE demand for the special offer of "Works on Romanism," made by our publishers (see page 31 of this week's issue), continues to be very large, and the letters which reach us from purchasers indicate a wide-spread appreciation of this opportunity of obtaining literature suitable to the present crisis. A Christian worker writes from Lee :—

> Books received safely and am well pleased with the parcel. In this time of strife, the books will be most helpful.

The Secretary of an important Y.M.C.A. in the North of England writes :—

> The special parcel of "Works on Romanism" as advertised in THE CHRISTIAN is a marvel of cheapness. The selection is admirable, and the circulation of such literature must have a very beneficial effect.

Many similar testimonies are being received daily.

We hope our readers are availing themselves of the studies in Leviticus by Mr. Meyer, appearing on our "DAY BY DAY" page. Multitudes of Christians are quite ignorant of both the contents and lessons of the book to which these studies are a practical and suggestive aid.

Writing in reference to the Czar's Rescript and the efforts being made by Mr. W. T. Stead and others to bring about a universal peace, a correspondent says—

> I do not see any warrant for believing that "wars and rumours of wars" will cease during the time that yet remains before Christ comes. It is very evident, also, that the age will close with one of the most appalling conflict ever know, as foretold by Ezekiel, Zechariah, and other prophets, and Christ's advent will take place just when the forces of an enemy (believed to be none other than Russia) have almost succeeded in taking Jerusalem and destroying its inhabitants. After this will come the universal peace, mentioned in so many parts of the prophecies.

The study of prophecy was not intended to make us prophets. Although wars may not cease, and though the age may end in blood, we are surely justified in hailing with thankfulness whatever makes for peace. The painful thing to us is that while the powers that be are ordained of God, there is no recognition of Him in this proposed Conference as the Creator and Ruler over all.

Those who know the real teaching of the Church of Rome on the duty of truthfulness would do well to study a lecture by the Jesuit, Father Smith, on "Are Catholics Allowed to Tell Lies?" In defending the "doctrine of reservation," he illustrated the case by saying that there were certain customary understandings "among right-minded men" which qualified the meaning of the phrases "It is not" and "I do not know," so as to keep within the letter of the truth, and yet withhold information. He also appealed to the social insincerities implied in saying "Not at home" when the lady of the house was upstairs, and the legal fiction which permitted prisoners to plead "Not guilty" when everyone knew that they were. Father Smith could not prove the case against himself more thoroughly. He seemed to think that because these phrases are customary, they are justifiable. Such arguments are useful in showing that Jesuitism is a system that justifies "means by ends," and opens the door to shameful and wicked insincerity in social and religious life.

In all movements for the defence of the Gospel there is special need for watchful care lest we should begin in the spirit and end in the flesh. The Old Adam delights in conflict, and pride and love of strife and self-will easily find a place in such efforts as are now being made on every hand.

A day's meetings are to be held under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance on February 14 in Exeter Hall, to which Christians are asked to gather and unite in confession of sin and special prayer, in reference to the Romanising movement. We trust that a goodly number will remember this date, and strengthen the hands of the Evangelical Alliance in their work, which is conducted on true spiritual lines.

Whatever be the truth of the Scriptural teaching concerning the Sacraments, there is no denying the force of the appeal just made by the Society of Friends in a part of the manifesto just issued on the subject of Ritualism. They claim to have proved, in opposition to the teaching of those who make participation in these Sacraments a condition of receiving the grace of God, that many of their number have, without such participation, > come under the true baptism of the Spirit, and to know, by deep and fruitful experience . . . . that the non-observance of these ceremonies has not cut off our members from his cleansing and sanctifying blood.

In days when such exaggerated and mischievous teachings on this subject are abroad, this appeal to the facts of the case ("by their fruits ye shall know them") should be conclusive against the claims of the Sacramentarians. In this matter these who, nevertheless, believe in the commemorative aspect of the Lord's Supper are at one with the Friends in their timely protest.

The Church Times, commenting on the suggestion of the Chronicle that the way to get out of the present deadlock in the Episcopal Church is to disestablish the Church and treat it more liberally in regard to endowments than the Irish Church was treated, makes the following frank confession :—

> For our part, we hold that it is the State that would be the loser in the event of disestablishment; and that if we are driven out of our present position by an ungrateful State, the Church is strong enough to say, as Moses said of old, that not a hoof shall be left, but that we will retain every penny of those endowments which have been entrusted to us for the work of the Church.

Were these endowments entrusted for the propagation of the errors and superstitions which the Ritualists are disseminating, or for some better purpose? The nation will want to know. Moreover, if there is anything that will make the nation resist a huge endowment of a disestablished Church, it will be the determination not to re-endow a Romanising Church.

Mr. Balfour's letter regarding the proposed Roman Catholic University in Ireland follows the ancient plan described as "a sop to Cerberus." By giving the Protestants of the North a University at the same time, he attempts to overcome the objection felt to the other scheme. This is to misunderstand the objection in toto. Fundamentally it is one that rejects any and every sectarian university, be it Catholic or Protestant. It demurs to any endowment by the State, be it direct or indirect, of a particular form of religious teaching. Since the disestablishment of the Irish Church, true religion has greatly benefited in Ireland. To found two rival universities in that island would be to accentuate everything that divides the people into factions, and to hand over the larger portion of the country still more entirely to the undisputed sway of priest-craft. The lovers of religious liberty can never assent to a movement so retrograde and demoralising.

The energy and consecration of the members of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in the rebuilding of their house of prayer are a prophecy of sure success in the near future. It would be a calamity indeed if a millstone of debt were to hamper the great work of the church. No doubt numbers of Christians, who profit to-day from the sermons of the departed eloquent pastor still issuing from the press, will make an effort to show practical sympathy in the undertaking on February 8, when Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon herself will attend at the Tabernacle and receive gifts toward the rebuilding fund. A very substantial sum should be realised on the occasion. Those desiring to assist, if unable to attend, should remit their donations to Mrs. Spurgeon.

At the London Wesleyan Convention last week Mr. Hugh Price Hughes remarked, at the outset of the all-day prayer meeting, that any inclination to pray for longer than two minutes should be regarded as a temptation from the devil. We are not prepared to accept that absolutely. Still, long prayers are largely responsible for the meagre attendance at prayer meetings, of which so many ministers complain. But are not some ministers themselves to blame for setting the example? The Apostolic injunction to "pray without ceasing" does not lay upon those who lead in public prayer the obligation of always praying for ten or fifteen minutes. Brief, fervent, definite supplications contribute both to the interest and spiritual profit of the congregation. Long prayers are always tedious and wearisome, and nothing kills a devotional service more effectually.

The London County Council have taken a backward step in regard to the Sunday concert question. They still demand that they shall not be held with a view to trade profits, and that the music shall be of a high order. But they authorise the principle of charging for admission, with the proviso that there shall be a definite number of free seats. At the Alhambra the lessees are permitted to charge £40 a Sunday as rent, which is surely "gain by way of trade." The situation is thus thoroughly illogical; there is no clear and consistent principle at work, and without guiding principles we all know that the old trouble will soon recommence. Probably in this question, the wobbling of the Council is a true mirror of the chaotic state of the public conscience. What is most needed, therefore, is a return to simpler and more spiritual views of Sunday observance on the part of the community.

And in this matter, the Churches alone can take the lead. They, and not the County Councils, are the true guardians of the Lord's Day. It was a great revival within the Church which swept away the abominations of pre-Reformation and Restoration Sabbath-breaking times. It is only a great revival within the Church that can keep back the fast-flowing tide of Continental and Catholic desecration of the Lord's Day. Those of the working and middle classes who are clamouring for more Sunday amusements little realise what a yoke of bondage they are preparing for their own necks. Wiser than most, the Actors' Society of America has begun an interesting and vigorous crusade against Sunday theatrical performances, and in a circular to ministers it is stated that such performances are a degradation to the dramatic calling, demoralising both to the actors and to the communities in which they are given." This is a significant and far-seeing attitude. It will be a good thing when the leaders of thought and action in this country awake to the perilous indecision and bewilderment in which the question is buried just now. The pulpit should lead here.

The Puritan calls attention to the needless desecration of the Lord's Day in our country by the running of goods trains, and points out that in Belgium and other countries on the Continent Sunday goods traffic is reduced to a minimum. What is possible there ought not to be impossible here. Our national tendency to hurry and to get through as much work as possible may have something to do with Sunday work, but we fear that a far more potent motive is the love of gain and the stimulus of competition. Would it not be feasible for the several companies to enter into an agreement to run a certain number of trains, only as many as may be required, for the transit of perishable goods and goods that are necessary? In that case none would be the losers, but the employes would gain a much needed rest, and Sunday quiet would be greatly extended. We cordially wish success to those shareholders in railways who are striving for this object.

Are Christian people not in peril of falling under the craze of numbers? The mere word "million" and its subdivisions have become catchwords in half a score new movements. The latest instance is "a million pennies" in aid of the Peace Crusade. A contemporary recently suggested that instead of a "million pounds" towards this or that scheme of Church extension, it would be well for some one to start a scheme for converting a "million souls." It is perilous to link a noble purpose with such mechanical ideas. We cannot legislate for results in such ways. It is ours to do our best for God, and leave the issues to Him.

A case of great importance to the cause of moral reform was decided last week, the first of its kind, in which the agent for house property has been declared liable for the character of the tenants. Acting under instructions, this agent had exacted such ruinous rents that the tenants (mostly poor, and some widows) could not live in the houses unless they conducted them as brothels. Not only did the agent encourage this, but levied a further tax on his own account as the price of silence. He was sentenced to three months' hard labour, and his appeal to a higher court has been very properly quashed. It is a pity the landlord was not sent to keep him company. Great credit is due to the South London Central Free Church Council for its spirited action in unearthing this and other abominations.

Every step in the path of reform, however short, is welcome; it is pleasant to hear that in a number of shops seats are now provided for shopwomen, and that the movement to make the reform general is steadily growing. Custom is difficult to alter, but masters and buyers will come to see that an employé will do better work if she can have a few minutes' rest now and again, and that no great harm can be done if she is sometimes seen sitting instead of standing. Shop hours are long, and shop work is exhausting, especially to young girls, and anything that can be done to mitigate hardship is a positive duty. The Christian assistant who ends the day not utterly exhausted can also be of some use in social and religious work; thus there will be gain all round.

The improved fraternal relations between France and England are full of promise. The conciliatory tone adopted by the best French papers towards this country is a happy indication of a better sentiment amongst the people, which we cordially reciprocate. The wise statesmen on this side will desire to promote peace and amity with our sister nation across the Channel. But it is the vox populi that will emphasise most accurately the real feelings of this nation. What both countries need most is recognition of God as the inspiring motive in their statesmen and leaders of thought.

It has often been pointed out that the present system of conscription in Continental countries leads to an immense waste of human energy during the most productive period of youth. A great scheme of reform is about to be initiated in the Russian army, with a view to better this state of things. There are about 260,000 conscripts enrolled every year in that army, and its permanent strength may be put down as a million men. Of these conscripts, about 5 per cent. can read and write. Under the new scheme, the whole of these are to receive a sound elementary education during their six years' service, and a large proportion will alternate a training in various industrial arts with their military duties. Instead of being sent back into the community unfitted for civil life, they will thus start life afresh with quickened intelligence and strengthened character. This important "experiment in militarism," if loyally and thoroughly carried out, will tell immensely in a generation or so on the national well-being, and do more than many diplomatic congresses to decrease war.

It has been justly said that they who administer a kingdom actually govern it. How happy would all the nations be if they were administered as was Israel in the wilderness. Jethro urged Moses, by way of relieving himself, to look out reliable men who feared God, men of truth, and, as to power of money, impeccability. Spain would not be selling her colonies to-day; France would not be in a prolonged fever of rage, disappointment, and fear as to her army; Russia would not have multitudes suffering from famine, from persecution, and from cruel exile and imprisonment; the United States would not be reproached for starving its soldiers and mismanaging its cities, if such men as assisted Moses had been their civil and military administrators. Have not Christians a direct responsibility for the good government of nations? "I exhort, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high places."

In the story of the sinking of the Merrimac in Santiago Harbour, of which a stirring account is given in The Century Magazine, it was noticed by those on board that a Spanish gunboat was aiming all its shots at the steering gear, in the attempt to destroy which it ultimately proved successful, so that the crew failed to sink the vessel in the desired position. Here we have a good illustration of the spiritual life. The vital place in character is the will—the self-directing faculty; and all the resources of the evil one are directed towards weakening and destroying this God-given faculty. It is, on the other hand, the end of religion to make the will invulnerable against attack from outside, and against treachery from within. The man whose will has been regenerated, and whose motive-power is replenished by God's grace, is supreme in the face of all temptation.

We are accustomed in this country to pride ourselves in our capacity to deal justly with the native races under our rule. An article in the Contemporary Review, by "A World Wanderer," shows up another side to the national character. He says: "The Englishman when he gets away from his own shores is inclined to develop into earth's supremest snob. . . . We seem to have been suckled on national egotism. And the bad side of that egotism comes out more particularly when we have to deal with Eastern nations. The mere fact of coming into contact with nations deteriorates the man, and especially the woman." This is by no means a solitary testimony, and the accusation is one it would be well to lay to heart. Greatness, which takes form in vanity and pride, is already on the decline.

There is a beautiful story in Henry Drummond's Life of the value of friendship, when rightly used, as a means of conversion. A young graduate had come from America to finish his medical studies in Edinburgh, and while there he formed an intimacy with a fellow student who was an avowed Agnostic. When the time came for the American to return to his own country, he packed his trunks, and then suddenly determined to remain another year, in the hope that he might be of spiritual use to his friend, who was still sceptical. Long before the year was up he had the satisfaction to see the Agnostic soundly converted, after which he went home to begin his professional career. Two or three weeks after his departure the other went to Professor Drummond and said he was about to offer himself as a medical missionary. Young people do not rightly measure the influence for good they can have on each other. What sermons and religious services cannot do may often be done by patient and earnest friendship.

Just as we go to press the following sad message reaches us:—"Dr. Berry, of Wolverhampton, died suddenly at a funeral service to-day" (Tuesday). By the time the paper is in the hands of our readers, full particulars will be known. His loss will be keenly felt, not only in the Midlands but throughout the country.

Anchored.

By Rev. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

A MERCHANT of my acquaintance, who once did a large business, and a minister of my acquaintance, who once drew large congregations, have gone on the rocks. The merchant, finding himself embarrassed, resorted to some desperate and dishonest practices; they have ended in the worst of all bankruptcies, a bankruptcy of character. The minister began to drift away from his old moorings, abandoned his faith in one vital doctrinal truth after another, until his spiritual influence has been wrecked. When the cable that held them "parted," their drifting was inevitable, and their fate was certain.

Glorious old Paul (whom I am never tired of quoting), understood spiritual navigation as well as he understood nautical navigation on his memorable voyage towards Rome. Faith was the chain cable that united him to the omnipotent Jesus. "I know whom I have believed," exclaims the veteran hero, "and I am persuaded that He is able to keep." Jesus Christ was unseen—just as the anchor gripping fast to the solid ground is unseen—but his holding power was felt on the conscience and on the will. As a vessel in the teeth of a storm feels the pull of the cable, so the soul that is made fast to Christ feels the pull of his power.

Never was there a time when all ministers and all men needed more to be well anchored. The atmosphere in many quarters is thickly befogged with doubts; there is a dangerous disposition to question the supreme infallibility of God's Word; there is a lowered estimate of the deadliness and doom of sin; and the currents of materialism and worldliness run fearfully strong. Every one of us is liable to adverse gales that may burst upon us at an unexpected moment. Trials and temptations come without warning; Satan, no more than a burglar, sends notice of his assault. As a vessel is often stripped of her canvas before the sailors have time to man her yards, so it may be with us. We may be and stripped of all our "top-hamper;" but if the soul is made fast to the anchor sure and steadfast, we shall not suffer wreck. The unseen Christ — our Redeemer, Protector, Preserver — makes us outlive the tempest. How beautifully some people behave in bad weather! When we see them beaten upon with adversity, or assailed with a Euroclydon of trials, and yet maintaining a brave, cheerful spirit, we may wonder why they are not troubled as other men are. But the All-seeing Eye discovers the steadfast anchor lying many fathoms deep beneath the billows. "Come, now, let us sing the forty-sixth Psalm!" did stout old Martin Luther say amid the roar of the devil's hurricanes.

More treacherous perils than tempests often beset our spiritual life. There are silent, stealthy under-currents of temptations which, in the smoothest sea, may get hold of our keels, and, before we know it, we may be on the rocks. Thousands of church members are suffering terrible from this cause. One drifts insensibly into neglect of prayer and of his Bible, and of all proper Sabbath observance; this latter is a growing evil. Another drifts into sensual and sinful amusements. Another feels the clutch of temptation to the bottle, or to lecherous indulgences, but takes no alarm until he has struck the rock, and a hideous hole in his character sends him down into disgrace. Nothing but a wonderful interposition of God's grace can ever raise a sunken Christian. You and I know of some sad cases of church members whom it is about as difficult to get afloat again as those riddled Spanish warships on the beach of Santiago. And oh, how many professed Christians who are carried smoothly along by the undercurrents of worldliness until we look for them where they ought to be, and they are not to be found! Is not this the secret of a large part of the backsliding in our churches? My friend,

HAS YOUR SOUL AN ANCHOR?

Be assured that neither strength of intellect, nor respectable surroundings, nor outward connection with a church can save you; they will prove to be but ropes of sand attached to anchors of straw; they never can hold you against strong tides of temptation. God never insures anyone, not even in the visible Church, who neglects to guide his course by the Bible-compass, and to fasten his soul to Jesus Christ.

These are drifting days, and I do not know of any one who is "drifting" towards heaven. The currents of this world set the other way. There is an anchor—just one—which is "sure and steadfast, and entereth into that within the veil." It reacheth into eternity. Fasten your soul to Jesus Christ, your weakness to his strength, your conscience to his commandments, your whole self to his infinite and all-sufficient grace, and you are safe. When you have weathered out the last storm, and resisted the last current of temptation, you will give the credit not to your own skill of seamanship, but to Him whose atoning blood purchased your redemption, and whose mighty arm of love brought you into the heavenly port.

Are We Right?

A SERIOUS MISSIONARY QUESTION.

II.

THERE are probably many who will agree that in the abstract it is a wrong thing for Christians at home to go to heathen lands and divide the native Christians into sects. "But," they say, "what are we to do? We must have some system. If you do not set up one church you will only be setting up another; there is no help for it." In other words, it is wrong, but it can't be helped; therefore, it is right!

Is there really no better way for us? Are we right in deliberately causing divisions in Christ's flock? Might we not—ought we not—to come together and earnestly, tearfully, prayerfully

LOOK FOR A BETTER WAY?

We may deeply value our system, and may be convinced that it is the best. Yet is it always right to insist on introducing it? Let me give an illustration. Suppose all the people in this province are Christians, but they are all Wesleyans. Circumstances call me, a Christian man and an Episcopalian, to work in this province. Because I believe that the Church of England system is the best, should I be justified in trying to introduce the Church of England system, and in deliberately dividing those Christian people, who hitherto had been united, into rival parties? Although, for those who joined it, my system might be better, would it be a right action on my part? Could any evangelical man who had the mind of Christ commend my action? Could anyone with commonsense say I had done a good thing? Would not my name rather be held up to lasting disgrace, for is it too much to say I should be doing the devil's work?

And if it is wrong to introduce divisions where Christians are united, is it not wrong for us in the first instance to divide them? Though our system is, in our view, the best, would it not be more right to sacrifice a part of it, nay, the whole of it, rather than divide into "parties" those who as yet are not divided and might be one?

Again, it seems to me worse than a pity to introduce into fresh countries non-essential customs and expressions which have caused bitter, endless warfare at home, and will do the same wherever we take them; customs and expressions which to earnest and well-educated members of the churches which use them are, not unfrequently, a difficulty and a stumbling-block.

At present in China, as I have already gladly pointed out there is much friendliness and goodwill among the various denominations. Our divisions are thought by some to be rather harmless. Perhaps they are—at present!

BUT TO WHAT ARE THEY LEADING?

It is natural at first, in a heathen wilderness, where our fellow-countrymen and native Christians, are few, and everybody is glad to see everybody without asking what church we belong to, that the dangerous side of our divisions lies in the background, and is, perhaps, but little noticed. But the snake is there lurking in the grass! And when, by and by, wretched divisions and superstitions have brought disgrace and sorrow on the Church in China, we shall ask, "Who sowed the seeds?"

But I hear a whole crowd of voices saying, "That is all very well, but tell us now what we are to do." Nay, it is too much to ask me to do that. My question is "Are we right"? If the answer is "Yes," then there is nothing to say. If the answer is "No," then it is ridiculous in so serious a matter to come to one insignificant missionary and ask him what ought to be done.

The whole Church or, failing that, the Missionary Societies among themselves, should earnestly, humbly, and prayerfully consider the matter before God, with an immovable determination to find out his will for his ambassadors who go to heathen lands, and

AT ALL COSTS TO ACT UPON IT.

But, as far as I can see, the Missionary Societies and their missionaries have been, and are, content to go severally their own separate ways; and have made, and are making, no serious attempt to avoid or remove these things which we deplore, if we do deplore them. One thing only seems absolutely settled, and that is that, divisions or no divisions, every church, big and little, must certainly set itself up wherever its missionaries go. And very few seem inclined to sacrifice even trifling non-essentials for the sake of greater unity; unity is not promoted by wilful poliformity.

Thoughts for Parents.

PURITY.

"Whatsoever things are pure, think on these things." Eph. iv. 8.

"BE pure, and thou must needs be brave." A wide and half-concealed immorality lies just beneath the surface of society. "A precipice lies before every boy and girl when they emerge from the shelter of their home; but a sure safe path leads round it. We must gently warn them of the one; we must lead them to the other."

Parents, your silence is dangerous; set up a habit of confidence with your children that you may the more easily warn them of so vital a danger. Do not be shocked or angry when your boy utters some half ignorant remark or question. Here is your opportunity for instruction! Let their first knowledge of this evil come from a pure source.

Speak of the dignity of the body, which may become a temple of the Holy Ghost. Tell of the wonderful relationship between mother and child in the absolute union of their two lives in one body. Teach them the profanity of light and vain thoughts about love and marriage. Teach your boys to honour womanhood, the degradation of which is sin, and will surely bring punishment.

China and Opium.

By Rev. ARNOLD FOSTER.*

SINCE this Examination was printed, many complications have arisen in the relations of China with European nations, and several important concessions have been made by the Chinese Government to Great Britain. These are not referred to in the paragraph of my "Appeal" that deals with the recent political action of Great Britain in China, and as none of the later developments of the China question effect my argument I shall not here allude to any of them.

I wish, however, to call special attention to the following important words uttered by the Marquis of Salisbury at the end of June:—

If I am asked what our policy in China is, my answer is very simple. It is to maintain the Chinese Empire, to prevent it falling into ruins, to invite it into paths of reform, and to give it every assistance which we are able to give it, to perfect its defence or to increase its commercial prosperity. By so doing we shall be aiding its cause and our own.

With the policy thus described I am in the most hearty sympathy, but nothing is more certain than that the ruin of China cannot be averted unless the opium habit now spreading with such terrible rapidity amongst the Chinese people can, by some means, be checked and overcome. It is this, more than almost any other single cause, that has reduced the rulers, the soldiers, and the people of China, to their present condition of paralysis and decay. As the habit spreads so most assuredly will the decay spread. No military or naval reforms, no fiscal, educational, or other changes can rehabilitate a nation whose whole manhood is being steadily sapped by the spread of a national vice such as the opium-habit.

Within the past six months a book has been published in China by H. E. Chang Chih-tung, from which I give below two quotations bearing on the devastation wrought in China by the practice of opium smoking. This writer has for many years been one of the in the whole of China. He has filled in succession three of the most important viceroyalties in the Empire, those of the Liang Kwang, Hukwang, and Liang Kiang. In point of ability, honesty, disinterestedness, and patriotism, he stands second to no official in the Empire. The chapter from which I am about to quote is entirely non-political. The writer does not here reproach England for her share in the demoralisation of China, nor does he seek to exonerate China from hers. He deals with the opium-habit from the standpoint of every right-minded and intelligent Chinaman, as a huge national evil, with the results of which he is thoroughly familiar, and he pleads for its suppression. Under the heading, "The expulsion of the poison," he writes thus:

(1) "Deplorable indeed is the injury done by opium! It is [as] the Deluge of the present day or [an invasion] of some fierce beasts, but the danger [arising from it] is greater than [the danger arising from] those things . . . . The injury done by opium is that of a stream of poison flowing on for more than a hundred years, and diffusing itself in twenty-two provinces. The sufferers from this injury amount to untold millions. Its consequences are insidious and seductive, and the limit has not yet been reached. It destroys men's abilities, it weakens the vigour of the soldier, it wastes their health,† until it results at length in China being what she is to-day. This destruction affects the ability of civilians and soldiers alike. The injury is worse than any waste of wealth. Men's wills are weakened, their physical strength is reduced. In the management of business they lack industry, they cannot journey any distance, their expenditure becomes extravagant, their children are few. After a few tens of years it will result in China becoming altogether

THE LAUGHING-STOCK OF THE WORLD.

(2) "Shanghai and Yangchow both have associations for breaking off the opium habit. Their general object may be said to be that each member should control his dependents. As for the opium-smokers, masters will not employ them as servants, teachers will not have them as scholars, generals will not take them as soldiers, farmers will not use them as labourers, merchants will not employ them as assistants, foremen will not have them for workmen."

Other passages of a similar character might be quoted, but these are sufficient. The writer concludes by saying:

"If Confucius and Mencius were to live again, and were to teach the Empire. . . . they would certainly begin by [teaching men] to break off opium."

Such is the opinion of one of China's greatest statesmen. That it is the general opinion of the Chinese may be proved by consulting any books written by Chinamen dealing with the subject. I have again and again challenged the defenders of our opium traffic to adduce one single quotation from a Chinese author which speaks of the opium-habit as being anything else but evil; as yet, however, I have never heard of one such quotation being discovered.

The first reform to which Great Britain must invite China, if she wishes to save the Chinese Empire from falling into ruins, is the abandonment of the opium habit; and the first step towards that reform must be the withdrawal of Great Britain herself from all participation in the opium trade. If Lord Salisbury will, at whatever cost, help China to shake off this great evil from which she is now suffering, he may even yet do something to save the Chinese nation. If England persists in refusing to recognise this evil, all other movements which she may make in the direction of reforming China will be found to be unavailing.

* Preface to "An Examination and an Appeal."

† "This year the value of foreign goods imported amounted to more than eighty million [taels]. The export of Chinese products might be about fifty million [taels] or more. The foreign drug [i.e., opium] was valued at more than thirty million [taels]. Thus there was a leakage. China is not improverished by commerce, but the impoverishment comes from the consumption of opium."

A Little While.

Only a "little while,"
Then the dear Master's smile,
Radiant and sweet;
Only a few short days,
Then a glad hymn of praise,
Low at his feet.

Blessed and glorious thought,
He who my soul hath bought,
I shall behold;
No mists of earth between,
No sin to intervene,
Rapture untold.

Washed, redeemed, sanctified,
Perfected, glorified,
I shall arise
From my accustomed place,
Changed in a moment's space,
Joyous surprise.

There with my loved to be
Throughout eternity,
Never to roam;
Suffering and trial o'er,
"Pleasures for evermore,"
Safe, safe at home.

The Desired Revival.

UNPRACTICAL LAMENTATION.

"AND all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord." We are contrite, deeply grieved, in trouble. Will the Lord deliver us? Nevertheless, they had not put away their strange gods, and the Ashtaroth.

CONTRITION AND PRACTICAL REPENTANCE.

"If ye do return unto the Lord with all your heart," act accordingly and put away, &c. "Then the children of Israel did put away the Baalim and the Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only."

THE MEANS.

"I will pray for you."

"They poured out water." We are as weak as that. "They fasted." They acknowledged. To bring them still further into a right condition of spirit "Samuel judged" them—which, I suppose, means he tested their lives by the revealed Will of God, bringing to bear upon the conscience and the heart the expressed Word of God. And then the typical meritorious ground of grace is offered, and the answer comes.

A Missionary Cruise.

THE Missionary Cruise, organised under Dr. Lunn's auspices by Sir Matthew Dodsworth, Bart., and Rev. Norman Bennet, has been a great success, and will, it is hoped, prove the pioneer of many such. The whole tour was begun, continued, and ended in prayer. As regards results much of course must be known only to God. This can be said thankfully, that many on board other than the missionary party were stirred up. It was quite a new idea to many to see a band of young fellows, full of youthful vigour, so keen on spiritual things and mission work. The special services for seamen on board, the missionary talk about Jews and Mohammedans, and the gatherings for prayer, morning and evening, as often as arrangements permitted, were a witness for Christ that cannot be without its fruit. "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days" (Eccles. xi. 1).

To those whose chief aim was to know more of mission work, the cruise has been indeed full of interest and stimulus. To have met Jews and Mohammedans amid their own native surroundings, to have watched the workers in their daily duties, to have noticed the joy their service is to them, to have heard accounts of their work, and seen the results of it, made one see that "the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save." Many young fellows have realised, as a new experience, how intensely great is the want of more prayers and more helpers. The work is there, the doors are open, the need speaks loudly. From missionaries to both Jews and Mohammedans the cry was the same, "Come over and help us; brethren pray for us." The result of this missionary cruise will be the answer they desire.

All in the party felt very grateful for the unceasing care and untiring forethought which made all the arrangements both on land and on sea run so smoothly.

A Member.

Colonial and Continental Church Society.—Rev. J. Pardoe, labouring as a missionary at Novar, in the diocese of Algoma, thus writes of his work:—"After a long experience, both at home and abroad, the conclusion I have come to is that there is no part of the work which brings more lasting blessing than that of taking the message of a Saviour's love to individuals and families; amidst many discouragements there are not wanting evidences from time to time that the 'seed of the word' sown is bearing fruit in hearts and lives. Sunday-school work in this part of the mission is most encouraging. At one school about forty-five children attend very regularly, braving great difficulties of deep snow and heavy storms and intense cold to be in their places Sunday after Sunday to listen to the words of instruction. I ask for your continued interest in prayer on behalf of the work."

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, Feb. 5. Leviticus xv.

THE fear of contracting uncleanness must have had a wholesome effect on both men and women, restraining them in certain cases from actions which were not convenient, and perpetually interposing a barrier to the indulgence of passion, and a quarantine in the interests of health.

We are reminded inevitably of the words, "Let us draw near . . . . our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water." Clearly, no mere ablution of the body can secure that moral cleanliness which the presence of God demands in those who draw nigh; but it is certain that the soul needs perpetual cleansing, amid the most ordinary and natural processes of our physical and daily life. We may take it, as a rule, that we require to be purified in our inner life as often as the most fastidious and cleanly do in their care of their bodies.

How many of those who give themselves up to outward rites stay there! It may be assumed as a general principle that those who begin with the body seldom pass beyond it; they who begin with the spiritual and unseen will carry their inward conceptions to outward exemplification and practice.

Every step in this solemn ceremonial is worthy of notice; each brings out some feature in the sacrifice of Calvary, which in its own strong, pure light we might have missed. The High Priest, habited in simple linen, emblem of purity and humility; the elaborate sacrifices for himself that he might be holy, harmless, and undefiled; the sprinkling and presentation of the blood, the clouds of incense, the loneliness of the officiant, the repeated ablutions.

But most to me has always been the fate of the scapegoat. Laden with all the sins, iniquities, and transgressions of the children of Israel, see it waiting, in the afternoon sun, for the appointed man to lead it into the wilderness; past the doorway of the Tabernacle, past the tents of Israel, past the crowding multitudes assembled to see it go, past the furthermost outposts of the camp, over the desert wastes, and into a solitary land; innocent, yet execrated; dumb, yet eloquent of the doom of the sinbearer; escaping death by the knife, to be forsaken and solitary even unto death. And its conductor even accounted as unclean, needing to bathe his flesh in water before re-entering the camp.

How speaking the type!—so Jesus died. That cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" significant of the solitude into which He went for us. He bore away our sins as far as the east is from the west, into a land of forgetfulness, where none can recall them; unless we choose to resume them by our ingratitude and unbelief.

The most momentous and significant announcement of this chapter is the repeated caution that none should eat blood, because the soul of flesh was in the blood; and, therefore, blood could only be used for purposes of atonement. "For as to the life of all flesh, the blood thereof is all one with the life thereof" (14).

There is, perhaps, a more intimate connection between the blood and life than any of us imagine. It is, of course, a physiological fact that there are two sets of corpuscles in blood, the little discs that float through arteries and veins. The red ones are specially connected with the functions of respiration; they come to the wharf of the lungs for their cargo of fresh air, which they carry to the extremities. But the white ones have to do with life. Where they are more numerous, we are in full health, but where less, we fall into a morbid condition, and are liable to all kinds of infection and disease.

It is said of the Lord that He poured out his soul into death; and the shedding of his blood was, without doubt, the means of our redemption, because it was so closely associated with the devotion of his holy soul. Let us remember that as blood is the life of flesh, and life is soul, there was a very real substitution of the sinless Saviour for us most sinful and lost sinners. His life for our life; his soul for our souls; his pure and holy blood for our corrupt and unholy blood.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 8. Leviticus xviii.

In this chapter of prohibitions we have an enumeration of the sins which disgraced the seven nations of Canaan, whom the Lord cast out from before his people: "Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things; for in all these the nations are defiled, which I cast out from before you."

We often hear the taunt of the infidel about the merciless extermination of the Canaanites by Joshua; and yet, if these were their crimes, Joshua was surely justified, as God's executioner, in inflicting a penalty for which Nature herself called aloud. And, in addition, he was only anticipating by a few decades of years the inevitable result, which must have ensued if such crimes had run out their natural course. Those are very strong expressions: "the land vomiteth out its inhabitants," "the land is defiled." It would seem that Nature herself resented the crimes with which her rivers, woods, mountains and valleys were polluted. "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now."

True religion always means purity. When men are right with God, they will be blameless in their mutual relations. Again and again the refrain rings out, "I am Jehovah, your God." Because God is what He is—Jehovah, the maintenance of Righteousness and Reality; God, the God of the Covenant—it becomes us to live holy, righteous, and godly lives. "If ye call Him Father, who, without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear." A right attitude toward God will necessitate our right behaviour to all men and women.

THURSDAY, Feb. 9. Leviticus xix.

See how widespreading and far-reaching is Holiness of Life! The command to be holy stands in the first line of this chapter, and the whole chapter contains injunctions which may be considered as classed under this heading. Holiness touches the home-life, and implicates honour to the mother and father; enters the harvest field and olive yard, and demands that the stranger and poor should be remembered; touches the balance of the scale, and the measure of the counter; has to do with the prompt payment of the hireling's wage, and the tender treatment of the infirm. It should affect the decisions of the judge, and the tittle-tattle of the drawing-room. The planting of trees, the breeding of cattle, the gathering of fruit, the cutting of the beard, the discountenance of palmistry and wizardry, the honour due to the hoary head—all were included in the divine command to be holy, i.e., separate to Jehovah. And though it is manifest that some of these injunctions concerned that special form of civilization only, still it is imperative that holiness should affect the minutest and commonest details of our personal and domestic life.

Note the repetition of the solemn words, "I am Jehovah," with which almost each injunction is sealed; and let the thought that we belong to Him be a strong argument to refrain from all and anything that would be unworthy of this lofty relationship.

FRIDAY, Feb. 10. Leviticus xx.

Separated to be holy. This is the message both of the Old and of the New. We are the temple of God, and the temple of God is cut off from all ordinary dwellings and daily business, that it may be the shrine for Divine fellowship with man. So with our bodies, which are God's dwelling-place, and the whole tenour of our life. We cannot be for the world and God; for self-indulgence and the Spirit's indwelling; for the devil and for the Prince that gave him his mortal blow.

But in order to this separation let us not so much look at what we are called upon to renounce as on the blessed heritage we have in Jesus. Oh, think of what He has promised to be! He has gone into all the walks of life and callings of men that He might find images for the love and care that He is prepared to give to the separated soul. The shepherd with his flock, the enclosing door, the clinging fruit-bearing vine, the brother, friend—these and many more are pressed into his service, that we may know what He longs to be.

It is said of a mother that, to her horror, she saw her little child on the verge of a precipice; she did not dare call out, lest it might startle him to his death. But she bared her breast and the little thing came to it. So in the separation from the world and evil, in the attractiveness of the love of Christ, you will lose your taste for what other men love. Then they will draw away from you, with the feeling that there is no longer any accord between you and them.

There are many things which might arrest us in this chapter; we select two.

Notice the title given to offerings (8, 21): "The bread of God." As the bread of this life is sought after by man for sustenance and enjoyment, so God takes deep interest in the free-will offerings of his people. Our prayers, praises, acts of consecration, confessions, and utterances of intercession are his bread; and we are called upon to feed with Him, on the blessed Christ, his Son our Lord. We find a common joy and satisfaction in our loving meditation on Him. "The priest may eat of the bread of his God, both the most holy and the holy" (22).

Notice the extreme care exercised to preserve the ceremonial separateness and sanctity of the priesthood. They were not as other men in their sorrow for the dead, in their matrimonial alliances, in their aspect. None but those who were perfectly developed might enter the Holy Place. They might feed on the sacred gifts, but might not minister. All was done that the house of Aaron might stand forth among the people in an illustrious sanctity which reflected honour and glory on the worship of the sanctuary. Oh, what depths of meaning are contained in the apostle's words, "A royal priesthood, a holy nation . . . that ye may show forth the excellencies of Him"! (1 Peter ii. 9., R.V.)

Glimpses of Romanism.

3.—The True Position of the Papal Church in Italy.

By Rev. A. ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

IN my former papers on the true position of (1) The Pope and (2) The Priest in Italy, I endeavoured to show that for honest English people to realise what these are they must reverse their traditional ideas regarding them. And now I say the same thing as to the Papal Church. It is commonly considered and spoken of as a Christian Church, and it even arrogates to itself the claim to be the only Christian Church.

The conviction that prevails in Italy regarding it, where it appears in its true character, is that it has nothing to do with Christianity. That is my own conviction, and I do not think I shall have much difficulty in showing that it is a true and right one. I do not say that there are no Christians who are Roman Catholics (in my own circle of friends, I can count such), but I do say that it is a system both theoretically and practically anti-Christian.

IT IS ANTI-CHRISTIAN DOCTRINALLY.

I believe it will be conceded that the very essence of Christianity is salvation from sin—salvation not simply from sin's consequences hereafter, but from the love and power of sin here and now. Hence follows the doctrine of conversion or regeneration, of being born again. A Christian is one who has experienced the new birth, whose heart has been changed, and whose life has been changed; who has become a new creature in Christ Jesus, who has been delivered from the present love of evil, and who is being daily emancipated from its power. Salvation from sin is the very essence of Christianity.

But the Papal Church ignores all this, and it offers to its followers salvation, not from sin, but salvation in sin. Now let me quote in this connection the substance of what Professor Mariano, of Naples (a representative Italian Catholic), once said, for I cannot recall his exact words. He said that the Papal Church taught him that his salvation depended on his being inside the pale of that church, and of his having its services performed for him at the altar, independent altogether of his character and life. But he had been reading the Bible, and in it he found no such teaching. On the contrary, he found that his salvation depended on his experiencing a change of heart wrought in him by the Holy Ghost through faith in Jesus Christ. Therefore he concluded that Roman Catholicism was not only not a Christian system, but that it was the very antithesis of Christianity.

On another occasion this same writer defined Roman Catholicism as "a sort of insurance society that guaranteed salvation to those whose hearts were not touched by the grace of God." Yes, that is really what the Papal Church pretends to do. It demands no conversion, no regeneration, no change of heart and life, no new birth; it offers salvation in sin. This is well understood by all in Italy. I remember a poor woman, who was dying, receiving visits from Protestants, and when the parish priest found fault with her for it she roused herself in her bed, and indignantly made answer, "These Protestants are better people than we are, for their religion does not permit them to sin and then receive absolution for so much, that they may go and sin again." The outcome of Popery is in exact accordance with this theory; practically, it means living in sin. I do not say that all individual papists do this. Many are better than their creed. But, speaking generally, Roman Catholicism is

ANTI-CHRISTIAN IN PRACTICE.

In proof of this one has only to look at the condition of the Papal States under the temporal power. Unquestionably the worst government that Europe ever witnessed was the government of the Pope, and the most debased subjects in Europe were those over whom he ruled. They were sunk in ignorance and vice and crime. There was no security of life and property. The sanctity of the home was violated. As an Italian, who was for years resident in Civita Vecchia, told me, "There was not a house in which the priest was not the padrone;" and a member of the House of Deputies said some time ago, at Brescia, "Ladies in my young days drove about Rome with their coachmen and footmen in the liveries of their respective Cardinals." Now, thank God, the State is purifying the Church in Italy.

In proof that Popery is anti-Christian in its influence and consequences, one has but to look at Mexico, Cuba, the Philippines, the Roman Catholic cantons of Switzerland, and the Roman Catholic provinces of Ireland. One has only to examine the statistics of the jails and the poor-houses in England and Scotland to see that the prisoners and inmates who profess the Papal creed are out of all proportion to those of all religions or of no religion. The lowest, meanest district in all our large cities is always the Roman Catholic district. It cannot be otherwise where a religion is followed that professes to give salvation in sin.

In Italy it is universally believed to put a premium on sin; so much so that men who attend church services, and put themselves under priestly influence, fall in public estimation. "That is a birbone" (that is a scoundrel) is the phrase commonly applied to such. "Where is your religion?" I have asked an Italian. "In my heart here," was his answer, striking his breast, "not in the Pope's shop yonder," pointing to a church. Wherever Christianity goes, no matter in connection with what communion, it makes the bad man good and the good man better. The very creation, groaning and travailing in pain, feels its influence. "The wilderness and the solitary place is glad for it, and the desert rejoices and blossoms as the rose." The effect of the fall is counteracted, and all things in man and in nature are made new; a kingdom of righteousness is established. But wherever Popery goes, I am afraid, the very opposite results follow. It makes good men bad and bad men worse; it fetters trade and commerce, agriculture and industry, destroying—materially, intellectually, morally and spiritually—men and nations.

Let us beware of calling the Roman Catholic Church a Christian Church. "The tree is known by its fruits. Men do not gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles." Count Campello has often defined it to me as "Paganism veneered with Christianity." Doctrinally and practically it is in essence anti-Christian. Its true position is outside, for ever outside, the pale of Christianity.

Suffering Poor.—With the winter claims pressing heavily upon us, we have come to an end of our resources. Hunger, cold, and sickness are doing cruel work in destitute homes, and we have been compelled to cease the help that has usually been forthcoming in such crises of need. We look to your readers for help, which we have always received from them in similar times of need.

Protestant Outlook.

MESSRS. Passmore and Alabaster have issued a timely pamphlet containing "Twelve Sermons on Ritualism," by the late C. H. Spurgeon, including his famous discourse on Baptismal Regeneration, which latter we notice has reached its 226th thousand. Such eminently faithful and scriptural utterances ought to be widely read and pondered in these days when mediæval superstition and profitless formalism are reviving, in spite of our education and enlightenment.

Scotland is not unaffected by the Ritualistic delusion. A correspondent of the Glasgow Herald says of St. Michael's Episcopal Church, Edinburgh:

This Scots Episcopal Church has an elaborate altar, with tall, lighted candlesticks, a tabernacle, and a crucifix. From the presence of flowers and cards on the altar I presume the incumbent is not aware that it was not a pre-Reformation custom in England to have such things on the altar; their introduction is a custom borrowed of recent years from continental Roman Catholic churches. There appears to be a second altar in a small side chapel. There are many pictures and statues of saints with candles before them.

The collection was taken by "gravely-dressed members of the congregation, who repeatedly dropped on their knees as they caught glimpses of the altar in their perambulations." When the event of the day began—

The celebrant appeared gorgeously robed in what seemed to be green silk, with a huge gold cross on his back, and elaborate embroideries on the front of this garment. He stood before the altar with his back to the people, and began the Communion service of the Church of England in an almost inaudible voice; only once or twice did I catch a word which assured me he spoke English. Then he faced round, and an acolyte presented him with a gold censer. The incense was lit, and the celebrant duly censed. Then he presented that sacrifice of a sweet savour to the altar, and duly censed it. Then individually each of the clergy or choir was censed, each receiving the waving of the golden ball in his face with an obeisance.

At length the congregation was censed. Everything seems to have agreed with the Romish practice. The correspondent asks what Bishop Dowden has to say to these goings-on.

What do Continental Romanists say of "the present distress in England?" The leading clerical organ in Austria, the Vaterland, issued in Vienna, writes:—

Recent significant developments in the Anglican State Church prove in the clearest possible manner that the process of disruption and dissolution has made as rapid progress in the official ecclesiastical system of England as it has in other Protestant "National Churches."

After marking the progress made by the "Catholic invasion," and the conflicting proposals as to the best method of dealing with the Ritualists, the paper adds:—

How can these differences be settled? Where will this jumble of views and interests lead the Church of England? Perhaps to disestablishment. One thing only seems certain—namely, that if circumstances force the country to decide between the maintenance and the disestablishment of the Church, the problem cannot be solved without a severe political struggle.

At a meeting of 4,000 Protestants, held in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, telegrams were dispatched to members of the Cabinet and to Sir William Harcourt, protesting against the preferment given by the Government and Bishops to lawless clergymen, and demanding the restoration of law and order in the Church. A second telegram, protesting against the introduction of a processional cross into St. Paul's Cathedral, was sent to the Dean of St. Paul's.

The Bishop of Manchester, addressing a meeting of clergy at Preston, said certain text books had been handed to him by parents as having been given to their children by ministers. He condemned them as containing teaching which, if followed to its logical end, must lead to the Romish Church. Transubstantiation was against the teaching of the Scriptures and of the Church.

In the course of a speech at Wyndham, Lord Kimberley discussed the difficulties in the Church. He said the laity would never be ruled by priests, and if the bishops could not stop the sacerdotal excesses there might be a mutiny of the laity that would hasten disestablishment.

What promises to be an interesting and helpful series of lectures on "Romanism and the Reformation" are to be delivered in the Temperance Hall, Mint Walk, Croydon, on Thursday evenings in February and March, by Mr. P. De Bosson, formerly a Roman Catholic. Prizes will be given by the Croydon Protestant Alliance for the best epitomes by hearers.

The Bishop of Hereford, acknowledging the resolutions passed at the Holborn Town Hall meeting of clergy, says that the method of acting through private societies, bound together by secret rules, and circulating among ill-informed and trustful people anonymous tracts, booklets, and catechisms of a kind which it is impossible to reconcile with a straightforward and honest acceptance of the doctrine of the Reformed Church, has been far too long and widely practised in that section of the Church which the meeting seems to represent.

In a vigorous letter to Monday's Times, Sir William Harcourt says :—

The time has arrived when the laity, who are the Church, of which the clergy are the ministers, are, I believe, fully resolved to assert and maintain the rights which are secured to them by the constitution of the National Church. But if they wish to be helped, they must help themselves.

Among other suggested means for the attainment of this end, Sir William includes the formation of a well-organised system of investigation of the actual practices in churches, with reports to be submitted to the Bishop with demands for his action. In conclusion, Sir William says :—

The one thing which I would endeavour to urge is that, now that the public conscience has been fairly aroused and the public mind partially enlightened on these grave matters, the impression should not be allowed to die away, but that this Protestant protest—never more necessary than to-day—should be embodied in a permanent and operative system of action which may restore to the National Church the simplicity and the purity with which the Reformation endowed and blessed it, and whose great tradition has been a principal bulwark of the religion and liberties of ten generations of the English people.

The English Churchman of last week writes in a very desponding and admonitory tone of the evangelical party in the Church of England It looks to the people for help, saying that the majority of the clergy, even evangelicals, seem to be helpless.

Popery and Paganism.

THE relation of Popery to Paganism no longer requires demonstration ; but the wide field of literature is constantly bringing into view new aspects of the fact that distinctive practices of Popery are pagan in origin, and un-Christian in character. In an article entitled "Notes on Antiquities of the Pentateuch," in the new issue of the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, Lieut.-Colonel Conder has the following paragraph :—

Idolatry.—The idolatry of the Canaanites, specially condemned in Deuteronomy, is constantly illustrated by monumental discoveries. We know that they had images of stone, bronze, silver, and gold, of pottery, and probably of wood. The Asherah, or sacred tree, is known monumentally among Amorites. They had images of a goddess with a child in her arms. Their priests were shaven. They used incense, and probably holy water. The latter at least used to be bought by the Babylonians from the temples; and they wore various objects blessed by their priests. The lesser deities among them were regarded as intercessors with the supreme God. Holy water was also used for sprinkling by the pagan Romans, in the time of Tertullian, who also mentions at some length the adoration of wooden crosses among the pagans of his age in Asia. Some of these curious cruciform idols have been found in Phœnicia, and the cross is among the charms hung round the necks of Assyrian Kings. The Hebrews were forbidden to "bow before" or "to be enslaved by" such idols, and the only carved representations of living things connected with religion were the cherubim, hidden in the darkness of the inmost Temple, and seen only by the high-priest.

These are the words of an expert in archæology, whose object is to indicate ancient facts, and not to meddle in modern controversies. It is impossible, however, not to see the relation between old abominations and modern idolatry, as passing under the name of Catholicism, Roman or Anglican. Here we have the original of the Madonna and child, shaven priests, holy water and incense—and much besides of superstition, false doctrine, and degrading practice. The more we learn of heathen antiquities, the more true will be our views as to the essential nature and evil tendencies of Romanism and all its imitations.

How the Sacks were Filled.

MY former papers on Special Providence in The Christian have elicited so many testimonies to the encouragement and stimulus to increased faith that have been wrought by these means, that I am inclined to supplement them by jottings from a recent conversation with a friend.

We were speaking on this very subject, and, with sparkling eyes, she told me of some of her experiences in connection with a branch of her work, in sending from her home in the country help to the noble men in the ranks of the London City Mission. But perhaps I had better give the facts as nearly as possible in her own words.

"I have long been specially interested in the London City Mission, and every year, and sometimes oftener, I get a number of sacks, and my friends help me to fill them with garments, new or old, for the good men to give away among their terribly needy cases. And oh, the wonderful instances that have come under my notice of special Divine leading, and of minute care in detail, many of which we should have called trivial, but which meant so much to some poor, suffering child of God! I should like to tell you some of them.

"One day I was filling a sack from a heap of things that had come in from the mother of a large family, and I came upon an odd shoe, in excellent condition, and for the right foot. I was going to throw it aside, regretting the carelessness of the sender, but, yielding to a strong impulse, I put it in. I often have letters from the missionaries to whom I send my sacks, telling me of the marvellous fitness of some of the articles, and in a little time I received one in which the odd shoe had honourable mention. A little child had been brought to the missionary by its mother, who said so pathetically, 'I suppose it would be too much to ask you to give half a pair of shoes to my poor bairn, but she has no use of the left foot, and so only needs one,' and the poor wee thing was to which an apology for a shoe was tied with rags! The good man described the joy and pride of mother and child when the shoe for the right foot, a perfect fit, was placed on the one sound limb.

"Another time I had a most piteous appeal from London by the morning's post ; several poor fellows had been discharged from hospital, and the missionary thought he could get situations for some of them. But they needed clothes, and he had drained every available resource in his own neighbourhood, and so told his need to me. I was very nearly vexed, for I had sent away my autumn contribution, and had received such kind help from all my friends that I did not think one of them would have a single cast-off garment left. But I prayed about it, and then set out, asking God to guide me. Very soon I was strongly impelled to call at the house of a very charitable friend, but my own judgment kept me back. I cannot trouble her, she has done so much, and I am sure she has given everything she can spare. That was my reasoning ; but in steady response to it there came the imperative voice saying 'Go!'

"So I went, and hesitatingly and with many apologies, explained my errand. 'Oh, I am so glad you have come,' she rejoined, 'for a lady, who has not been long in this terrace, asked me only yesterday if I knew any needy cases, as she had a good many clothes to give away ; but I knew you had just sent your packages off to London, and so should not have named it to you if you had not called.' I went at once," my friend continued, "and got five suits! Just think of that! Was it not worth a bit of vexation in the morning?"

She must have seen my deep interest, for she went on to tell me another incident in her bright, animated way :

"There was a case only a week or two ago, so simple and yet so delightful. A lady who lives near me had just finished making two nice warm flannel under-garments for winter wear, and the doctor calling at the time, she showed them to him, but to her disappointment he strongly advised some new-fangled material as more hygienic. So, knowing my receptive nature, she sent them to me, and I put them into one of my sacks, only I wrapped them carefully in paper as something extra special. And such a touching letter I had from the City Missionary! I could not help crying over it.

"You know these good men are awfully poor ; their salaries are not large to begin with, and they get so interested in their cases that they often give far beyond their power. And this was the story he told me : His wife, a good noble helper to him in his work, had had rheumatic fever, and when she was recovering the doctor said she must wear flannels ; but they really had no money to buy any, and her husband could not help fretting about it, but she checked him, saying so bravely, 'Have we not a loving Father, dear? And does He not know all about it?' The the two vests, in their paper wrapper, were in the mouth of it, just like Joseph's cup. And he hoped I would not think them selfish in appropriating them without first asking my leave ; but he thought, when I knew the circumstances, I would not object. The old goose! Why, it paid me over and over again for any trouble I had had for them to be used to such purpose.

"And it is not only garments that are instruments of God's Providence in this work," she went on ; "God can use toys. Some old ones sent by some dear little children found a corner in one of the sacks, and this was their mission : My good friend took one on his rounds, and, passing the open door of a house where there was a sick child, he handed it in to the mother, who took it with eager thanks. The husband was a sceptic, and had forbidden him entrance ; but when next he passed the man came out to him with a softened countenance, saying no one had been kind to his child before, and if that was Christianity, he would like to know more of it ; so the opening thus made for the missionary's visits, led to the man's conversion."

I began these jottings from my friend's talk, thinking only of the watchful Providence they illustrate, but as I write there springs up in my heart a hope and prayer that they may be an inspiration to some of my readers, and that they may find her example "catching."

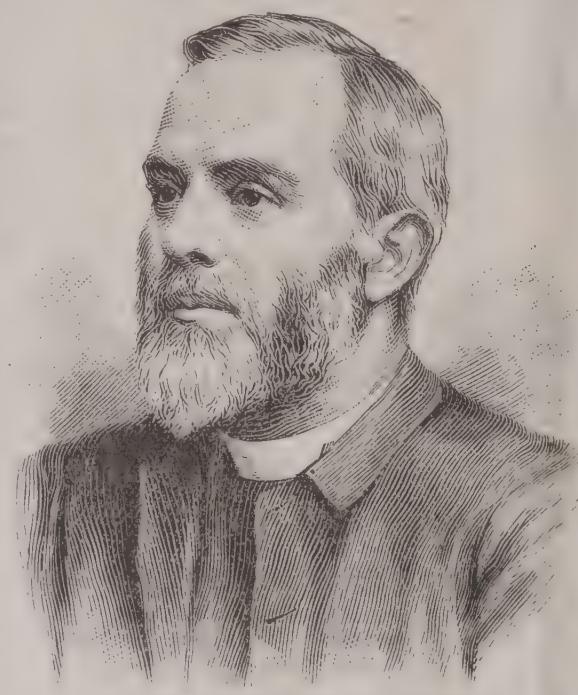
Hospital for Hip Disease.—An institution for the reception and treatment of poor children suffering from diseases of joints would, said Sir William Jenner, be a valuable addition to the charitable Medical Institutions of London. The Alexandra Hospital for hip disease was opened to meet that need, and has treated many with that terrible ailment, many of the patients coming from other hospitals. The hospital until a few months ago consisted of four old houses dating as far back as the time of Queen Anne. In consequence of their unsanitary condition they were unanimously condemned by the medical officers, and the committee have consequently been absolutely compelled to build a new hospital ; for this purpose they still require £5,000. The Secretary, Alexandra Hospital, Queen Square, Bloomsbury, W.C., will be glad to supply full particulars.

Rev. T. E. Westerdale.



No such series of gatherings as that held in London last week in connection with the Convention of the Wesleyan Methodists of the three London districts could have been successfully undertaken except after enormous organisation and wise arrangement. The meetings were for office-bearers in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and in order to carry out the president's instructions, it was necessary that personal invitations should be sent to some 20,000 Methodists; the grand total of ministers and office-bearers of various grades in the London district being 27,098. It will be readily conceived that the wonderful gatherings of the week, therefore, were not held without entailing great labour upon the secretaries of the Convention. It is, indeed, well that in the present pastor of Wesley's Chapel, City Road, the president of the Conference found the man most eminently fitted to undertake any task of elaborate organisation. Rev. Jabez Ingram and Mr. Wm. Hedges have been associated with Rev. T. E. Westerdale in the secretaryship of the Convention, but the lion's share of thought and toil has fallen naturally to the untiring and irrepressible superintendent of the first circuit in Wesleyan Methodism.

During the historic services held last year at the Dedication of Wesley's House, the Right Hon. H. H. Fowler, M.P., said with perfect truth that Mr. Westerdale had a marvellous genius for organisation and a marvellous genius for begging, and added, "My impression is that if we could go back to mediæval times he would be a general of some order of mendicant friars." Certainly few men have seen more remarkable triumphs in the raising of money for religious purposes. He was the senior secretary of the fund of £10,000, raised at the centenary of the death of John Wesley; for the renovation of Wesley's Chapel, and it is fitting that during his superintendency of the City Road Circuit, into which he entered at the Conference of 1897, he should rejoice to see Wesley's Chapel and House and the City Road Circuit freed from every encumbrance. Thus are the conditions created for the increasing success of the spiritual work identified with the old sanctuary, held in veneration by millions of Methodists throughout the world.

The story of the settlement and endowment of Wesley's House as a Methodist institution for the residence of Christian workers is worth recording. Until 1897, Wesley's House continued to be the residence of one of the ministers of the City Road Circuit, but in June of that year the circuit quarterly meeting decided upon the removal of the second minister, then resident in Wesley's House, to a more conveniently situated house amongst the people of whom he was the pastor. Thus the old house ceased to be a ministerial residence. Mr. Westerdale has described how he felt at first pained and humbled that the quarterly meeting had turned its back upon that famous house. But his sorrow was soon turned into joy as he conceived and at length successfully carried out the present scheme, which involved the raising of £10,151.

By this means all debts were liquidated on Wesley's chapel; Wesley's House was renovated and fitted for the new purposes to which it is henceforth dedicated; and an endowment of £5,000 settled upon the House and the work of God in connection with Wesley's chapel. The three rooms on the first floor of the house, known as Wesley's rooms, in one of which he died, and in another of which he wrote many of his sermons and appeals, are to be set aside in perpetuity for the reception of Wesley's relics and documents. The rest of the house is to be used as a residence for sisters, or other selected Christian workers, whose whole time may be given to the help and comfort of the poor of the neighbourhood. In this respect, the old house is being restored to its original purpose, for, as Dr. Rigg has pointed out, it was used by Wesley himself as a Presbytery, where his helpers might reside while they sought to permeate London with their teaching.

Mr. Westerdale signalised the accomplishment of these designs by a memorable series of services in Wesley's Chapel. Representatives of many Churches joined in paying their tribute to the work of Wesley and "the people called Methodists." Dr. Parker and Dr. Pierson as preachers represented the Old and New World. Archdeacon Farrar gave fresh evidence of his catholicity of spirit in an eloquent speech, while Dr. Clifford, Dr. Monro Gibson, Dr. Horton, and Mr. Reader Harris brought brotherly greetings. The off-shoots of Methodism had their spokesmen, and distinguished laymen like the Right Hon. H. H. Fowler, M.P., Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., and Sir Clarence Smith, all of whom had lived in Wesley's House as the sons of ministers resident in the City Road Circuit, recalled the days of boyhood, and spoke of the mission of the Church of their fathers.

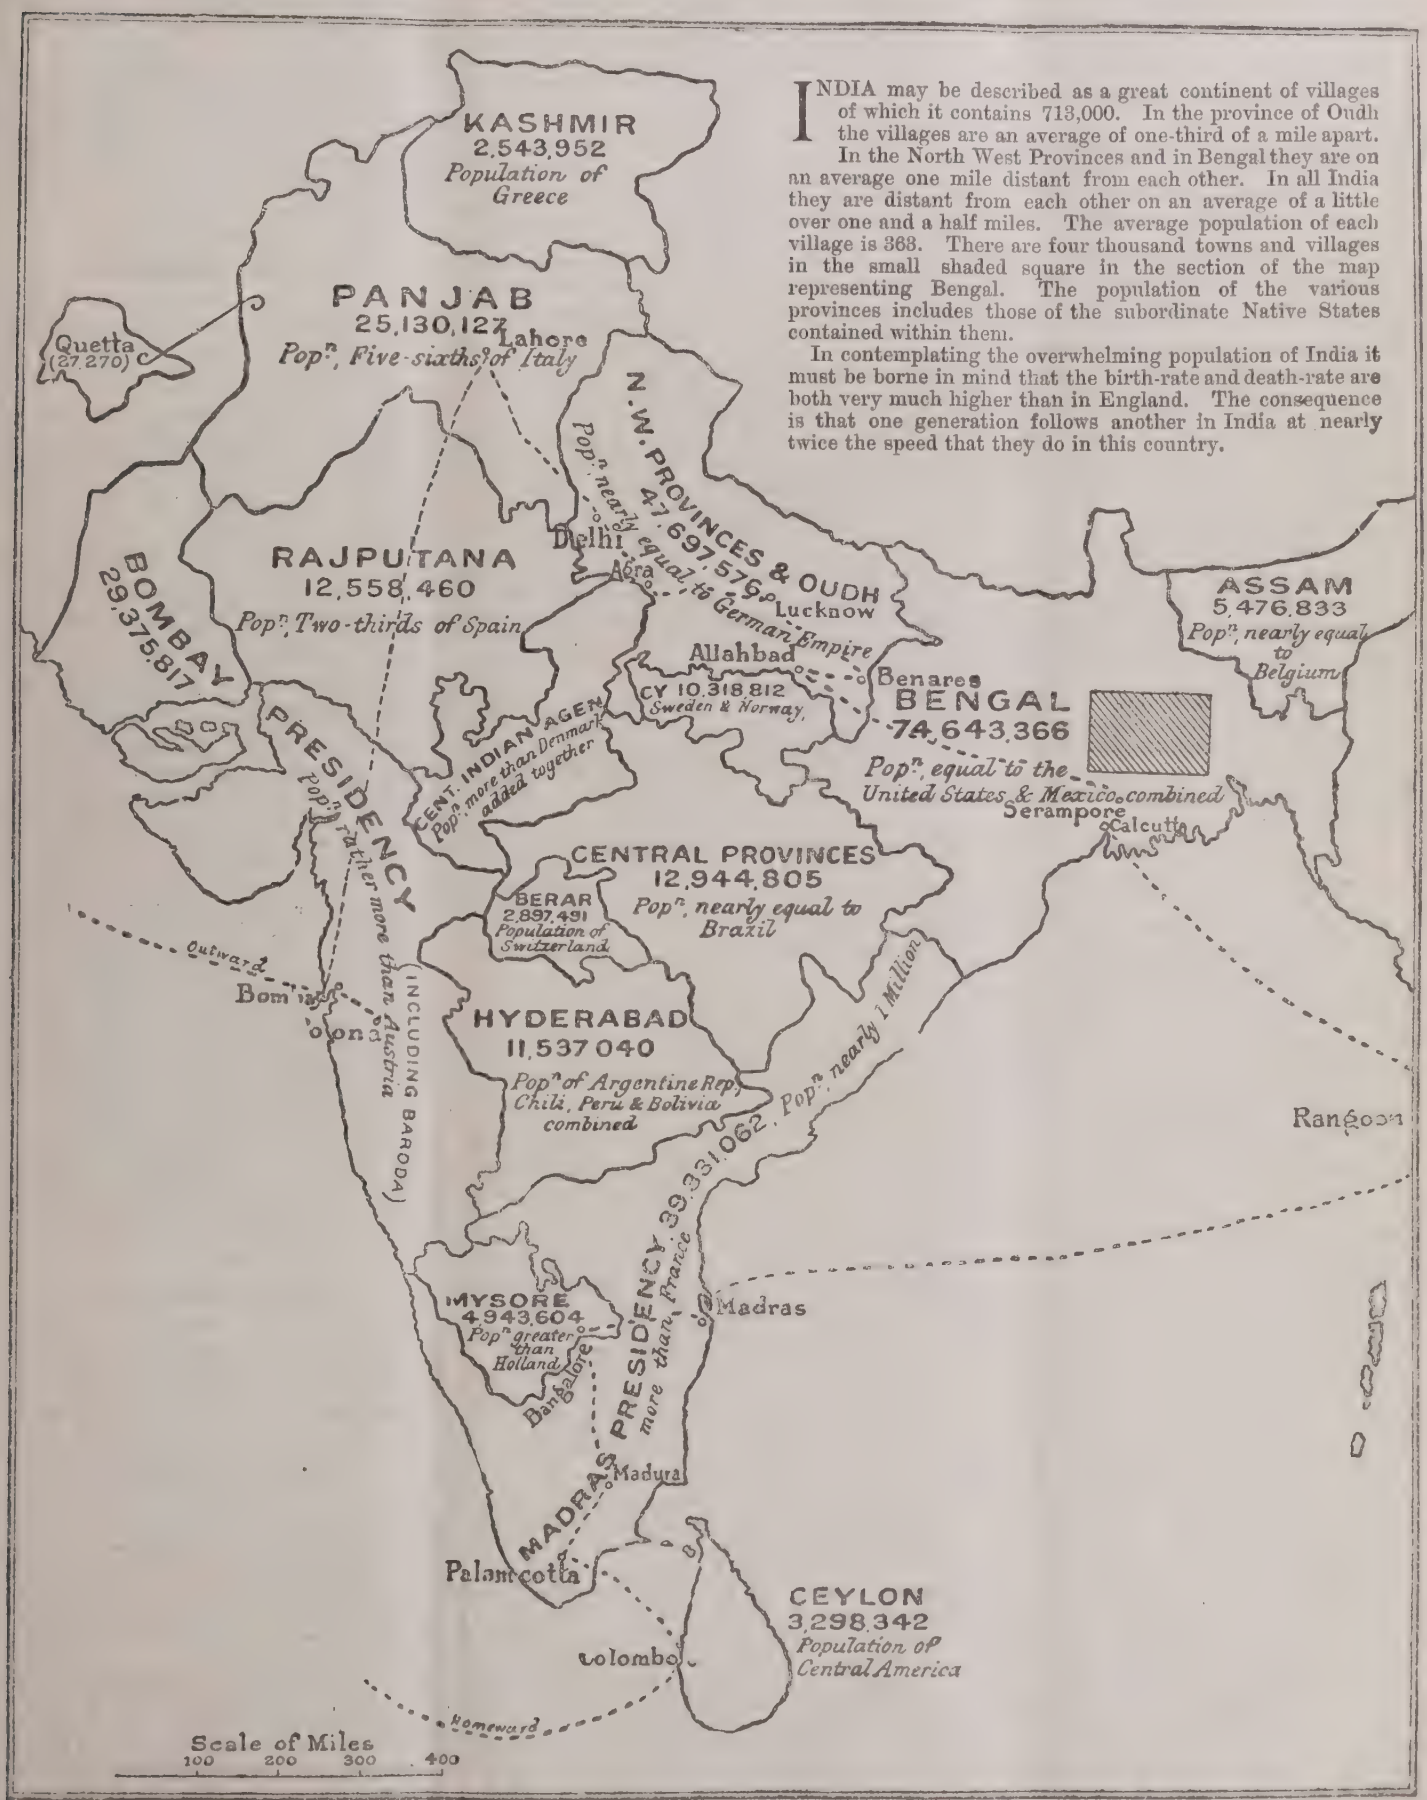
From a photograph by Messrs. Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.

Most remarkable perhaps was the day of Dedication, when beginning at five in the morning with a meeting for prayer, the live-long day was filled with services of praise and thanksgiving. Not content with his triumph in regard to Wesley's House, Mr. Westerdale has since appealed for £1,000 to celebrate the centenary of the Radnor Street Schools—the first Methodist Sunday School established in the metropolis. More than the amount named was raised for the liquidation of a debt of £700 and the renovation of the buildings. These Schools, with 130 voluntary workers, and with 3,000 children and adults in attendance at one or other of the meetings every week all the year round, and including a ragged school of 1,050 children, and a department for 100 cripples, were set free from every incumbrance, and enabled to achieve their great work freely.

Space indeed fails to tell of Mr. Westerdale's achievements, or reference might be made to his work in the Birmingham (Bristol Road) circuit. He spent six years in the great Midland city, and to him belongs the honour of moving in the Birmingham Methodist Council the resolution which led to the holding of the great simultaneous mission which, in turn, led to hundreds of souls being added to the Church of Christ in that city. Mr. Westerdale is in the prime of life, having entered the ministry in 1875, and his circuits in which he has travelled have been, with one exception, confined to London and Birmingham. The next Conference will be held in Wesley's Chapel, and his brethren may be expected to show their sense of Mr. Westerdale's unparalleled achievements by electing him as a member of the Legal Hundred, an honour not often given to so young a minister.

Medical Missions.

THE annual meeting of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society took place last week in the Royal Hotel, Edinburgh, Professor Grainger Stewart presiding. There was a large attendance. The Chairman said they had good reason to be encouraged that so much hold has been taken by the medical missionary movement, and that the missionary spirit is now so strong amongst the youth of the country.



In their report for 1898 (submitted by Dr. Fry) the directors stated that an exceptionally large number of their students had received appointments as medical missionaries abroad. The death-rate, however, among former students in the foreign field had been unusually large, three of them having died at their posts in Africa. In consequence of increased contributions, combined with the strictest economy, there had seldom been so favourable a year as regarded finance. The directors have decided that it would be desirable to designate the training institution of the society in the future as "The Medical Mission College," with its halls of residence at the Miller Memorial in George Square, and the Livingstone Memorial in the Cowgate. The beneficent and religious work carried on by all medical missions has received daily practical illustration in the Cowgate. What the condition there would be without the Christian effort and sympathy exemplified by the Medical Mission, and other agencies at work for the temporal, moral, and spiritual uplifting of the people, the mind shrinks from picturing.

Dr. Cousland, Swatow, urged the need for a Christian Medical College in China, and said he could not imagine a greater or more useful work for this Society to take up. Dr. Datta, of Northern India, also spoke.

Pandita Ramabai writes of the progress of the work in her hands at Kedgdon, Poona District, India. She says:—"The girls from the Central India famine districts are making progress in their studies, and are greatly improved in personal appearance. Pray that they may be blessed with all spiritual blessings."

The West Indian Hurricane.—A memorial was recently addressed to Mr. Chamberlain, as Colonial Secretary, from the Wesleyan Methodists of St. Vincent, setting forth the relation of the Methodist Church to the moral and religious welfare of the people of that island, and asking for Imperial assistance under an overwhelming calamity, the destroyed and damaged church properties entailing a loss of upwards of £12,000. The memorial has had the strong support of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. In response, Mr. Chamberlain expresses deep sympathy with the Wesleyan Mission in the losses sustained. The Government, he says, would give some assistance towards the repair of the schools, but of the £53,000 contributed for the distress from Imperial and voluntary sources, £3,000 alone is available for the restoration of church property; of this, Wesleyans receive £1,000.

INDIA AND ITS MILLIONS.

INDIA may be described as a great continent of villages of which it contains 713,000. In the province of Oudh the villages are an average of one-third of a mile apart. In the North West Provinces and in Bengal they are on an average one mile distant from each other. In all India they are distant from each other on an average of a little over one and a half miles. The average population of each village is 368. There are four thousand towns and villages in the small shaded square in the section of the map representing Bengal. The population of the various provinces includes those of the subordinate Native States contained within them.

In contemplating the overwhelming population of India it must be borne in mind that the birth-rate and death-rate are both very much higher than in England. The consequence is that one generation follows another in India at nearly twice the speed that they do in this country.

This outline Map given on this page has been prepared with the view of showing the comparative vastness of our great Indian Dependency and its consequent claims on the attention of the Christian churches at home. Allowing for the natural increase since the last census in 1891, the estimated population of India will now be fully 300,000,000. The material and spiritual needs of this vast company are beyond conception. Some 40,000,000 of the people are said to exist on one scanty meal a day. There are only 2,000,000 professed Christians. As noted elsewhere on this page there are over 700,000 villages dotted at short intervals all over the Empire, and the Protestant missionary force in the country represents only one worker to 400 villages. These simple facts are eloquent as to the need for the Gospel message.

A secondary but yet substantial interest attaches to the map as showing, by a dotted line, the present itinerary of Rev. F. B. Meyer to some of the leading centres. At the time of publication Mr. Meyer will probably be voyaging from Calcutta to Rangoon.

Other Lands.

Round About Bombay.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

WE have seen this great city—the first in India, according to size and population; the second in the Empire. It is a marvellous spectacle, difficult to describe.

The city was situated originally on five islands, but the watery divisions are not easy to discover. It has one of the noblest natural harbours in the world, where navies could ride at anchor without incommoding each other; and which, in turn, is separated by a long promontory from a lovely sweep of shore, curving northwards to the Malabar Hill and the Governor's house. Here the Parsees may be seen, as the sun's disc dips below the horizon, stretching out their hands and prostrating themselves in prayer.

Along the seashore is the "Maidan," or esplanade, where Bombay society gathers to hear the band and enjoy the cool sea breeze after the sultry heat of the day. English, Hindoos, Parsees, and Mohammedans of the upper and wealthier classes may be seen here in their conveyances, on the ubiquitous bicycle, or at lawn tennis. One of the fairest sights I have ever witnessed was moonrise over the harbour, and moonlight across the glistening waters, broken only by the dark outline of a huge ocean steamer.

They say that you may meet in Bombay representatives of

A HUNDRED DIFFERENT NATIONALITIES.

The eye is bewildered by the torrent of human life which pours through the streets—Japs, Chinese, Jews; Parsees, with their mitre-like hats and their white linen dresses; Mohammedans, distinguished by their beards and linen trousers; natives, with no covering for their mahogany bodies, but the merest waist-cloth; low caste women, erect, slender, gracefully swathed, with a burden on the head and a child on the hips; swarms of children, as often as not with only the sacred cord around the waist. There is a Parsee funeral, the body borne first on a light framework, the men following behind, each couple holding a white handkerchief between them—sign of a common grief. Yonder is a group of snake-charmers and conjurers, performing the wonderful growth and flowering of a plant apparently out of nothing. These are students from the Government College; and these native soldiers; and these, again, Eurasians, with a mingling of native and English blood in them, who are so largely employed in the great railway station (one of the finest in the world), and in other offices.

One of the most ghastly spectacles in Bombay is the Hindoo burning-ghats, where the dead are cremated. It is in the midst of the city, near the shore. We obtain an order and visit it. It is a vast enclosure, and necessarily so, especially when hundreds are dying from plague. See those long branches of trees, piled eight of them together, which are almost burnt through; amidst them a body was placed, and has already been reduced to white ash. Now another party comes bringing a corpse, with the low chant, "Ram is great." See, it is placed amid similar branches held together by four upright staves, and presently the eldest son, with many ceremonies, will set light to the wood. It is for the performance of this act that the Hindoo specially desires a son. At night, as we drive past the long wall, we are again arrested by the lurid glare flung up to the sky. Many bodies are being consumed, and according to Hindoo notions souls are starting on their long journey, for which supplies of food have to be provided.

But even more ghastly is the Parsee method of disposing of the dead. We drive out of the city toward Malabar Hill, an exquisitely beautiful road, lined with tropical vegetation on either side, and climbing upwards along a hilly ridge, which commands bay, and harbour—immediately beneath us, a perfect forest of waving palms; beyond, the Free Church College and other fine buildings; and beyond these, the promontory on the end of which is the Bowen Memorial Church; and on the further side, the harbour, to the mountains in the background.

At the commencement of this drive, on the right are the Towers of Silence, standing in a walled enclosure; the ground within is laid out with walks and flower-beds, like one of our English cemeteries. We enter, ascend a little, traverse a broad pathway for a few yards, and catch sight of two of the five circular towers of white granite, vast, imposing, gloomy, on the rim of each of which a crowd of hungry vultures is waiting patiently. As soon, however, as a funeral procession enters the gates of the enclosure they become greatly excited. The mourners wait near the entrance in prayer; the bearers carry the remains to one of these stone towers; place them, naked, in one of the niches, open to heaven, which, in three concentric rows, slope slightly towards the well in the centre—the outer row for males, the next for females, the innermost for children. As they retire, the vultures settle to their task, and before long the bones only are left, which bleach in the sun, until the rains sweep them into the central well, the water from which is carefully deodorised and filtered before it is permitted to enter the ground.

To see that long circular group of expectant tawny vultures awaiting their feast is to add an unforgettable picture to the long gallery of memory. But since the Parsees hold as sacred the four elements of fire, water, air, and earth, they protest that there is no way of disposing of the dead, save by consigning the task to these birds of prey. And the guide told us that scientific men have not been able to discover signs of the plague in the stomach or entrails of the birds which have fed on the plague-stricken. But let us turn to a less repellent scene, in the early morning, with its teeming crowds. Perhaps four thousand people are here, chattering, crying their goods, discussing their affairs. Low caste women, who have carried the huge baskets of native produce into the market, careful to exhibit their anklets and rings of silver; men with every description of turban, and many with the lines across the forehead which denote devotees of Siva and Vishnu; young lads and girls, attracting customers, or calling their wares. This is the fish market, where you see many strange forms of life, unfamiliar to European eyes. This the meat market. This, again, the market for vegetables, fruit, and flowers, and a friend explains the nature and gives the name of many kinds which the native gardens supply, but which are not found on any hotel menu.

Now we turn into the bird department; parrots, canaries, love-birds, Java sparrows, the mongoose, which kills great serpents, monkeys, squirrels, a black parrot, and many birds and animals are here, which are wonderful and strange. Then back through the native town, with its tall, irregular houses, the tiny stalls, in which the salesmen sit behind their wares; the heavy bullock-carts lumbering through the streets; the gharis and victorias, their drivers shouting at the foot passengers, for there are no side walks. How often the inquiry rises to our hearts, as we traverse the streets of this great heathen city: Can these bones live?—followed by the prayer to the Divine Spirit that He should breathe on them.

Great fortunes are being made here. There are some 200 cotton mills, besides other industries; and the wealthy Parsees especially have given lasting evidence of their munificent liberality in rearing hospitals, infirmaries, and other philanthropic buildings. This bungalow, amid its palms and gardens, is the Y.M.C.A. central building; and at a distance of ten minutes' walk, the comfortable new Free Church; and not far away is the Cathedral, where the Bishop of Bombay ministers during his three months' residence. We preach in the Baptist and Methodist and Presbyterian Churches, visit the American Congregational Mission, enjoy the hospitality of the Church Missionary Society Compound, speak in the Free Church College to the conference of native Christians, are welcomed by the Missionary Conference, embracing the representatives of all the societies, visit the student settlement, address audiences that stir our hearts in the great central hall, and everywhere meet the same spirit of love and welcome and blessed unity in the spirit, the best augury of coming blessing.

On the Zambesi.

THE latest circular of the Zambesi Industrial Mission is very interesting reading. Among the other items is the following by Mr. Oswald:—

"The Lord is undoubtedly in our midst, and is working his own work amongst us. He has blessed our coffee, and given us a larger crop than we expected at the beginning of the season, and the plantations give promise of a much heavier crop next year.

"But what is still more encouraging, and a greater cause for rejoicing, is the fact that souls are being born again. You will have heard of the awakening at Mitsidi, how that a large number sought and found the way of life. At the end of the special meetings, which were held in the new church, I counted thirty who had been personally dealt with, and who professed to have come to Jesus. Of that number, none but our Father knows how many are genuine converts. That some are seeking to walk in the narrow way is certain. There is a change in their faces and in their ways. Since then several others have been gathered in.

"One evening, while Mr. Storey and I were having a little informal service at one of the Angoni huts, a man interrupted me while I was speaking, and said he wanted to know how to be saved. When we had finished, I had some conversation with him and found that he was in real earnest. He said that his heart trembled at the thought of his sins. He knew that Jesus died because of his sins, but could not understand how his death availed for him. I managed to explain to him, and I believe that he went away a saved soul.

"Only last week we had news that nine had been baptised in Angoniland, at Dumbole Station. These are signs that God is working amongst us, and ought to make us press forward, in his strength, to greater victories."

India's Aborigines.

FROM Yellandu for 400 miles to the north-east are found scattered the Kois, numbering about 400,000 souls. Except by the C.M.S. at Dummigudum and by ourselves here, we have no knowledge of any other efforts having been made to Christianise this interesting and accessible people. Our C.M.S. friends do not feel that their efforts have been very successful, and for several years we have toiled here in hopes of fruit that we almost began to fear would never come. But in the last twelve months we have been able to baptise upwards of twenty Kois, and while the break is not yet all we would like to see it yet we are greatly encouraged.

Our work at Yellandu is almost wholly among this people, and we are anxious to push out among them to more distant parts. They are widely scattered in small villages, and both men and women are most accessible to our preachers. Both here and at the other end of the field at Jagdalpur Bastar State we have orphans and workers in training for this work.

Are there not among your readers some friends of the Aborigine? The workers we send out cost on the average about one pound sterling per month. I shall be glad to hear from any friend of these people who may see these lines. C. B. Ward.

Vigilance Work in Germany.

A CONFERENCE was recently held at 10, Bruderstrasse, Berlin, the residence of Baron Goltz, second President of the Evangelical Church of Prussia, to hear an address from Mr. W. A. Coote, of the National Vigilance Association, on the international work being done by the Association. Countess Keller, Lady-in-Waiting to the Empress, and Count Keller, Chamberlain to Her Majesty, were in attendance by express desire, and were charged to express Her Majesty's interest in, and sympathy with, the effort the Association was making for the better protection of young women of all nationalities. Count Bernstorff occupied the chair. Herr von Dirksen, from the Foreign Office, and Herr von Loeberell represented the police.

Mr. Coote explained that the members of his committee were very anxious to do something to put a stop to the white slave traffic, which had for so long been carried on in different countries of Europe. They intended holding an International Conference in London, in June, to which delegates from all the countries in Europe would be invited to discuss the question of the white slave traffic, and to adopt measures for obtaining from the European Governments an international law dealing with the men who carry on this shameful business. It would be desirable to form a small committee of workers in Berlin, who, for the next five months, would gather all the statistics, from official and other sources, bearing on this question. As this would be done by a committee in each capital of Europe, it was anticipated that the three days' conference in June would be both interesting and fruitful of results. The speaker also mentioned that he had already had interviews in Holland with the Dutch Premier and the Foreign Secretary, who both expressed their sympathy with the object of the conference, and a Dutch committee had been formed, and was now at work on the subject.

Pastor Burckhardt followed, expressing great sympathy with the object of Mr. Coote's visit, and stating his readiness to do all that he possibly could to assist in bringing the conference to a successful issue. He felt sure that the Church of Prussia would be heartily with the movement. Baron Goltz said he was thankful for the great work which they were doing in Germany for the protection of young women, but considered that much more remained to be done; and he welcomed the idea of making a special effort to collect all information possible. He believed the result of the International Conference would be the better protection of young women of all nationalities, a consummation for which they all earnestly prayed.

Herr von Dirksen said the Government were much interested in the question, and were prepared to do whatever they could to help forward so worthy a movement.

A discussion ensued, and it was finally resolved to form a committee to gather statistics and to arrange for delegates from all parts of Germany to be present at the June conference.

Young Women in Paris.

MAY I ask your readers' interest in the British and American Mission Homes for English girls in Paris, founded by Miss Ada Leigh? The grave necessity for these homes for our working girls in a city like Paris is well known, and funds are sorely needed to carry on the work.

I spent a fortnight at one of the Homes, and can testify to the splendid way they are managed, and to the thorough appreciation the girls have for the comfort and kindness they receive in these real homes in a foreign land. They have been the means of saving many of our girls from ruin. All the ladies who carry on the work in Paris are hon. workers, giving their time, services, and money for love of the work and for their Master's sake. The Secretary, Miss Florence Wilkinson, 45, Eastbourne Terrace, Hyde Park, W., will be pleased to give further information.

Anglo-Indian Evangelisation.

IN company with Mr. Hewison, of the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society, I left Bombay to take the Sabbath services in the station of Lanaoli. We reached our destination, eighty miles, in three hours fifteen minutes—not bad running for a line that rises 2,200 feet in about an hour! No one was there to meet or greet us, so we had to hunt up some of the people who could tell us of the arrangements for services.

On the Sabbath morning Mr. Hewison and I went to the children's services at the chapel before breakfast and had a most enjoyable time with the bairns. There were about forty present, with several lady teachers, and the interest and attention were exemplary. At the evening service, at 6.30 p.m., the people gathered early in the little chapel, and we had a few hymns. By the time we commenced the service about seventy or eighty people had gathered, a fair proportion of men among them. They joined heartily in the singing, and listened with marked attention to a solo and the brief address which followed. It was unlike a home audience; there was none of that wearied, bored indifference that so often marks a gathering of people who have listened again and again to the same story. After the service several came forward, some with eyes soft with feeling, and spoke in such a way as showed that the love of Christ was there. I felt very glad to have been privileged to speak and sing in such a service.

South America.

IN a recent tour Emilio Olsson, of the Christian Alliance Mission, travelled 1,800 miles up the La Plata, Parana, and Paraquay Rivers to Corumba, presenting the Scriptures to high and low, and speaking for the Master. A part of Bolivia was entered. Suffering much from the great heat and want of water, Senor Olsson reached San José, the capital of the Indian province of Chiquitos. Many of the Indians understand Spanish, and a considerable number of the Cholos (half-castes) can also read it. The people came asking him for "Books of God."

The priest of the district had been summoned to Santa Cruz to answer charges against him, so the Lord's message had free access to the people's homes and to many of their hearts. The governor was much interested, and sold Olsson three fresh mules for his journey of 100 miles across a waterless desert, and received thankfully a copy of the New Testament. Books were left with a native convert, who will carry on the work.

Distress in Oroomiah.

WRITING from Oroomiah, Persia, on December 18, Rev. B. W. Labaree says:—

"The distress here is getting to be very great. We are overwhelmed with requests for aid which we are unable to meet. Wheat is still from 5s. to 7s. a bushel, and there is little prospect of its becoming cheaper. A common day-labourer must work from fourteen to eighteen days to earn enough money with which to buy a bushel of grain. Potatoes are not so expensive, and we had borrowed quite a sum with which to buy potatoes. These we are distributing to the most needy cases.

"Our appeals have been made in the name of all who were driven from Turkey, and we have made no difference in the race of those to whom we gave aid. Nestorians are more numerous, but we found more pleasure in giving to the Armenians, for they showed more gratitude than the Nestorians."

Contributions towards the relief of these distressed people will be received by Mr. E. W. Brooks, Duvals, Grays, Essex.

The Bible in Central America.

IN the year 1889 Mr. F. de P. Castells, a Protestant Spaniard, was sent by the British and Foreign Bible Society to try to establish a Bible depôt in Manila. He was put in prison, and only set free on condition that he should leave the Philippines. After working for the Society in Anam, he fell ill and had to return to England. He was then sent to circulate the Scriptures among Spanish-speaking people in some of the islands in the West Indies and in Central America. He has worked successfully there for six years, and is now in England again for a short furlough.

Mr. Castells has enabled the Society to get St. Mark's Gospel put into the language of the Quiché Indians of Guatemala, and to put the first edition of a thousand copies into circulation among them.

In a difficult and wide field, where ignorance and Roman intolerance of the open Bible have to be faced, but which seems opening up to gold-miners, canal diggers, and railway makers, the committee of the Bible Society are anxious to secure attention to the book and attract more to read it, and they ask others to assist Mr. Castells in his efforts to achieve this.

John Sharp, Secretary.
Bible House, 146, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

In a communication to ourselves Mr. Castells desires to appeal to our readers for a workable phonograph, by means of which he believes selections from Scripture could be recited to large audiences in Spanish and in any aboriginal language in a way that would create a deep impression on the minds of the people. Mr. Castells says this plan has been successfully tested. The cost of a proper machine, including transportation expenses, duty, &c., would be £55.

Mr. Castells may be addressed, 101, London Road, St. Albans, Herts.

Jungle Tribes Mission.

THIS Mission, commenced about eight years ago, has for its object the evangelisation of the Bheels and other jungle tribes who inhabit the country lying to the east of Gujerat in India. Already four missionaries have been sent out. Considerable progress has been made; a couple of head stations, and two out-stations have been opened; and five or six day and Sabbath-schools established. Preaching tours are made regularly through the district, when the message of salvation is proclaimed to thousands; tracts and Scripture portions are circulated. In addition, an orphanage has been established for famine children.

The first baptism in connection with the Mission took place in Jhalod, Panch Mahals, last March, when a young Bheel called Narsingh boldly professed his faith in the Lord Jesus. The latest news to hand is very hopeful, a number of Bheels having asked for baptism.

The opening of a third station is at present under consideration. This would entail a very increased outlay, and at the present moment the Mission is being hampered by want of funds. The honorary secretary is Rev. Henry Montgomery, Upper Crescent, Belfast.

Holywood, Ireland. G. W. Blair.

Indian Christian Realm.—Nurses C. Brodie and Landor are sailing for India, under the auspices of the Indian Christian Realm Mission. Mr. Jai Bhai (A. S. Paynter), the leader of the mission, who is now in England, asks for help towards their passage money. Interesting news from India tells of thirty converted Bheels gathering at one of the mission stations on Christmas Day.

Salvation Army Century Scheme.—In view of the near approach of General Booth's seventieth birthday, the aims of the Army's recently launched scheme have been fixed in seventies. The chief feature is an effort to add "70,000 new soldiers and recruits to the Salvation Army rolls throughout the world, or one thousand for each year of the General's life." A similar increase in the number of junior soldiers, in the circulation of papers and magazines, and in the number of officers is to be aimed at. In order to finance the scheme, the sum of £70,000 is to be raised. General Booth writes to the Army—"I ask for the scheme your affectionate co-operation. Every man must do his share, and that share must be measured by each man's ability."

Wesleyans in Conference.

LAST week a great district Convention, arranged by the three London Synods of the Wesleyan community, was held in the metropolis. The proceedings extended from Monday evening to Thursday evening, and the event was altogether considered by its promoters to be an undoubted success. The attendances were very large, while a warm and earnest spirit characterised the devotions and addresses.

The Convention began by a sermon on Monday evening in Wesley's Chapel, City Road, by the President of the Conference, Rev. H. Price Hughes. The discourse was an eloquent plea for the essential altruism of the Christian life. The Conventions now being held and the Century Fund were declared by the preacher to be a combined and vigorous protest against selfishness in the Church. The reconsecration of all the members, the laying on God's altar of a million guineas, and the setting to work to save others, is the programme of Methodism to-day. London is the greatest mission field in the world, and what is done in it re-echoes to the ends of the world. A very pressing appeal was made to all to give themselves anew wholly to God for his service.

A unique feature of the Convention was an

in Wesley's Chapel, extending without break for fifteen hours, from 6 a.m. on Tuesday to 9 p.m. Mr. Price Hughes presided during the first and last hours, and thirteen other well-known ministers took turns in giving brief addresses during the day. The Methodist Recorder says of the day's services:—"At no point was there any lack of prayer-leaders, and all the petitions we heard were marked by both point and power. Each of the presiding ministers gave a brief address, and the President wound up the series with a forceful utterance on the duty of joyousness in the Christian life. The whole day was a 'season of grace and sweet delight,' and was sufficient, in itself, to make the London Convention memorable in Methodist history."

A ministerial session of the Conference took place in Wesley's Chapel on Wednesday morning, when the President gave some introductory words, laying stress on the power of the pastors to help or mar the work of the Church, and on the need of such sympathy and help as come from prayer and mutual counsel.

The venerable Dr. E. E. Jenkins spoke beautifully and impressively on "The Faith of the Minister." Their learning, he said, would present them with many subsidiary helps, but their real power came from an intimate walk with Christ. For all the recurring needs of their work they would find a perpetual fountain of refreshment in the fact that their friendship with Jesus Christ is founded, not only on love, but in identity of work. The preaching of sin, repentance, and justification by faith was a feature of the first Methodist revival, and it must be the feature of the new revival that they sought to-day.

Another prepared address was given by Rev. J. H. Goodman on "Moral Dangers of the Ministry." He made a telling point in warning his fellow pastors against irritability because of the many and varied calls made on time, tact and temper. Intellectual indolence and restlessness were other evils to which the itinerant system exposed them. A spiritual and personal conversation followed, and the morning was one "of singular power and refreshment."

Class leaders had a session to themselves on Wednesday afternoon, when the chapel was densely crowded. A practical and experimental paper by Mrs. Price Hughes on the work of the class meeting was read by her husband. Mr. J. Vanner followed with a paper on "Christian Fellowship," which can only be secured through the linking of souls by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. The class-meeting is, or should be, a means of cultivating this fellowship. The need of prayerful study of the Bible was emphasised. A third paper by Mr. A. Bate was on "Christian Experience in Relation to the Success of the Class-Meeting."

At a large assembly in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening the duties and responsibilities of trustees, stewards, and musical conductors were considered. A high tone marked the utterances.

On Thursday morning the Convention was resumed at Wesley's Chapel. The session was for ministers only, over 300 being present. Rev. W. L. Watkinson gave an able address on "Preaching to the People." In the conversation which followed, the President expressed his astonishment and alarm that the practice of reading sermons was on the increase. He would not be a party to the ordination of any junior minister who habitually used his manuscript in the pulpit. More attention must be paid to this in their ministerial colleges. On the suggestion of the President, a message of sympathy with Dr. Joseph Parker on the (then) serious illness of his wife was sent to the City Temple.

The final and by far the largest session in connection with the Convention was held in the evening at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. It was devoted to the interests of Sunday-schools, Wesley Guild, Band of Hope and Temperance work. As 12,720 officers were eligible to attend, it was found necessary to have a second session at Great Queen Street Chapel, Holborn, where Rev. C. H. Kelly presided. At St. James's Hall Rev. R. Culley delivered an able address on "Methodist Sunday-schools; the Conversion of the Scholars." He said that at the lowest estimate ten per cent., or 100,000, young people were leaving their Sunday-schools every year. In the three London districts they had 93,000 scholars in their schools, and of these 77,000 were not in their closer fellowship. He urged increased attention to this. Mr. J. Wesley Walker (Maidenhead), and Mr. J. Bamford Slack were the succeeding speakers.

The secretary to the Convention was Rev. T. E. Westerdale, of Wesley's Chapel, whose portrait appears on a previous page.

Y.M.C.A.

A PRACTICAL TESTIMONY.

A YOUNG man lived in one of the large cities of the United States, whose friends were anxious to induce him to attend the Presbyterian church in the city. The young man, however, had no such desire. One day a companion described to our young friend the pleasure of attending the exercises at the gymnasium of the Y.M.C.A. He went to see for himself. Thinking such physical exercise would be beneficial to him, as well as pleasant, he decided to join.

The following evening, after the exercises, his companion said to him, "Before we leave, we always go up to a little room and have a few minutes' prayer. Of course, you will come?" He went. One after another of the young fellows engaged in prayer, or spoke a few words. The whole proceedings were so new to him and so different to anything that he had even thought of that the next evening he went to the prayer meeting without an invitation, and before long was himself one of those to engage in prayer.

The uncle began to wonder how his nephew was succeeding, and also how he spent his evenings. Consequently, one night he entered the little room just as his nephew was praying aloud. He was greatly astonished, and could scarcely believe it was the same young fellow so great was the change in him. He soon became a successful Sunday-school teacher, and was afterwards elected superintendent of the school, and was greatly blessed in the work.

Some time after the minister was discussing with a friend the question as to whether the Y.M.C.A. were really a useful and helpful organisation, and expressed himself in these words—"For my part I do not think the Association does any real good." The friend to whom he was speaking replied by asking what he thought of his Sunday-school superintendent. The minister answered at once, "I cannot speak too highly of his character and efficiency." His friend then informed him that it was, humanly speaking, almost entirely owing to the Y.M.C.A. that he had the young man in his school and church, as the Association had been the means of his conversion through the gymnasium. Thus ended the minister's scepticism as to the usefulness of the Y.M.C.A.

NOTES.

The Bury (Lancs) Y.M.C.A., at a large and enthusiastic meeting of young men, has welcomed its new General Secretary, Mr. J. W. Pratt.

A large public meeting in the interests of the Y.M.C.A. was held last week at West Bromwich, under the presidency of Lord Kinnaird. Addresses were given by local friends and Mr. J. H. Putterill.

The annual meeting of the Beckenham Association, which was held in the Public Hall on January 25, under the presidency of Mr. C. E. Atkinson, was more than usually well attended, and was addressed by Mr. Alderman Belsey, Mr. E. F. Lawrence, and Mr. W. Hind-Smith.

The committee of the Central London Association have approved a proposal to form a Y.M.C.A. Company of the Volunteer Medical Staff Corps. The members of this corps are not only trained in ambulance work, but are prepared for giving assistance to wounded in the event of war.

The annual meeting of the Coventry Association held recently was largely attended. The speakers were Revs. W. R. Mowll and W. E. Blomfield. The report showed—Income, £400; expenditure, £426; membership, 550. All the religious agencies are doing good work. The association's outlook is very bright.

Following a successful mission amongst lads by Mr. J. Stentiford, Rev. E. J. Kennedy has conducted throughout the past week a special mission to men at Aldersgate Street. The gatherings throughout have been most encouraging, both in point of attendance and on account of the deep interest manifested.

Mr. M. H. Hodder presided, on January 24, over the annual meeting of the Ryde Y.M.C.A., which was held in the Town Hall. The report presented by the Honorary Secretary, Mr. W. Jacobs, showed a record of most valuable work, prominent in which was the Bible class, conducted by Mr. T. W. Morphey, which has an average attendance of between fifty and sixty young men. Part was taken in the meeting by local clergymen and ministers.

Delegates of Y.M.C.A.'s from towns in Lancashire, including Southport, Darwen, Blackpool, and Lancaster, assembled at Preston, on January 25, for a conference, having as its object the placing of the work in the last-mentioned centre on an improved footing. Suitable rooms have been taken in the heart of Preston, and the Mayor is giving his help towards raising a furnishing fund, so that they may be well adapted to the objects of the newly formed association.

In addition to its very large Sunday afternoon Bible Class for young men, the average attendance at which is now over 230, the Weston-super-Mare Y.M.C.A. is successfully maintaining a Sunday evening service for non-churchgoers. This is held in the gymnasium, and is usually attended by over four hundred persons. A Sunday-school Teacher's Preparation Class has an average attendance of from thirty-five to forty, and the Sunday night Social meeting is attended by rather more than this number.

The annual conversazione of the Manchester Y.M.C.A., which took place on January 24, brought together a very large gathering of friends and members. Addresses were given by the Revs. Dr. Moinet and W. H. Griffith Thomas (London), and Mr. W. H. Mills, of the National Council. A marked feature of the gathering was the very large preponderance in the audience of young men from eighteen to twenty-five years of age, whose presence afforded evidence of the hold the association maintains over large numbers of the class for whose special benefit the work is carried on.

Ratcliff Strangers' Rest.

THE well-known Strangers' Rest for Sailors in Ratcliff Highway has, at length, attained its majority, and meetings in token of the same were held on Friday last. Twenty-one years is a good slice of a man's life; and in this case it means more than would at first appear, for the years have been made up of weeks on every day of which Christian work has been in progress in the rooms of the Rest, 163, St. George's Street, E. Two anniversary meetings were held, one in the afternoon, a second in the evening. At the former the hall was crowded; the speakers being Mr. J. E. Mathieson (who presided), Mrs. Isabella Bishop, the renowned traveller, and Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of New Court Chapel. The importance of such work was made manifest, and the spirit in which it should be performed was indicated, in the light of God's love and Christ's compassion.

At the evening gathering Mr. D. C. Apperly presided, and in some opening words called attention to the variety and importance of Christian effort in East London—its effects upon the population, and its reflex influence upon workers who are there trained for service in other regions. Mr. J. T. Isaac, who has been secretary of the work since the beginning, followed with a statement which was listened to with peculiar interest. During the twenty-one years 15,330 meetings had been held, representing endeavours to bring the Gospel to bear upon sailors belonging to many nations; and great blessing had attended the efforts put forth. The report for the past twelve months also dealt with big figures; there had been 927 meetings, attended by 11,551 men of various nationalities. In addition to the ordinary collective work, there had been visits to seamen and others, preaching in the Highway, distribution of Gospel literature, and meetings for children.

After a word about the Zanzibar Rest, the workers of which (Mr. and Mrs. Knapman) are due home on furlough, and the desire to provide "a prophet's chamber" in the Ratcliff Rest, Mr. Isaac spoke on personal matters. When he recently intimated his intention to resign, it was in the hope that someone would come forward to take the work in hand. His interest was as deep as ever, but the claims of business stood in the way of his continuing to give to the work the attention which he had bestowed upon it during the past twenty-one years. However, as he was convinced that the Rest was still needed, he and Mrs. Isaac had resolved not to "abandon the ship," although they still hoped someone would come forward before the end of March.

A helpful address was delivered by Rev. Sydney J. Jones, of the East London Tabernacle. He recalled visits to the Rest in his college days, and, referring to the prayerful interest of Mr. Reginald Radcliffe in the work, said that the name of that good man had more than once been to him a spur to set prayer going. He could never read the pages of his biography without feeling that we have need more and more to pray for such wonderful outpourings of God's Spirit as Mr. Radcliffe witnessed. The saying is true that "God buries his workmen, but carries on his work;" whence it appears, and rightly so, that the work comes into our hands as God's, with his power, and his blessing, and his promise still attending it. A word of Christ's that was near Mr. Radcliffe's heart was, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." At the same time Satan said to his missionaries, "Go and suppress the Gospel." One way in which the Gospel is suppressed is when God's labourers question whether the Gospel should be preached to every creature; another way is when God's people preach to some creatures something other than the Gospel. In these days of social need and effort we must be careful to preach the Gospel first and always and to every creature; and "preaching" in the New Testament sense is more generally a work of simply telling out than of delivering set and elaborate discourses.

Miss Macpherson followed with interesting reminiscences of work in the Highway, recalling the visits of Reginald Radcliffe, Lady Beauchamp, and Lady Gainsborough, and naming the various efforts that have been launched in the neighbourhood for the temporal good and eternal salvation of sailors of all orders and nations, and for the rescue and protection of women and children. She spoke in warm terms of the devotion of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac, and suggested that the experience of the former should be utilised by his being set at liberty to organise and develop work in connection with Rests all over the world. This suggestion received the approving cheer of the assembly.

Rev. M. Darlow Sarjeant spoke briefly, and afterwards presided over a united Communion service. Of the sum of £200 required for repairs to the Rest, only £50 was subscribed; it is hoped that the full amount will soon be in hand, so that dilapidations may be made good.

London Work-Room Hands.

THE annual conversazione and meeting in connection with the mission effort on behalf of girls and young women employed in City work-rooms, which has its headquarters at "The Welcome," Aldersgate Street, was held on Thursday last in the adjacent Y.M.C.A. rooms.

Mr. M. H. Hodder, who presided, briefly alluded to the character and excellent results of the work; and Mrs. Fisher, whose name has been associated with the movement for over twenty years, sketched the chief features of the past year's labours. Meetings are held daily in many work-rooms to large and appreciative audiences, while at the familiar "Welcome" itself the helpful gatherings—some of a social and educative character, but all having a definite spiritual aim—are more than justified by their cheering results. Numbers of the young women converts have become members of churches, subsequently developing into devoted toilers in the home or foreign mission fields. Mr. A. Garstin bore testimony, as an employer, to the value of the efforts put forth, and several workers gave interesting accounts of their experiences. Special pathos attached to a branch which cares for aged women employed in bonnet making. Owing to the increasing opportunities for holding meetings, more honorary workers are urgently appealed for.

Travellers' Aid Society.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting in support of the objects of this society, established in the interests of girls and women, was held last week, by invitation, at the Speaker's House, Palace of Westminster. The Speaker of the House of Commons presided, and in opening the proceedings remarked that our complicated modern life brought its attendant social mischief for which new remedies had to be devised. The Travellers' Aid Society provides a remedy for one of those mischiefs. Probably it is a moderate estimate to say that for every dozen young women who in the days before railways and steamboats travelled great distances to cities and seaports there are now thousands, and those come mostly from the class least travelled and experienced, and therefore most frequently likely to be placed in circumstances of peril and difficulty. The object of the society is to safeguard such unprotected and inexperienced young women.

Lady Battersea addressed the meeting, giving an account more particularly of the labours carried on at the London Docks jointly by the society and the Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women. Since 1885, when the Jewish branch was started, between 3,000 and 4,000 girls had been materially assisted by the society. Dr. Collingridge, the chief of the port medical and sanitary authority, has testified to the remarkable improvement at the docks and landing-stairs in the suppression of the "runners," who before the advent of the society's agents, used to impose on poor Russian and German immigrants in every possible way. They would like to extend their attentions, as funds allow, to such ports as Liverpool, Hull, and Grimsby.

Lady Frances Balfour, president of the Society, spoke of the great need for protective work at the railway stations, notwithstanding the fact that they received the most cordial encouragement and assistance from the highest officials down to the humblest porter; indeed there are no people more desirous of seeing to the safety, moral and physical, of those who travel than the great railway companies. Their work was in no sense a rescue work, though it was impossible not to see that the necessity for such agencies constantly loomed in the background. The Society urgently needed more money, and especially an accession to their numbers of small regular subscribers. Mr. Jupp, for eighteen years stationmaster and deputy-stationmaster at Euston, testified from personal knowledge to the value of the work of the society.

The Open-Air Mission.

THE special New Year gathering of members and friends of this Mission, on Thursday evening last, proved a most profitable and inspiring occasion to the large company assembled in Exeter Lower Hall. More than 250 took tea, at the invitation of Rev. Barclay Fowell Buxton, and much pleasant intercourse and fellowship were enjoyed at the tables.

Afterwards the meeting, numbering nearly 400 workers and friends, was presided over by Mr. Charles Ernest Tritton, M.P. His opening address was a model exhortation to preach Christ in all his fulness and attractiveness, and was delivered with great spiritual fervour.

Madame Annie Ryall having delighted the audience by her spiritual singing, an address was delivered by the host of the evening, Rev. Barclay Fowell Buxton. Being on furlough from his missionary labours in Japan, where open-air preaching plays so great a part, his words were fragrant with missionary devotion and consecration. The thrilling stories he told of God's power in the conversion of some Japanese sinners will never be forgotten. The latter part of the address was on "Power for Service," and was delivered with marked unction.

Canon Girdlestone, Rev. George Turner, and Dr. John Gritton took part in prayer during the evening, and the Secretary, Mr. Frank Cockrem, made some remarks which showed great advance and remarkable blessing on the recent work of the Society. There is urgent need for still further extension and for yet more earnest prayer on behalf of this movement, which God has thus signally honoured and advanced.

Haven for Homeless Little Ones.

THE useful work on behalf of suffering and helpless children, carried on at Castle House, Walton-on-the-Hill, Surrey, has so developed that Mrs. Ransome Wallis, whose labours are devoted to conducting the institution, deems it very necessary to put the work on a firmer basis that merely a private enterprise.

To this end a few gentlemen have consented to form a General Council to guide the affairs of the work, while leaving detail to her management as hitherto. Messrs. D. C. Apperly, J. W. C. Fegan, and Wm. Hodson, with Miss Ritchie, Mr. and Mrs. Ransome Wallis, and others, will constitute the committee, Mr. Apperly being treasurer.

The children cared for have mostly come under the care of the Home under extremely sad circumstances. Many of the applications which are received every year contain stories of most cruel deception, and the reception of a babe enables its mother to obtain work and support both herself and the child. Nearly a hundred children are now being sheltered. The present need of the work is that Castle House and its grounds of eight acres should be purchased, the freehold property to be vested in trustees for the Haven for Homeless Little Ones.

Young People.

Pen-Pictures from Afar.

HOW very quickly the New Year is passing! We have come already to the first week of the second month. I hope very earnestly that your sympathy for heathen girls and boys, and your efforts to send the Gospel to them will grow more intense and active during the year—that each of you will do something definite week by week, or month by month, to show that you mean to be co-workers with Christ in saving the world. Oh! it is such an honour to share in any way in a work so splendid.

I have two pen-pictures for you this month. I mean brief stories, which my pen shall make as vivid as it can. Of course, they will relate to Foreign Missions. My first story is about

BEPIN AND THE BURNED BOOK.

As you will guess by his name, Bepin did not live in England. His home was away in a village in India. He had a friend, by name Atul, who went to a school kept by missionaries in a town a short distance off. At the time of which I am writing this boy had just come back for the holidays, bringing with him a Christian book. Bepin spied it at once, and asked what it was.

"It is a book the missionary gave me."

"Let me look at it," said Bepin.

Little Atul was far too much afraid of Bepin to refuse to give it up, so he handed him the Gospel.

Bepin turned over the leaves, and then threw it straight into the fire on which their food was cooking, saying:

"That is the best place for Christian books." Atul ran away, and left his companion watching the book burn. Only part of it caught alight, and it struck Bepin that it looked as though it was very nice printing.

It is a pity to burn such good print as that," he thought, "I think I had better look at it." So, suiting the action to the word, he snatched the burning book out of the fire, blew out the flames, and turned it over again.

Now came the crisis. His eye caught some words which he thought beautiful. He was like one arrested; there he stood reading on and on. Something in the volume seemed so new and strange. Reading the story of the life of Jesus for the first time, his heart was touched. He put the charred book safely away with the intention of giving to it careful study.

After a time he got a new copy, and not only read it himself but persuaded other young men in his village to read it too, and as they read, their ideas began to change. Soon they felt that it was no longer possible to lie and cheat as they did formerly, they longed more and more to grow like Jesus. . . . And if you went to India, and visited the right place, you might see—what? Bepin himself, with a crowd of dark-faced men and boys listening as he tells them of the great love of Jesus.

The book in its own silent way had preached to him so effectually that he was born again. A wonderful book is the Bible.

But I have met with something else. It is called:

A PREACHER IN A POT.

A curious place for a preacher, you will think. Preachers mostly speak from pulpits. This preacher of mine was a little thorny creeper that a missionary had brought from one of the hills near his Indian home, and its pulpit was a coarse little flower-pot. The sermon, however, was of more value than many of the long proper ones. It was short, too, and plain, and the preacher every day practised what he preached.

One day the missionary, thinking to cover up the coarse little pot, slipped a long tender shoot under the string by which it hung under the verandah of his house. He bent the shoot downwards and towards the window away from the sunshine. A few days after he saw that it had bent itself sharply upwards and outwards, and it said as plainly as possible, "I will grow upwards and towards the light, because God means me to grow that way."

Is not that the way God wishes every little boy and girl to grow? So, this little Indian preacher sends his short but practical sermon across the sea to you in England, and if you follow his advice and example, and always try to look at Jesus, the Light of the world—to look out and up to Him—who is the Sun of Righteousness, you, like the creeper, will grow beautiful, be a joy and help to others, and will please your Father Who is in heaven. I am sure you cannot help seeing that God means you to grow upward toward the things that are lovely and good—not downwards in the direction of what is dark and sinful. It must be, remember, throughout the whole of this year: "Looking," off and up, "unto Jesus."

WORD-PICTURES.

Most children are fond of pictures. I once knew some brothers and sisters who went to school in a small country town.

When twelve o'clock struck and lessons were over, it was their custom to run across the street and see if there were any new pictures in the printer's window. From thence they hurried home, and their mother was often called upon to listen to so wonderful a story, so eager and so interrupted, that she was obliged to still the little tumult and enquire what it was all about. Then came the explanation, "O! it's all in a picture. A picture we saw in Mr. So-and-So's shop window.

Now I want to show you some pictures in this column. The scenes are taken from the Old Testament, and those who have learnt to love the Bible, with its beautiful stories, will have little difficulty in recognising them.

1. Our first picture represents a wilderness. The heat of the sun is intense, and a young lad, dying of thirst, is lying beneath the sandy shadow of a shrub. Not far off, we see an empty goat-skin bottle, and a woman with averted face, who is weeping bitterly. (a) Name these two persons. (b) State what the boy afterwards became, and where he lived. (c) How is he spoken of in the Book of Galatians?

2. An old man, sad and weary, is climbing a mountain slope. By his side we see a bright and eager lad, who is evidently wondering at his companion's distress. (a) What question is he asking? (b) Give the names of the men and of the mountain, also the new name which was afterwards given to this place.

3. What a strange scene! The ground is rough and stony, the sun has set, and yet by the dim star-light we discern the form of a solitary sleeper, with a stone for his pillow, and the dark sky for his canopy. (a) Who is this traveller? (b) Whither is he going? (c) What name does he give to the place wherein he slept?

4. Now look upon a very different landscape. It is the middle of the day, and the sun is shining on a pleasant field, where flocks of goodly sheep lie waiting to be watered. A little group of shepherds are chatting with a stranger by the well's mouth. He seems to be asking many questions, but suddenly he pauses and gazes across the field at a beautiful shepherdess who is approaching with her sheep. (a) Who is this shepherdess? (b) How is she related to the traveller? (c) What was the name of the well?

Personal.

The Secretary of the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen wishes to thank the kind friends who sent the caps and chest protectors, and would be glad to receive mufflers, gloves, stockings, etc., if any of my young readers would make some.

ETHEL PASLEY.—No marks are given for the weekly "Searcher," the papers being simply counted right or wrong. The Prize Competition is eligible to my "nephews and nieces" under twenty.

GERTRUDE BATH.—I am very sorry to learn you have had so much trouble, but hope you have happier times before you. I wish you success in your examination.

FAN TROTTER.—I am glad to welcome you back, and hope you will be able to continue doing the "Searcher."

VIOLET WALKER.—Thank you for your interesting letter.

LOUISA WALKER.—It would be very nice if you did typewrite your competition papers, as it is so easy to read.

LIZZIE JOHNSTONE.—I am glad your hand is better now.

C. DEVENISH MEARES.—You can write on both sides of the paper, but if the answers are not long it is better not to do so.

DOROTHY GARFIT AND ERNEST DUNN.—You must write out the answers as well as give the references.

K. E. OLIVER.—I was very pleased to learn that you and Sydney had won prizes at your Sunday School.

CATHERINE BARBER.—I do not remember your former letter, but will have your name indexed if your answers were correct.

F. T. H. AND M. ALLSOP, CONSTANCE DRAYSON, AND FRANK TOMKINS.— You should read the answers more carefully. You were incorrect in No. 2, as you only gave Peter's name.

RUTH PLEDGER.—It gave me much pleasure to learn how happy you are.

EDITH BADHAM.—You must have had a very interesting evening. You were wrong in No. 2.

LLEWELLYN DALE.—Your prize has been despatched. I shall be very glad to receive your letter.

ELIZA SCOTT.—If you are correct nine times during the quarter you can try for the Prize Competition.

LILY KINVIG.—It would be much better if you wrote on ruled paper. UNCLE TOM.

School for Bible Study.

THE interest aroused during the first week of meetings in connection with the Ten Weeks' School of Bible Study was fully sustained during the continuation gatherings held in the various centres last week. The earnest purpose of the teacher, and the devotion of the students, combined to invest the meetings with a growing importance; and there is every sign that the coming weeks will witness a still further development of the same spirit and power for good.

The meeting on Tuesday afternoon was held in the large King's Hall, Holborn, and the muster was large beyond parallel. Resuming the study of

THE FOURTH GOSPEL,

Dr. White directed attention to the remarkable cogency of its material to the main object in the writer's mind. That object is stated in the closing verses of chapter xx.—"These (signs) are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life in his name." First, he noted that the threefold description of Christ here given appears in reversed order in the opening verses of chapter i., where we find that the Word was God; then that He was the Messiah, who came unto his own possessions and his own people received Him not; and finally comes the name of Jesus, who dwelt among men "full of grace and truth." If we come into contact with Jesus as a man, and live with Him as disciples, with hearts desiring to render loving obedience, we shall at length arrive at the conclusion that our Master must be all that the Evangelist declares. Scientific method insists upon two things—investigation and experimentation. In conformity with this rule, the speaker maintained that the question of Christ and his claims is not solely an intellectual one; the things ascertained and learned must be acted out and incorporated in the life.

"These signs are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ." Christ's claim is not based on explanation but on evidence. We do not accept things because we can explain them, but because we are satisfied with the evidence adduced; and on that evidence we act or experiment.

THE WHOLE FABRIC

of John's Gospel is developed along these lines. Christ did not explain Himself, but referred to the testimony of John, to the works which He did in his Father's name, and to the Scriptures which the Jews accepted as true (v. 35-39). The frequent occurrence of the words "witness" and "believe" was shown to have an important bearing here. If testimony is worthy, it will produce belief. Go through the book for its records of belief; note also the instances of unbelief; the development of one and the other; also their results, reasons, and explanations. Other instructions, involving a thorough study of the book, dealt with the duty of belief and the sin of unbelief, also the object and time of belief.

Having spoken of the importance of recognising the human characteristics of the books of Scripture, Dr. White enumerated the "signs" described in John's Gospel, pointing out that they belong to the period in which our Lord was being manifested to the world at large. Like the Jews who rejected Christ, many to-day ask for signs without any intention to subject their wills to the Lord. The man who is not disposed to bring his life into harmony with the Gospel still demands signs, but will satisfy him, for Christ's appeal is to moral character as well as the intellect. Whereas the public manifestation of Christ extended over three years, the private manifestation lasted only a few days, verse 36 of chapter xii. marking the division of the two periods. To this critical time the story hastens. From those who would not believe on Him, Christ "hid Himself" (xii. 36, 37); He will never withdraw from those who follow Him with open mind. Those, however, who are for crucifying Him, will find opportunity to do so, as was the case with the Jews.

Among other features of John's Gospel was mentioned the testimony of Jesus to Himself in the emphatic form of ego eimi, so frequently found. Illustrating the development of belief, consequent upon the various signs wrought, Dr. White directed attention to the case of the blind man (ch. ix), who described the miracle wrought upon him as by (1) a man that is called Jesus (v. 11); whom he afterwards (2) called a prophet (v. 17); and with reference to whom he (3) inquired how could a sinful man open the eyes of one born blind (v. 32)? Finally, when asked by Jesus whether he believed on the Son of God, the man said (v. 36-38), "Who is He, Lord, that I might believe on Him," followed by combined with the record "And he worshipped Him." The story shows that the man was willing throughout to learn who Jesus was; and all who are of that mind may be assured of a like blessed experience following upon honest investigation.

Among the explanations of unbelief were mentioned: (1) Inability to explain processes—"How can these things be?" Yet in the physical world men experiment with and make use of forces they cannot explain. (2) An immoral life "The love of the Father is not in you." "Men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil." "Everyone that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." (3) Unwillingness to accept ample evidence. The will is related to the intellect. In chapter v. the evidence regarding Christ was heaped up, but it had no effect upon the Jews. The testimony of the Father, of John, of Christ's work, and of the Scriptures, were adduced; but the will is governed by moral character, and the Lord's word was "Ye will not come unto Me." The book opens with the assumption of a believer—"The Word was God"—and ends with

THE CONFESSION OF A DOUBTER—

"My Lord and my God" (xx. 28). Chapter xxi. is an epilogue, dealing with events not contemplated in the original scheme of the book. "I do not believe," said Dr. White, "that any one can read this Gospel through on his knees, with a devout prayer to God for light, without arriving at a knowledge of the Saviour whom we love."

On Wednesday, at noon, there was a large gathering in Queen's Hall, Langham Place, and in the afternoon the Polytechnic was filled by an audience which followed with much interest an outline study of Matthew's Gospel. In some introductory words Professor White said that his

for their simplicity; he was glad of that, for he saw greater danger of being too high than of being too low in putting things. He was desirous that instructed Christians should do their utmost to bring in the "other sheep," and he hoped those who were familiar with their Bibles would not look so much for new things as for old things presented in a new way. The times demand a presenting of the old truths with new applications.

Treating the First Gospel as he had Mark and John, Dr. White presented on the canvas a scheme of the chapters with their chief contents thus:—

MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

Chap.	Chap.	Chap.
1. Advent.	11. Opposition Developing.	19. From Galilee to Jerusalem.
2. Flight.	12. "Beelzebub."	20.
3. John t. Baptist.	13. Group of Parables.	21.
4. Temptation.	14. 5,000 Fed.	22. The Deputation
5. Sermon.	15. 4,000 Fed.	23. "Woe."
6.	16. "On this Rock."	24. Second Advent.
7.	17. Transfiguration	25. Judgment.
8. Five Miracles.	18. "Ninety-and-nine."	26. Jewish Trial.
9. Five Miracles.		27. Roman Trial.
10. Disciples.		28. Resurrection.

To go through the book in this way, associating the material in general with the facts and incidents suggested by the catch words, is obviously a useful exercise; and the audience responded with zest to the questions that were put with the object of impressing the mind as the subject was developed. Chronologically, the Gospel may be divided into four parts, each containing seven chapters. One year of obscurity, one year of popularity, one year of conflict, and last days. The first three divisions relate, for the most part, to Galilee.

Having shown reason for the conclusion that Matthew's Gospel was specially written for Jewish Christians, Dr. White pointed out its peculiarities, especially its teaching concerning the King and Kingdom, with numerous quotations from and references to the Old Testament. Students were advised to note these. Adverting to the remark of some, that though they could not receive the entire Scriptures, they were willing to be guided by the Sermon on the Mount, the speaker pointed out the far-reaching character of the Laws of the Kingdom as there set forth, especially noting the terms employed in denunciation of impurity and unkindness (v. 21-28). That Sermon involves and the entirety of the Old and New Testaments in their counsels for life and godliness, and no man can keep the commands there laid down without the help of the Spirit of God.

On Wednesday evening, at Mildmay, the prophecy of Amos was continued before an audience considerably larger than that of the previous week. The training of the prophet in quiet communion with God, and his method in announcing coming judgments, were passed in review.

AMOS.

The contents of the book were then analysed. A series of foreign prophecies (chap. i. and ii.) being followed by questions (iii.), warnings from the past (iv.), invitations (v.), and visions (vii.-ix.). It was shown with much force that the threatened judgments by locusts and fire were averted in answer to prayer (vii. 1-6); that the plumb-line vision (vii. 7-9) afforded proof of the righteousness of Divine visitation: while that of the basket of summer fruit (viii. 1, 2), its urgency, because of the rottenness of society. Every chapter of Amos speaks of judgment, and the last concludes with a bright and glorious promise. At the same time, the long-suffering patience of God is continually illustrated.

At several meetings Dr. White put the following to the students, asking them to answer them in writing to him at 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W. Which ten books would you choose if some tyrant were to come along and confine you to that number? Also, which hundred chapters — which thirty out of the hundred—which ten out of the thirty? The object of this request was not to satisfy an idle curiosity, but to stimulate a judicious exercise; and, as Professor White was careful to explain, the needful survey and selection would lead many to value more highly every book and all the chapters which they comprise. In America and India this request has brought him many votes on the points raised; and he hopes to receive while in Britain results of study equally interesting and instructive.

☞ All communications regarding the Correspondence Class in connection with the School for Bible Study should be addressed to Lady Watkin Williams, Y.W.C.A., Pinner, Watford.

Theatrical Employees.—Mr. Milligan Forbes, who has recently held meetings for the performers in the pantomimes at Swansea, Cardiff, and Bristol, had a large gathering to tea on Thursday last, at Orange Street Lecture Hall, Leicester Square. After tea, hymns and solos were sung, and addresses were given by Mr. B. J. Gibbon, of Bloomsbury Chapel, Rev. W. Harrison, and Mr. Forbes. The Religious Tract Society sent beautiful booklets, and the Bible Flower Mission sent lavender bags with texts attached.

Presbyterian Union in Scotland.—Satisfactory progress continues to be made in committee in connection with the negotiations for the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church. The joint committee met in Edinburgh, and discussed in detail various practical questions, such as training for the ministry, administration of home and foreign missions, and arrangements for General Assembly, provincial Synods, and Presbyteries. Rules and forms of procedure for a united Church were also considered. The meeting was of a most harmonious character. The joint committee will meet again towards the middle of this month, when, no doubt, steps will be taken for the preparation of a report to be submitted to the Supreme Courts of both Churches.

Evangelistic.

MR. CHARLES INGLIS, who has been preaching in Chicago and other American cities with great blessing, has arrived home.

A ten days' mission has been conducted at Castleford by Miss NORTH, assisted by the pastor, Rev. E. D. Solomon. A large number of persons have professed decision.

Mr. LEONARD WEAVER'S mission at the Great Assembly Hall was greatly blessed. At the close of an impressive meeting on Sunday evening a large number of persons decided for Christ.

Mr. W. FORBES has concluded an eight days Gospel temperance mission at the old Wesleyan Chapel, East Finchley. Good audiences gathered every night to hear his forceful addresses.

Rev. J. MCNEILL has during the last fortnight been preaching to large audiences nightly in Forres and Nairn, with marked signs of interest and blessing. He is at present in Ross-shire.

Mr. J. HARRIS, of the Evangelisation Society, has had an encouraging mission at Piddington, Oxon. Eighteen years ago Mr. Harris paid a similar visit to this place, and the results of that effort are still manifest.

Mr. THOMAS PAYNE has held a ten days mission at Tasso Tabernacle, Fulham. Believers have been definitely blessed, and the unconverted awakened. The Pastor's vestry on Sunday evening was full of anxious ones.

The fortnight's mission, by Rev. W. HAY AITKEN, at the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Bristol, commenced on Sunday last. Afternoon and evening meetings were well attended, and much blessing experienced. Great interest is manifest in connection with the mission, and all branches of the Christian Church are uniting to make it as widely known as possible.

Rev. R. MACKAY has concluded a mission at Newport Pagnell, Bucks. The arrangements were made by the local Free Church Council and the union was complete, embracing all branches of the Free Churches, including the Salvation Army. The meetings were held in the Congregational church, Mr. Evans, the young pastor of the church, throwing himself heartily into the work. During the eight days Mr. Mackay addressed sixteen meetings, including the Bible Readings, which were held in the Friends' Meeting House and well attended. At the closing meeting a number came to the front as an indication that they had afresh consecrated themselves to the Lord, or had for the first time yielded themselves to Christ.

The visit of Rev. THOMAS WAUGH, to Street, for a mission under the auspices of the Central Somerset Free Church Council, in the Crispin Hall, has been signally blessed of God. Although the population is scarcely 5,000, yet in such a wondrous manner was the Holy Spirit displayed throughout the district, and such a growing interest in the mission aroused, that for the last few days crowds of 1,000 to 1,200 people attended every service. Nearly 1,000 men attended the men's meeting in the Crispin Hall; after a service of great interest and power, several professed to decide for Christ. At the women's meeting the Primitive Methodist Church was crowded, and again seekers after Christ entered the inquiry-room. At the farewell meeting the hearts of the workers were filled with joy when over sixty seekers came boldly forward to be pointed to Christ. The pastors and members of the Free Churches are praising God for the more than 200 seekers who have passed through the inquiry-room, and also for the quickened life of the Churches.

Church Parochial Mission Society.

The following missions among others have been arranged for February. It is hoped they will be made a subject of prayer by readers:—Rev. W. Hay Aitken, until Feb. 18, Young Men's Christian Association Hall, Bristol; 18-Mar. 6, St. Peter's, Dorchester. Rev. Norman Bennet, Feb. 4-11, Mostyn House School; 11-18, mission to factory lads, Middleton, Manchester; 18-22, Epsom College. Rev. W. St. Hill Bourne, Feb. 4-14, Kibworth, Leicester. Rev. W. Bryan-Brown, till Feb. 7, Cheltenham College Mission, Nunhead, S.E.; 25-Mar. 6, Little Stukeley, Huntingdon. Rev. T. E. Cleworth, Jan. 28-Feb. 6, All Saints' and St. John's, Hertford. Rev. J. P. Cushing, Feb. 4-13, Kells, Co. Meath; 18-27, Baggotrath Church, Dublin. Rev. Canon Lester, till Feb. 8, St. Paul's, Paddington, W. Rev. E. Bacheler Russell, till Feb. 7, St. Stephen's, Putney, S.W.; 18-28, Little Amwell, Hertford Heath, Herts. Rev. James Stephens, till Feb. 12, Potters Bar; 18-Mar. 3, Bourne End, Hemel Hempstead, Herts.

SERGEANT PULLINGER.—Feb. 5, Gospel Hall, Doddington Grove, Battersea.

Temperance Notes.

AT a meeting of the Christchurch Board of Guardians the Finance Committee recommended that the medical officer's attention should be called to the quantity of brandy used in the infirmary; it was stated that some twelve to fourteen gallons per quarter were consumed, at 31s. 6d. per gallon. It was felt that eighteen guineas a quarter for brandy was certainly too much, seeing that it was given to only thirteen patients out of the seventy in the infirmary.

. . . . . .

Rev. B. Senior, of Bradford, has issued, in pamphlet form, an interesting account of his recent "visits to the 32 public-houses in Manchester Road, Bradford." In the course of a conversation, a landlady told Mr. Senior that she had seven children, and not one of them would touch the intoxicating liquors she sold. At another house the landlord had eight children, and he assured Mr. Senior that they had no sympathy with the drink traffic, and they all went to a place of worship.

. . . . . .

A conference on "How to oppose Licences at the approaching Brewster Sessions in Middlesex and Surrey" is being held at 4, Ludgate Hill, on February 3, by members of the Women's Total Abstinence Union; and on February 7, at the same place, Mr. W. N. Edwards commences a series of six lectures on the physiological aspect of the temperance question. As a result of former lectures ladies have come out as speakers on scientific temperance, and the primary object of the present series is to continue this educational work.

The annual conference of the Irish Temperance League, held in Belfast, was marked by conspicuous enthusiasm. At a public demonstration in the Ulster Hall, the Marquis of Dufferin said, they did not meet to suggest any heroic measure, but in support of a very reasonable suggestion—namely, that the public-houses should be closed on Sunday and at an earlier hour on Saturday night. He believed in petitioning for that they were pushing against an open door, and that Parliament could not resist the weight of public opinion that was behind them. If they could only remove the evil, imagination would scarcely be able to conceive the amount of peace and happiness and purity and nuptial felicity and wealth and content which would illuminate thousands and thousands of homes.

International S.S. Lessons.

"Christ's Divine Authority."—John v. 17-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"This is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."—John iv. 42.

AT THE POOL OF BETHESDA.

ALL halt and maimed waiting in the porticos around the pool. They believed in the curative properties of the water. The spring was intermittent, and is so still. The impotent man never expected that the angel of God might come to him in some other form than he had been accustomed to. The Sender of the angel was near. The man had to learn that God can produce the same effect by another cause. Christ's word was sufficient to heal without going through the tedious process of means to reach the end. The man had faith in Christ, for he who needed to be helped to the water's edge, took up his bed at Christ's command.

Faith in Christ is needful before we can receive spiritual health, forgiveness, and strength from Him.

THE OFFENDED PHARISEES.

They were strict about the letter of the law, but careless of its spirit. Jesus was chiefly mindful of the spirit of law. "Keep holy the Sabbath day" could not be better observed than by doing an unselfish deed of kindness—a holy deed. The deed makes the day holy—not the day the deed. The Sunday should be spent in doing good to ourselves (resting body and mind, realising food for the spirit in God's house), or to others (by teaching them—helping them to get nearer to God, and so banishing the thoughts of earthly things, by which body and mind may rest). "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day."

THE SON IMITATES THE FATHER (17-19).

True generally of all sons. "My Father worketh and I work." Jesus was the world's hardest worker. The Father had been working not for Himself but for the uplifting of men; so Jesus worked for the same end. "Be ye imitators of God as dear children." Christ's argument is that in doing this good deed on the Sabbath day, He is but following in his Father's footsteps. Jesus is the revealer of God. "No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, He hath declared Him." If we want to know what the Father is like, we must look at the Son.

THE BELOVED (20, 21).

Because the Father loves the Son, the attributes and powers possessed by the Father are bestowed upon the Son. As the Father giveth life to all, so this power is possessed by the Son. Christ's great gift to man is "life eternal," i.e., spiritual life, and because it is spiritual, lasting for ever. Spiritual life means being in communion with God; seeking his guidance in all things; seeing and hearing Him all the day long. This comes to us through Jesus Christ (24). Verse 25 refers to the spiritually dead. In all ages since Christ, dead men in sin have come to life at the voice of the Son of God.

HONOUR CHRIST (23).

Seeing that Christ is God manifest in the flesh, we should honour Him as we honour the Father. This, not because Christ is benefited by our honour, but because—

(1.) We are bound to worship the highest when we see Him.

(2.) We obey the one whom we most honour.

(3.) The more we honour Christ the greater will be our faith in Him and our devotion in his service.

JESUS OUR JUDGE (22-27).

This does not refer to the great judgment day. Every day is a judgment day; every act we do, knowing how Christ has lived, is a judgment for good or evil. We are constantly placing ourselves for or against Christ. He is always with us. Teachers should impress this both as a warning and as a comfort.

The Christian.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments.

THE all-day meetings of the Evangelical Alliance in Exeter Hall on Tuesday, February 14, are called to "proclaim and affirm the faith of the Gospel in its simplicity." The morning and afternoon meetings for humiliation and prayer will meet the desire of many Christians for more definite pleading with God in the present crisis. At the evening gathering such well-known names as Revs. G. Campbell Morgan, Prebendary H. W. Webb-Peploe, and Dr. Glover, of Bristol, are enough to ensure that the object for which the meetings have been convened will receive valuable spiritual accentuation. More positive teaching on the great verities of the Cross is an urgent need of our time.

Many of our readers will find the current issue of Regions Beyond of especial, albeit of sad, interest. It contains an illustrated sketch of the life of the late Mrs. Grattan Guinness, in whose heart and mind that bright and useful magazine (now in its twenty-first year) had its origin. The number bears the title of "Enter Thou," and combines the ordinary issues of January and February. It will touch chords of loving spmpathy all over the world whither labourers have gone forth from the missionary organisation of which, with her husband, Mrs. Guinness was the co-founder and mainspring.

I would rather preach and suffer than be silent and strong. Our day is short enough, and I begin to grudge every moment that is not spent in the cause of the Kingdom.

So wrote Dr. Berry in a letter only two days before his death. How few realise so keenly the highest purposes of life! Yet his lamented death from what is clearly the result of nervous overstrain in the service of the churches presses home the question, How far is it justifiable prematurely to wear out one's constitution in religious work?

The outside demands made on our popular preachers is ever growing, as the channels of public service deepen and widen; and there is a great tendency on the part of societies and churches to concentrate their demands for help on a few gifted and eloquent men. The result is that we are in danger of losing our best leaders in the flower of their age and powers, and to push the onerous tasks of religious leadership more and more on the shoulders of brilliant but necessarily immature men, while the rank and file are not made use of as they should be. "How to concentrate one's energies" will be the most important task of the minister in the future.

Of whom was the Protestant Demonstration in Albert Hall last week really composed? Canon Milligan has described it as packed with Nonconformists. The Church Times speaks of it as a meeting of "nobodies and busybodies, selected for their dulness and bigotry and lack of connection with the church." Rev. W. J. Woods, on behalf of the Congregational Union, found it necessary to explain in the Press why Nonconformists did not attend the meeting, because their view of the situation is one involving Disestablishment; and certainly it was significant that when that thorny question was touched upon in the meeting the dissentient voices were so pronounced as to indicate the presence of a vast preponderance of Churchmen.

Rev. Alfred Rowland, who was present, has since deprecated the lack of support that was given by the meeting to the plea of one speaker for unity of action on the part of Churchmen and Nonconformists. But the reason is obvious if, as is the fact, the meeting was so principally composed of bona fide Churchmen, who in this matter hold aloof somewhat from their Nonconformist brethren, because they are not yet prepared to admit the necessity of so drastic a remedy as that to which the latter are pledged.

The Bishop of Manchester finds as the result of his visitation that at the present day places of worship are worse attended than they were twenty years ago. The chief causes he believes are three:—

(1) Devotion to amusements, and not so much to amusements for their own sake as on account of the gain and excitement which may be obtained from them by betting on their results. (2) The new attention which was paid to industrial changes and the extravagant expectations which were aroused by the hope of greater material prosperity. Men were seeking to better themselves rather by the improvement of their means than of their characters, rather through the satisfaction of their senses than through the elevation of the soul. (3) An engrossing interest in those secular studies which were fostered by our County Council schools—an interest so engrossing that those studies could not be abandoned, even on Sunday, for the worship of God. These studies, he was told, were chiefly pursued, not for the enlargement of knowledge or quickening of faculty, but for the increase of pecuniary gain of which they might be made the procuring cause.

The great fight of our day is with superstitious religion, and the hunger for material good; but what are these again but the old, the never-ending fight of the spirit against the flesh?

The open advocacy on the part of some of the leading dailies, representing both sides of the House of Commons, of Mr. Balfour's scheme for the establishment of a Roman Catholic University in Dublin is one of the alarming signs of the times, and should awaken the friends of true religious liberty in Ireland to the utmost vigilance and to immediate action. It would seem that we are in for a parliamentary session in which ecclesiastical questions will play an important part and the old battle between Romanism and Protestantism in this country be re-fought. We must resist by every legitimate and honourable means all attempts to re-establish the power of Popery. The priest is already only too powerful in Ireland, and to endow a national institution under such control would be to accentuate the mischief.

The rival definitions recently bandied to and fro in the political arena of true and false Imperialism, Little Englander, &c., suggest some others on a higher plane. The false Imperialism is that which extends the Empire of selfishness, greed, and mammon-worship; the true is that which aims at the extension of God's kingdom and righteousness in the world. A Little Englander is a man who makes the temporal interests and political prestige of his own nation the first thing; a Great Englander should desire to make this country the centre of honourable commerce, enlightened civilisation, and missionary enterprise. This larger and higher patriotism is a need of the times; what goes by the name is often but a disguised national selfishness.

Among the many projects, religious and secular, which are on foot with a view to celebrate the advent of a new century, one of the most important is that recommended by the General Committee of the Free Church Council—that all the Evangelical Churches should hold a simultaneous mission as early as possible in 1900. A paper on this subject will be read at the approaching annual meetings at Liverpool in March. Such a movement, if carried out with enthusiasm and earnestness, would worthily crown the local united missions which have already been held under the same auspices. These missions have almost everywhere been very successful, and additional missioners will have to be engaged to meet the growing demands. This is a most encouraging sign, and should finally lay at rest the fear entertained by some good people lest the Free Church movement should lose its main purpose in bye-ways of social or semi-political action.

"How Far should the Pulpit be Literary?" is the subject of an interesting article in the New York Observer. Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke, of the Brick Church, N.Y., says:—

I do not believe the pulpit should be literary at all. It should be evangelistic. But it is possible that a man who knows something about literature may be able to do some decent work in an evangelical pulpit.

There is no doubt that a literary pulpit style in most cases defeats the supreme object for which preaching was instituted—the bringing of the human soul home to the love of God in Jesus Christ. Preaching need not be slovenly or commonplace because the literary element is held in abeyance. Heart-to-heart address, definite appeal, simplicity of diction, fervid utterance, glowing words will accomplish what a literary essay can never in the nature of things reach. To save the people, to win lives for Christ, preachers must be living men talking to their brothers, for whom Christ died, with a passionate longing for their salvation.

A great weakness, as it seems to us, in many of our churches is the very small proportion of the congregation who come supplied with a Bible in which to follow the reading of the Scriptures. Not only does the eye help the ear, but it is the more effective sense of the two for the conveyance and retention of ideas. We heard recently of a minister who had not attached any importance to his people forming the habit, but who surprised them by opening his morning discourse with a strong admonition in its favour. We wish others would do the same. Then we should not hear of people hunting for Ezra among the prophets, or supposing that Habakkuk is in the Apocrypha.

Here is an anecdote which meets the case of those Christian people who make their disasters and disappointments an excuse for cutting short their benevolent contributions. It is told in Helping Words for February. A kindly man had promised £5 to the Lord's work; but before paying it he suffered disaster by a destructive hailstorm, which ruined a valuable conservatory. The collector met him soon afterwards, and was told to call for the promised subscription, which, in view of the donor's loss, he said must be reduced to £3. When visited, however, he gave a cheque for the original amount. The narrator continues :—

Thinking it possible that it was so written by a slip of the thought, I said, "So you meant this for £5?" "Yes," he replied, "my wife and I have talked it over a little, and we have concluded it best to bear the loss ourselves, and not charge it to the Lord!" Thus spoke the cheerful givers, such as God says He loves; and it was a spirit which, if carried out, would make all our Christian enterprises "panic-proof."

We have long been of opinion that the immediate objective for which the friends of temperance ought to strive is Sunday closing, redeeming the Lord's Day to the highest uses of humanity. The National Temperance Council, moved by the remark of Lord Salisbury, that nothing is done in the way of temperance legislation, because reformers could not agree on one point, and asked for so many different things, has decided to press for Sunday closing. Temperance reform can only be carried in detail, and the sooner this inexorable fact is recognised the better for everyone.

The London County Council has done a good work in not preserving the licences of public-houses which have come into their possession; nevertheless, it is discouraging for them to be attempting reform while the licensing justices grant new licences in place of the old ones. It ought to be possible to avoid this anomaly by making some representations to these gentlemen. Especially ought the opinion of the great majority of an important body like the L.C.C. to have determining weight with them, so that there may be something like unity of purpose and a resolute endeavour to cope with what statesmen and judges agree to be the greatest curse with which our country is burdened.

The close relation between intemperance and disease is now formally recognised by the new law relating to inebriates. Practically it is an attempt at combining the curative with the preventive methods of dealing with this terrible evil. In future, magistrates will be empowered to send "incorrigible drunkards" to reformatories for inebriates, financed and managed by the State, where they will be kept for a minimum period of twelve months under careful treatment. The method will not be punitive; there will be an entire absence of harsh discipline, and every opportunity will be given of stimulating the will-power and moral sense of the "patients." How far such state-control will avail for curing so deep-seated a trouble is a problem which experiment alone can determine. In the majority of cases nothing short of a spiritual regeneration can effect a permanent reformation.

The advantage of vigilance on the part of societies having some great public reform at heart is seen in the way in which the law forbidding the sale of intoxicants to children below a certain age is obeyed in America, Canada, and Australia, as compared with the laxity that prevails in England. In the above-mentioned countries saloon-keepers take care that no children are ever found even on their doorsteps, for they know that the eyes of the children's societies are ever upon them, and they dare not disobey the law. Here, as everybody knows, it is very different. There is, therefore, something peculiarly timely in the Board of Inquiry that has been formed with a view of dealing with this matter, under the presidency of the Bishop of Hereford. Lady Henry Somerset has circularised the local branches of the British Women's Temperance Association asking for facts bearing on the situation, and afterwards a committee will sit to deal with the evidence collected. There are few evils that need firmer treatment.

In his work, "Women of the New Testament," Professor Adeney has some remarks on the subject of demoniacal possession, which are capable of a wider application than he gives them. After reminding his readers that we have among us still the dogmatism of science, although no work of science that is ten years old is held to be valid, he inquires whether we can be so sure that there is no dark spiritual secret behind the phenomena which our medical men now ascribe to nerve and brain disorders. He reminds us that the whole subject is exceedingly obscure, as the doctors themselves admit.

Perhaps we shall be told some day that later discoveries are bringing us back to beliefs which a crude half-science had abandoned too hastily. This is not a subject for scorn and arrogance. The mystery of it is too great.

The Vienna correspondent of the Morning Leader has exposed a horrible evil among scientific practitioners which should at once have the widest publicity. The doctors in the Austrian capital were interviewed with a view to hear their answers to the charges brought against them as to practising what is virtually the vivisection of human patients. Their reply was that the same things are done in Berlin and in London; that they can obtain charity children free of charge, while animals are expensive and produce unsatisfactory results under experiment. Here is a charge so definite and terrible that all who hold the true healing science in repute should at once meet it, or make it for ever impossible. The tortures of the Inquisition chamber had "fanaticism and morbid conscientiousness" for their excuse; but the deliberate infliction of suffering on the unfortunates of the world, in the name of humanity, and in cool blood, is too awful to contemplate.

The rumour that the Pope was to be invited to send a representative to the Peace Congress has created some excitement during the past week. Such a policy would introduce a thoroughly false note into the movement. There is no reason why Romanists per se should have a representation on the Council more than any other form of religious belief. It would give an entirely fictitious prominence to the Papal authority and influence at the expense of other churches. The work of the religious bodies in this great crusade against militarism is to educate and voice a righteous and humane public opinion, and to convince diplomatists that the peoples are at heart set on this desirable reform. Having done that, their business is to pray, not to sit on councils. Their hope indeed is not in the congress itself but in the overruling hand of God, and in the triumph of the principles of the Gospel in the hearts of men. The weapons of the Church are not carnal but spiritual.

Miss Muller, formerly a member of the London School Board, and an active worker in social reform, went out to India as a delegate to the Indian National Congress four years ago, and then gave herself to the study of Hindooism in its native home. As the result she has authorised the Bombay Guardian to say that she has found herself faced with the unavoidable conclusion that Hindooism "is utterly rotten and corrupt from beginning to end, and full of danger to the unhappy people who place their faith in it." Miss Muller had joined the movement under Swami Vivekananda for the spread of Hindooism; now she has abandoned it, and is thankful that it is coming to nothing both in England and in America. We would point out that these Eastern faiths, sometimes so plausible, need a trained mind to expound them; e.g., a great scholar read monotheism in the words—"Brahm is great, and beside him there is none"; but an experienced missionary read pantheism—"Brahm is everything, and everything is Brahm."

The remarkable increase in the population in Jerusalem during the last fifty years is exciting much interest. The number to-day is estimated at 45,000, of these 28,000 are Jews. Indeed, the whole Jewish population of Palestine is reckoned at 100,000.

No fewer than 565 baptisms of Jews have taken place at Christ Church, Jerusalem, hundreds of Jewish children have been educated in its schools, tens of thousands of sick Jews have been treated in its hospitals, and a large number of Bibles and New Testaments circulated.

Jerusalem seems on the eve of becoming once more the "praise of the whole earth." No people need more the prayers of Christians than the Jews. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

Lord Halsbury's speech last week as to the prospects of improving the legislation concerning company-promoting was not encouraging to the lovers of reform. When our highest legal functionary deprecates interference with a law which is so loose that nearly half the companies floated come to nothing, while prosecution of dishonest promoters is so expensive and uncertain as to be seldom attempted, it is a sad sign of the times. The reason given for non-interference was, in effect, that too stringent regulations would tend to check commercial enterprise, and that dupes deserved to lose their money. Such an argument ignores the fundamental basis of all law, which is for the protection of the weak and erring, and for the terror of the knavish and unprincipled. Righteousness exalteth a nation. Liberty becomes licence when wrong-doing can be committed with impunity. A new social conscience is sadly in request in the matter of investments.

The "present distress" in the religious world is deeply exercising many minds. There is no dearth of suggestions as to palliative or remedial measures, and while resolutions and memorials are the order of the day, petitions to heaven are not wanting. Rev. Sidney Pike writes to us :—

Why should not all Protestants, by their representatives—the different Protestant societies—agree to set apart a special week for humiliation and prayer, as Daniel's example incites and encourages us to do? Then all, though not on the same day, could on one day of that week, as each congregation found convenient to itself, specially acknowledge before God that we have sinned by unfaithfulness to his truth, and are being punished by Him for it by this plague of error, and seek his help and deliverance. He can help, and man seems powerless. Then we should surely receive the blessing promised to "the man who trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is."

Evangelical religion, which is so seriously threatened by present-day formalism, should be the concern of all spiritually-minded Christians. Those who deem themselves to be outside the affected area cannot be indifferent, in view of the Apostolic declaration that the Church consists of many members, yet one body; when one member suffers all the members suffer with it.

What We are to Preach.

By Rev. JAMES CULROSS, D.D., Bristol.

Luke xxiv. 36-49.

THIS paragraph may be regarded as a summing up of much that our Lord said to the twelve between the resurrection and the ascension. It reads as if it belonged to the evening of the resurrection day, and we shall commit no serious error if we take it so. The twelve are together in the upper room. The two wayfarers from Emmaus have entered and are telling their tidings, when suddenly the Lord Himself stands in their midst and salutes them with the benediction, "Peace be unto you."

At first and for a time there is fear, as once before when He came to them walking on the sea; but He satisfies them that it is indeed Himself, and their fear passes into joy. When they have had time to grow calm, He says to them, "These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses and in the prophets and in the Psalms concerning Me."

Hitherto they had not understood, or rather had misunderstood. As curtain folds hung across a window intercept the light which beats against it, so heavy curtain folds of prejudice, miseducation, and carnal liking hindered the entrance of the truth into their minds. The Lord then "opened their understandings" as He had opened the holden eyes of the Emmaus friends, bringing before them what was "written," and showing and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, their power for the undertaking being the Holy Ghost. All this is but an expansion of John's briefer report, "As my Father hath sent Me, even so send I you," and in closest harmony with the parting commission to preach the Gospel to every creature.

The Lord's words present the great central idea of Gospel propagation. Outward arrangements are not prescribed or even shadowed out in the dimmest way. There is Divine foresight and wisdom in this. We, in our shortsightedness, set forth plans, construct machinery, and form arrangements which, we fancy, shall be permanent, not thinking of the "increasing purpose" which runs through the ages, and which necessitates ever-varying and enlarging methods. The consequence is, we become formal and commercial, and lose the fresh single-heartedness, the enthusiasm, the swiftness, and the flexibility and freedom of action which are of such value to servants of Christ. The very dress in which we clothe ourselves as soldiers of Christ is apt to grow cumbersome and inflexible, like mail, instead of yielding softly to every movement of life. Conflicts arise between the old and the new, friends are divided, and power is wasted. The Lord, sweeping his eye over the world and on to remotest time, is divinely silent about outward arrangements, leaving every successive Christian generation free to work in the manner best adapted, in their judgment, to providential circumstances. What He does set forth is in its grandly simple elements, so that there is no need for revision, enlargement, adaptation to the nineteenth century or any other. It lies essentially in the religion that personal faith in the redeeming Christ cannot exist without, to say the least, kindling missionary longings. The wish to be a missionary is just as common as conversions are.

Looking broadly over the Lord's words, one notices in the outset that certain facts are to be published throughout the whole world; while the Gospel, dealing with the mighty problems of Godhead, humanity, sin, and grace, goes down to humanly unfathomable depths, and up to humanly unreachable altitudes of thought; yet in its historical forth-setting it starts with certain facts that honest men could bear witness to, and that the simplest and least cultured may apprehend. These facts have value, not merely as they embody certain truths, but in themselves as pertaining to Christ's redeeming work. They are, so to speak, the "leverage" of the preacher of reconciliation. "Pilgrim's Progress" loses nothing when we discover that the facts never happened; but the Gospel facts have inherent and substantial value, apart from and beyond their fitness to express divine truth. The death of Christ, for example, does not merely declare God's love, but is his means of putting sin out of the way; while his resurrection from the dead is not merely an earnest and a pledge of ours, but is the first stage in his advancement to

UNIVERSAL AND SUPREME DOMINION.

The opposers of the Gospel in the present day recognise the vital importance of the facts, and do all they can by questioning the records to clear them out of the way, or to throw them into doubt, or to resolve the supernatural into the ideal; knowing that if the facts could be got rid of there would be slight difficulty elsewhere. If the facts are established, then the Gospel is felt to be no mere theory, excogitated in the closet, to be debated by philosophers; but is a Divine institution, resting on a basis solid as rock, firm as adamant.

(To be continued.)

Public Souls.

By Rev. H. ARNOLD THOMAS.

WE are not in the world to do our own will. We are here to do, not what we like, but what we ought. If the duty is a pleasant one, well and good. But we are not to consider too carefully whether it is pleasant or not. It is our duty, and the thing is to do it. If, therefore, there is any demand for our service in the world or the Church, we ought not to be heard saying: "I do not care for that kind of work." That is not the question. The faithful servant will not pick and choose. Nor will the servant of the Lord who hopes to be called at least good and faithful, be picking and choosing.

Modesty is good; refinement is good; self-effacement is good; the fellowship of kindred minds is good. But what if it is not so much these things that are keeping us in the background, as timidity, or indolence, or fastidiousness, or fear of offending, or preoccupation with our own affairs? There may, after all, be no justification for that quiet pleasant life we are living. It may be a cowardly and sinful life. It may be that we are not really caring at all seriously for the things for which we ought to be caring the most; or that we are not willing to take up the cross, or do anything against the grain, in order that God's kingdom may come and his will be done on earth as it is done in heaven.—The Puritan.

Seamen's Christian Friend Society.—The annual meeting of the "Gospel Pioneer Band" was held at the society's headquarters, St. George Street, E., lately. The report stated that nearly 200 open-air services had been held during the year in the vicinity of the docks, resulting in several conversions. Several thousand tracts had been distributed. Stimulating and helpful addresses were given by various friends.

Effectual Prayer.

MUCH of our prayer is vague and pointless," says the Rev. Andrew Murray. "Some pray for God's blessing on those around them, for the outpouring of God's spirit on their land or the world, and yet have no special field where they wait and expect to see the answer.

"To all the Lord says, 'What is it you really want and expect Me to do?' Every Christian has but limited powers, and as he must have his own special field of labour, so with his prayers. Each believer has his own circle, his family, his friends, his neighbours. If he were to take he would find that this really brings him into the training school of faith, and leads to personal and pointed dealing with his God.

"We all know with what surprise the whole civilised world heard of the way in which trained troops were repulsed by the Transvaal Boers at Majuba. And to what did they owe their success? In the armies of Europe the soldier fires upon the enemy standing in large masses, and never thinks of seeking an aim for every bullet. In hunting game, the Boer had learned a different lesson; his practised eye knew how to send every bullet on its special message, to seek and find its man."

Such aiming to-day is wanted in the spiritual world. Many of the members of the One-by-One Working Band have learned this lesson, and during the past ten years of its existence hundreds of notes of praise have come from many parts of the world telling the same story. God is faithful who hath promised. Last year over six hundred souls by definite prayer and individual effort were brought to a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Some of these notes of praise come from those who, before they commenced to follow this divinely appointed plan, had never known the joy of soul-winning; but have now found that "the best way to reach the masses"—as Mr. Moody puts it—"is to reach them one at a time."

A lady writes from Falmouth: — "My experience in intercessory prayer is that God has graciously given me many answers. During September, 1898, I had been praying about two African boys especially. One had left the mission school and gone back to his heathen surroundings. I pleaded with the Lord that He would bring him back. I hear from the missionary that he suddenly reappeared, and they couldn't think why. I knew very well that my Father's ear had heard at Falmouth, and his mighty hand had worked the answer in Africa. Also the same letter brought me word that another in the same school for whom I prayed had asked to become a candidate for baptism." Is not this the

TRUE WAY TO HELP OUR MISSIONARIES?"

Another writes from Scotland:—"Praise God He has just recently given me the joy of leading two girls to Jesus and one of the choir men, for whom I and others prayed."

A Y.W.C.A. worker writes:—"I have used your idea of 'one-by-one' work in my branch; also we have a weekly prayer meeting, when we give in requests for prayer. These are especially remembered on Sunday mornings; then any answer we join in praising God for, and many have been our praise meetings as God has sent the answers."

A note of praise from South Africa says:—"Four sisters made a compact to pray for their own and each other's children a little time since, and last week news came that five had been converted, two out of two families and one out of the third." These are only of notes of praise to the same effect received this month of January. What would it mean for the world if the whole Church of Christ would follow upon the lines of definite prayer and personal effort to save the lost?

Historical Revivals.

II.—THE WESLEYS AND WHITEFIELD.

IN the February issue of The United Presbyterian Magazine Rev. A. Scott Matheson, of Dumbarton, outlines, in a deeply interesting manner, the story of the Evangelical Revival in England in the eighteenth century. We make a brief extract from the article:—

The organisation which the Wesleys formed is to-day the greatest Protestant evangelical power in the world. Green, the historian, says: "The Methodists themselves were the least result of the Methodist Revival. Its action on the church broke the lethargy of the clergy. . . But the noblest result of the religious revival was the steady attempt, which has never ceased from that day to this, to remedy the guilt, the ignorance, the physical suffering, the social degradation of the profligate and the poor." Lecky, the historian, says that "the career of the elder Pitt, with all its dazzling episodes, yields in real importance to that religious revolution begun in England by the preaching of the Wesleys and Whitefield." The influence of the spiritual awakening, especially under Whitefield, infused a new religious earnestness and personal devotion into the clergy and upper circles of the Church of England, where the labours of the Wesleys did not reach. John Wesley's work was not to form a new church, but revive old ones; and he lived to see a group of evangelical ministers in the Establishment, including the honoured names of Berridge, Venn, Toplady, Newton, and Romaine. Nonconformist churches also shared in the blessing of the evangelical movement.

On many hearts it lies that a like revival of pure religion is

A SUPREME NEED OF OUR DAY.

There are signs that the evangelical revival has spent its force, and that a new awakening is required to rouse a lukewarm church and unbelieving world. Keen observers note how ominously like is the state of the nation then and now. They see how there is a danger on one hand of our relapsing into a moderatism that quenches the fire of spiritual earnestness, or into a Romish superstition that declares righteousness by faith to be heresy, and righteousness by ritual to be the only way of salvation. The so-called heresy was the Archimedean lever in Whitefield's and Wesley's hands to lift up a revived church and a reformed nation. A cold deism benumbed the life of last century; a dark agnosticism benights the intellect of this century. A great drift among the Nonconformist churches in the first thirties and forties of last century from the cardinal articles of the Christian faith, finds a similar drift in the last thirty or forty years of the present century. Where are large masses of the people to-day? Outside the churches. But as that effete and soulless Christianity was followed by a great awakening, so may it be in our day. Demonstrations of the Spirit have their cycles, yet often come unexpectedly at the darkest hour. God grant it in his time! "Revive thy work in the midst of the years."

What is to inaugurate a new spiritual movement? Wesley's sons propose to raise a million of money to engineer it. The Baptist Union is going to begin the century with a fund of quarter of a million to evangelise and build more chapels.

"WILL SILLER DAE'T?"

Worlds and churches are not saved by millions or machinery. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." It is men we want "full of faith and the Holy Ghost." Professor Drummond asked forty native pastors in Japan what message he should take home to the churches, and their spokesman said, "Tell them to send us one six thousand dollar missionary rather than ten two thousand dollar missionaries." May Whitefield's and Wesley's God send us like-minded successors, and thrust them out!

AS TO METHODS.

What methods will be successful in bringing revival? As to methods, God's "chariots are twenty thousand," or He can work by none, and, with "things that are not, bring to nought things that are." Whitefield paid little attention to methods, but with burning love to men and burning lips flew about preaching the Evangel with incomputable results. Wesley was a man of methods that were wise and fruitful, and at the opening of the City Road chapel in 1777, said, "May we not ask what hath God wrought?" It is true that God does not repeat Himself, lest one good custom should corrupt the world. The next divine movement may be more intellectual and less emotional, more civic and practical. If the evangelistic spirit moved side by side with social aims and a practical philanthropy, we might look for some new triumph of love over selfishness. Wesley was the apostle of the masses. The churches think of, and plan for, the masses, project evangelistic campaigns to reach the masses. We need no brand new methods, nothing but the old factors—the Gospel of the New Birth, salvation by faith in Christ, and the adoption of sonship, preached with the same confidence and passion of joy as Whitefield, as the Wesleys, preached it. A few such baptized men among us might set the heather on fire.

A New Man's Story.

IN the summer of 1881 the Young Men's Christian Association of Cincinnati was conducting a series of open-air meetings in different parts of that city. Some of us were identified with a service held every Sunday afternoon in the Wade Street Market Place. One day a man came into the meeting and asked for an opportunity to address the people. We were cautious about strangers, for sometimes they had hobbies; but this man spoke. He began as follows: "My friends, many of you know me. Many of you knew me when I was not as well dressed as I am now. Many of you knew me when I was a drunkard in these gutters. Many of you knew me when I lived in that red-brick house yonder."

This introduction caused a sensation among the hearers. Here was a concrete case, realistic, and suggesting hard facts. The people at once became eager to hear. The man continued: "I want to tell you how I came to be a different man. Some months ago, on a Sunday afternoon, I was passing the Sixth Street Market Place, where a Young Men's Christian Association open-air meeting just like this one was being conducted. I had been the night before, and was miserable from the effect of my dissipation. My heart was breaking with despair. I had signed pledges and broken them. I had made good resolutions without number, only to have them dissolve into nothing. As I passed that company, I heard a man saying something about the power of the name of Jesus. I had heard such things before, but the words only stirred my heart to bitterness. Yet those words seemed to be burning into my soul, and came ringing in my ears again and again, 'the power of the name of Jesus.' I went to bed that night hearing nothing but those words. In my troubled sleep they continued to fill my thoughts. When I arose in the morning it was with the determination to try and see if the name of Jesus would have any power in it to help me."

By this time the people were held spell-bound by the story. Earnestly the narrator continued: "As I went down Central Avenue and came to the corner of Richmond Street, I met some friends with whom I frequently took a morning drink at the saloon on that corner. I walked quickly to them and said: 'Boys, I have decided to become a follower of Jesus.' At first they looked as if they thought it a joke. Then when they saw I was sincere, they looked as if they thought me crazy, and turning toward the saloon, said: 'Well, good-day,

WE HAVE NO MORE USE FOR YOU.'

Left on the side-walk alone, my sensations cannot be decribed. I had simply uttered the name, Jesus, and it made me free from temptation in a moment! I felt like a man just set free from prison, and walked on, scarcely knowing what to do next. Then remembering that it was a Young Men's Christian Association meeting from which I had gained so much, I went to the secretary of the Association, who led me that morning to give my heart to Jesus Christ. From that day I have been a new man."

The impression made by that story was profound. At the close of the meeting some men remained in response to his appeal to them to test this blessed power of the name of Jesus. I became acquainted with this new friend, and found that he was going to the Irwin Mission almost every night, saying to men who were down as he had been: "I know all about your case, and I know the way out." He was devoting his life to the salvation of men. The love of Christ constrained him, and he was instrumental in saving many souls through the years that I knew him in that city. Some months later I met him one day, his face

GLOWING WITH A GREAT JOY.

Then he told me that in his days of dissipation his wife was compelled to leave him, and that when he became converted he wrote and asked her to come to him again. She replied that she could not trust him until after a year of fidelity to the new life. He said it was reasonable to ask it, and the year was past, and his home was complete again, this time with a family altar. I never saw a happier man. He was verily a new creature in Jesus Christ.

We speak of miracles in the days of Christ; but this is a modern miracle of grace, and a standing manifestation of the power and grace of God in the salvation of immortal souls. But we must be faithful to note how this man himself did those things which made available to him the blessings of divine grace. In the first place he made an honest test of the matter. Then he openly confessed his purpose to his friends. There was no hesitation when once the decision had been made. Following this came a final cutting away from his old companions. Too many attempt to hold to old companions and take Christ. It cannot be done so long as the companions will not come to Christ also.

But this earnest man pressed forward in his new life. He came in the years that I knew him to know his Bible as well as most men. But most significant of all, he began at once to labour for the salvation of souls. He was burdened for souls, and all of his hours, not devoted to his regular profession, were filled with this blessed task of striving to win souls unto God. Too many enter upon a professed Christian life without these elements of sincerity which develop steadfastness and power.—Dr. H. A. Johnston in "Men."

The National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children, 164, Shaftesbury Ave., W., have this week received a number of deserving cases from various parts of the metropolis and the provinces. In one instance, the Society's enquiry officer found a widow and family in a little dark room at the top of a building in Clerkenwell. The poor woman was quite unfit to work, and two of her children were already in Highgate Infirmary. Her son of eleven years was immediately received by the Refuges. One little fellow from Stratford had lost his mother, and the father having just had a paralytic stroke was helpless, and unable to support his family of five children. A widow with eight young children secured admission for two of them forthwith, her case being strongly recommended by a councillor of the city of Bristol. A Rochester widow left with twelve children was also helped, she herself being in an asylum.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, Feb. 12. Leviticus xxii.

IT is impossible to read these chapters without being impressed by the recurring refrain, "I am the Lord (Jehovah), which sanctify you." It seems as though God would impress upon us all his great end in our redemption, and the means by which alone it can be realised. These two are embraced in the closing words of the present chapter: "I am the Lord which hallow you, that brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God."

God's object in redeeming us by the precious blood of the Lamb was that we may be holy; first, because He knows that only as we are holy can we be truly blessed. Most of the anguish and pain of our life comes from the conflict between our will and his, which would cease as soon as we willed his will perfectly.

Moreover, God wants holy men and women to stand before Him and do his work in the world. His holy will cannot fulfil itself perfectly through defiled and filthy channels. Therefore the solemn injunctions of this chapter about ceremonial uncleanness and physical defect should be deeply pondered by us. They have their spiritual correlatives. Let us be absolutely separate from all that would unfit us for the loftiest intercession and service, cleansing ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

But when we have done all, we must remember that holiness is not negative only, but positive. It depends on God's indwelling. He, and He alone, in the person of Jesus, through the Holy Spirit, and by his personal indwelling, can make us holy.

MONDAY, Feb. 13. Leviticus xxiii.

The year of Israel's national life was full of high and blessed convocations, which served to preserve the idea of national unity, kept the nation in mind of the great events of the past, and kindled lofty and inspiring ideals and enthusiasms. There is a divine precedent, therefore, in the observance of the Christian year, with its holy services and commemorations.

The weekly Sabbath of solemn rest reminds us also of the Rest of God, into which we are invited.

The Passover, in the first month, tells us that we must date our true life from the moment when we make personal application of the blood of sprinkling.

The first Sheaf of the New Harvest solemnly waved before God, whilst it fills our hearts with glad memory of the resurrection of Him who was raised as the first fruits of them that sleep, fills us still more with anticipation of the hour, not far distant now, when the dead in Christ shall be raised in the likeness of his glorious body.

The Presentation of the Loaves of the New Harvest reminds us of the first fruits of the Spirit; and tells us that what the Holy One did for the early Church is but a pattern and pledge of all that He waits to do for his people in all ages.

The Day of Atonement can never be out of our thoughts, who know that we have peace through Christ's most precious death. Of course there is no need to work, but every need to afflict the soul with pensive memories while we rest in the assurance of acceptance through his finished work. And, lastly, the Feast of Tabernacles recalls our perpetual condition as pilgrims and strangers who have here no abiding city, and whose frail tabernacles must soon be dissolved as the house, not made with hands, is entered.

TUESDAY, Feb. 14. Leviticus xxiv.

"Before the Lord." Twice we have these words. The pure lamp, emblematic of the shining of his people; and the shewbread, emblematic of their lives of devotion and obedience, were to be "before the Lord" continually. We are reminded of the command to Abram, "Walk before Me and be thou perfect;" and of the words of the dying Jacob, "The God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk."

This means, first, a continual consciousness of God. We all possess what may be termed a sub-consciousness. Underneath our ordinary consciousness, which reflects the panorama of daily life, as it passes before us, there is a deeper, innermost perception of things which may not be present to any natural sense. Suppose you are in a room with a large number of people amongst whom there is one you tenderly love. You may be chatting with, and listening to the remarks of, the one nearest you; but all the time you are most sensitive to what he is saying or doing, and how he looks, who is more to you than all others. So are our thoughts of God when we walk before Him.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 15. Leviticus xxv.

"A Sabbath of solemn rest for the land." First-rate farmers and gardeners have told me that nothing so enriches and replenishes the land as to let it lie fallow. I have been informed that mill and grind stones which are disused for one day in seven will not fly so soon as those which are kept rotating without intermission. And this provision in Canaan would, no doubt, have kept the land in the best possible condition, whilst in the interim God pledged Himself that there should be no lack (21). How often we refuse the necessary rest times in our lives, meant to bring us into touch with God Himself, because we have so much necessary work to attend to; whereas, if we were to seek his kingdom and glory first, all these things would be added!

"A Jubilee unto you." This also was a wise provision, which prevented the stamping out of the smaller landowners and the accumulation of the land into the hands of a few wealthy holders. Though a man had been compelled, by the stress of his circumstances, to sell himself or his little farm to some wealthy creditor, when the fiftieth year came round he was at liberty to go forth free without money. And there was no claim on the part of his creditor on him or his estate. With what joy must thousands have heard the notes of the trumpet sounding out over the land. Such is the proclamation of the Gospel, which tells us that, in Jesus, we regain more than Adam lost; that as sin reigned unto death, so grace might reign unto eternal life.

THURSDAY, Feb. 16. Leviticus xxvi.

There is a vast contrast between the ideal life of the first thirteen verses of this chapter and the remainder; just the distinction which God makes between a life of obedience and faith, and one of disobedience and disbelief. How many of his people are living the latter when they are called to the former!

Doubtless your own experience might be altered, in principle at least, before you cease reading these paragraphs if you would take these steps: 1st. Ascertain wherein you are not walking in all God's commandments or keeping his statutes, but are walking contrary to Him. 2nd. Confess your iniquity, and the iniquity of your fathers, and all wherein you have walked contrary to Him. 3rd. Return to God in the path of true consecration and obedience. 4th. Dare to believe that He does undertake to bring you into full blessedness. Say in your heart: "By no effort of mine can I seize on all these blessings for myself, but I yield myself to God that He may realise them in and for me." Then God will come, and will not keep silence.

God has brought us out that He may bring us in. The God who led Israel through the Red Sea was He who took them through the Jordan into Canaan, and was prepared to keep them there. And He who converted and brought you to Himself years ago is able to communicate and maintain those blessed experiences that the soul longs after.

FRIDAY, Feb. 17. Leviticus xxvii.

There is one announcement in this chapter so emphatic and pertinent to our own experience that it stands out amid all the other exhortations and enactments. "No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, whether of man, or beast, or field, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord."

Let each reader ask, "Have I devoted—i.e., yielded or presented—myself to the Lord?" If not, let Him have all, to do with you whatsoever He please. Hand over to Him all your heart with its power of love, and the objects on which that love is centred; your soul, with its interests, ambitions, and aims; your mind, with its intellectual capacities and acquisitions; your strength, i.e., the energy of your nature; your influence, your money, your time, be it longer or shorter. Do with all what Potiphar did when he made Joseph overseer in his house and put all he had into his hands.

He will keep what you devote. Any hand that shall be put forth to injure you shall be paralysed, as Jeroboam's was when he attempted to arrest the Lord's prophet. Yea, the Holy Spirit will maintain the consecration intact, even from your own mistakes and sins.

He will bless what you devote. From the time that Potiphar made Joseph overseer over all that he had, the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house and in the field. So God will bless the consecrated soul which is yielded entirely to Christ's ownership.

SATURDAY, Feb. 18. Numbers i.

First Leviticus, with its constitution of the priesthood, sacrifices, and feasts; then the Book of Numbers, which tells of the ordering of the people into hosts: "all that are able to go forth to war." When we are right with God, we can go forth to follow the Lamb, as He goes forth to make war on sin and evil. "These shall war against the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for He is Lord of lords and King of kings; and they also shall overcome that are with Him, called and chosen and faithful."

Before we can serve as soldiers we must be able to tell our pedigree. We cannot fight for God so long as there is any uncertainty about our standing. Can you declare your pedigree, above and beyond all human ancestry, because you have been born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God? For as many as receive the Son of God into their hearts have the right to account themselves as sons of God. All men may be described as his offspring, but the word sons is to be read in the light of the Son. Because we are sons God has sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying "Abba Father." Then we are able to go forth to war because we have been numbered amongst God's beloved children, and have heard Him say: "Ye shall be my sons and daughters."

Protestantism in the 16th Century.

IV. Nicholas Ridley and the Lord's Supper.

By MARGARET A. ROLLESTON.

IN the 16th century the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper formed the centre of the great controversy which has divided Christendom into two camps. It was because they "would not go a-massing" that the martyrs suffered death in the reign of Mary; and though at the present crisis we hear more about Romish vestments, images and the confessional than of conflicting doctrines about the Sacrament, yet the whole matter really revolves round the sacred ordinance in which we commemorate the central truth of our religion.

If we accept the doctrine that a mystic change, whether transubstantiation or consubstantiation, takes place after the words of consecration, then follows the theory of a priesthood endowed with powers not conferred upon the laity; and also the disparagement of the authority of the Bible as compared with that of the Church, together with stress laid upon outward rights and ceremonies, rather than on the need of inward change. As Cranmer says, "The taking away of beads, pilgrimages, pardons, and such like Popery was but the lopping of a few branches, which would soon spring up again unless the roots of the tree, which were transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass, were pulled up."

Such being the case, it is more than ever important in the present crisis to have

which our Lord ordained to bring us into evident union with Himself and with our fellow Christians. Next to the study of the Bible there is no reading better suited to strengthen our spiritual and intellectual armoury against the subtle attacks of modern Romanisers than a study of the writings of our English Reformers. On this special subject of the Sacrament the teaching of Bishop Ridley, martyr in the reign of Mary, is most instructive; for to him under God was due the deliverance of the English Church from the superstitious doctrine of transubstantiation.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY was a learned man, and in his lifetime was regarded as the most dangerous foe Rome had to meet. He was born about the year 1502 in Northumberland, where in his boyhood he was witness of many a border fight. At Cambridge he won the highest university honours, and in 1540 was made Master of Pembroke College. He was then known as a lover of Scripture, a skilful debater, an opponent of the Papacy, and as learned in the writings of the early fathers, but still a supporter of the cardinal doctrines of the old Church. It was not till 1545 that, owing to his reading a treatise on the Sacrament written by a monk, Bertram, of the 9th century, that his belief in transubstantiation was shaken. That caused him "to search more diligently and exactly both the Scriptures and the writings of the old ecclesiastical fathers," and he learnt how subversive of true Christianity was a doctrine which detracted from the completeness of Christ's sacrifice offered once for all. Convinced himself, he spoke to Cranmer on the subject, with the result of "drawing him quite from his former opinion."

The accession of Edward VI. brought the Reformers into power. Ridley was made bishop, first of Rochester and then of London, and in the reforms of the young King we can trace the influence of his teaching.

ALTARS WERE REPLACED BY TABLES, and though in the first Prayer Book the name "altar" was still retained, it was surely, as Ridley said, only because a "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving" was offered at the time when the Sacrament was administered. In the second Prayer Book the name "table" replaced that of "altar;" and may we not legitimately infer that it was done to prevent any erroneous doctrine being taught on the nature of the Sacrament, and not, as some High Churchmen would have us believe, that the teaching connected with the word "altar" was retained, and that, therefore, the name itself was abandoned only for the sake of conciliating the Protestants?

On the accession of Mary, Ridley was thrown into prison, and finally sealed his protest against the unscriptural teaching of Rome by his death at the stake. "It is not" he declared when a prisoner, "any ceremony for the which we contend; but it toucheth the very substance of our whole religion—yea even Christ Himself." We must turn to his writings (his "Brief Declaration of the Lord's Supper," recently edited by Dr. H. C. G. Moule; his "Determination," his Conference with Latimer, &c.) to see how he supports this contention.

First, he turns to the Bible, and examines the accounts given in the Gospels and also by St. Paul of the institution of the sacred ordinance. He points out that after consecration the words "bread and wine" are still used (Matt. xxvi. 29, 1 Cor. xi. 26); that special stress is laid upon the commemorative character of the rite (Luke xxii. 20, 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25); and that the institution has the character of a feast and not of a sacrifice. He shows from John vi. 62, that Christ foretold his ascension in order to remove the difficulty that a literal interpretation of his words in John vi. 53 would cause, and that He distinctly stated that his teaching must be understood spiritually (John vi. 63).

But the Mass is, as Ridley goes on to prove, more than unscriptural; it is actually derogatory to the central truth of the Christian religion, for its supposed propitiatory character does away with offered "once for all." It is also idolatrous, for the bread and wine are worshipped as God. In the use of a tongue not understood by all, in "the breaking of the Lord's commandment in not having a communion," and in the refusal of the cup to the laity, Ridley saw a system which would hide the Saviour from a sin-stricken world. Turning from the Bible, Ridley quotes the authorities of early Church writers, to show that in the first centuries the Christians did not hold the doctrine of transubstantiation. "Christ's mystical body is the congregation of Christians," and not the bread and wine used in the Lord's Supper; but nevertheless the Sacrament should be received with great reverence, for a "promise of grace" has been made to those who receive it worthily. The value of the Sacrament he declares to depend on the faith of the receiver, and though the bread and wine undergo no change, nor have "grace transfused into them," yet they are holy, because set apart for use in a solemn rite.

Such, then, was the doctrine for which Ridley, Latimer, and Cranmer laid down their lives. They truly, "with the bondage of their bodies, redeemed liberty of conscience" for us; and shall we, at the close of the nineteenth century, be "entangled again in the yoke of bondage" from which "Christ hath made us free"?

A mistake crept into a previous article on Tyndale. It was only the corpse of the great Reformer that was burnt. It was not "while the flames enveloped him," as stated, but as he was being tied to the stake before strangulation by the executioner, that Tyndale cried "Lord, open the King of England's eyes!"

Paris.—Lord Radstock writes to us telling of another meeting of workers in Paris for prayer, when God's presence and power were manifested. Many were blessed through the ministry of the Word by Pastors Tophel and Dubois. Another meeting is fixed for Saturday next. Lord Radstock adds that God is working in the hearts of many in France, and making them dissatisfied with Popery. It is believed that there are fifty to sixty ex-priests who are to-day either pastors or evangelists.

The Bishops and the Clergy.—In a letter to The Times on Tuesday, the Bishop of Hereford, writing as to the "Reservation of the Sacrament," says:—"If our Church is to maintain her position and to continue to exercise her legitimate, moral, and spiritual influence in the life of the nation, it is imperative that those clergy who defy their Bishop on this subject must somehow be brought either to make good their pretensions before the Archbishop, who has declared himself ready to give full consideration to every argument they can adduce, or else to obey the injunction of the united Episcopate that the Sacrament must not be reserved. Failing this, it is obvious that episcopal jurisdiction is practically at an end."

Protestant Demonstration.

GREAT MEETING IN ALBERT HALL.

THE Protestant Demonstration at the Albert Hall was in every sense a magnificent success. With earnest feeling, and, indeed, unbounded enthusiasm, the enormous audience, which densely crowded the great building, evidenced its resolve "to uphold and maintain the Protestantism of the nation, and to demand the suppression of the Mass and the Confessional in the Established Church."

Proceedings commenced with the reading of the 46th Psalm and the offering of prayer by Rev. H. E. Fox. Lord KINNAIRD, the Chairman, read, amid great cheering, sympathetic messages from the Bishops of Liverpool and Sodor and Man. "What," cried numberless voices, "about the other bishops?"

The speaker indicated the necessity of opening the eyes of the nation to the

to bring them back to Rome. They were not ashamed of being Protestants. It was no negation they were for, but it was for the positive truth. They were there to protest against priestcraft and the Mass. Amid loud and long expressions of assent the speaker declared that as the bishops did not administer the law, the people must compel them to do so.

Mr. H. MILLER, in giving convincing accounts of the wave of Protestant revival, said that there were 10,000 persons in the hall, and they had had to reject 5,000 applications for tickets. The demonstration had the support or the sympathy of over fifty Protestant societies or organisations. Delegates were present from more than seventy-five provincial organisations and representatives from 110 provincial towns, nearly every county in England being represented. Every class of society was represented, as well as the Churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland and their Nonconforming brethren. Mr. Miller added, amid general laughter, that he had also a telegram from the Manchester Protestant Thousand—"Just interviewed Balfour on lawlessness in the Church, and Roman Catholic University. He asks for patience."

Lord OVERTOUN moved—"That this meeting views with alarm and sorrow the extensive reintroduction throughout our land (1) of doctrines, rites, and ceremonies which were distinctly rejected by the English nation at the time of the Reformation, as being Romish inventions contrary to God's word; (2) of 'the sacrifices of masses' which were then declared to be and dangerous deceits; and (3) of the evils connected with the confessional, and as the bishops in too many cases appear unable or unwilling to arrest these mischievous abuses, this meeting hereby demands that the conduct of public worship by the clergy of the Established Church shall be brought within the limits imposed by law; and that public patronage be no longer employed for the furtherance of Romish principles."

Pastor CUFF, of Shoreditch Tabernacle, in seconding the resolution, declared that Nonconformists were with Protestant Churchmen in their protest. Mr. Kensit's action, Mr. Walsh's book, and the letters of Sir William Harcourt had dragged Ritualistic practices out of holes and corners into the light of day. "In the name of the Eternal God," he exclaimed with uplifted hands, "we will tolerate no other priesthood but that of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Mr. S. SMITH, M.P., supported the resolution, and said that in the National Church almost every doctrine and ceremony of the Church of Rome was taught openly, without disguise. What he believed was moving the people more than all else was the setting up of the confessional. He condemned the stocking of the bench of bishops

WITH ROMANISING PRELATES.

Government after Government, he said, had played into the hands of the Romanising party. The whole machinery of the Church for the last thirty years had been used to kill out the Protestant faith of this country. In his view, the root of the mischief lay in the training given in the theological colleges.

The resolution having been passed unanimously, Mr. Miller read a telegram which it was proposed to send to the Queen, praying the acceptance of a copy of Mr. Walsh's book, and that Her Majesty would direct Parliament to suppress Romish practices in the church and compel the bishops to enforce obedience. A remarkable display of loyalty and enthusiasm ensued, the entire audience rising as "God Save the Queen" was spontaneously struck up, and singing with energy; at this moment especially the hall presented a wonderful spectacle.

The telegram signed by Lord Kinnaird on behalf of the meeting, was duly dispatched, and Colonel Sandys, M.P., moved the next resolution—"That this meeting is of opinion that legislation is imperatively required (1) to compel obedience to the law, and (2) to give the laity free access to the courts of the realm, and hereby invokes the aid of Her Majesty's Government towards the passing of a Bill in order to secure these objects during the ensuing session of Parliament." A Bill had been drafted called the of 1899," and the Government would be asked to support it. It was a measure which was not too drastic, but it was very firm, and would compel immediate action against any clergyman who acted illegally.

After Mr. James Inskip, in seconding the resolution, had asserted that either the laity must have access to the courts or the laity would intrude into the churches, Mr. Austin Taylor, of Liverpool, in a telling "fighting" speech, declared that they could not trust the Bishops, but they could trust Parliament. The Bishops had had time enough.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe, on rising, was very warmly greeted. In the course of a speech characterised by great restraint, he dwelt on the militant character of the English Church Union, and the need for a great national counteracting movement, concluding by urging the laity not to listen to the blandishments of the Bishops, and to decline to subscribe until they knew how their money would be administered.

The claim for consideration on behalf of the Ritualists because of their talent and devotion he likened to a convicted felon appealing for consideration because of the talent and devotion with which he had committed his robbery.

Mr. C. W. Radcliffe Cooke, M.P., described the more inactive members of the Episcopate as "Bishops with a past," to whom it was useless to appeal since they were too busy courting the Scarlet Lady.

Lord Wimborne was called on to speak, but a large section of the audience, probably unaware of the fact that the use of the hall was only obtainable on condition that Mr. Kensit should take no part, loudly called for that gentleman, who expressed his objection to such a veto, but appealed for a hearing for Lord Wimborne, who, in a brief speech, advised Protestants to use the power of the purse and withhold their money.

The second resolution was carried unanimously, and the great demonstration was brought to a conclusion by re-singing the "National Anthem." Such a stirring gathering cannot but have a beneficent and stimulating effect upon the country at large.

The Gloucester Y.M.C.A. is engaged in a new building scheme, for which a company has been registered with a capital of £10,000, in £1 shares. The object of the company is to acquire the Spread Eagle Hotel, Gloucester, and to lease part of the same to the Trustees of the Gloucester Y.M.C.A. The Leicester Association has embarked upon a similar undertaking, the capital of the company in this case being £20,000.

Mr. D. A. Black, General Secretary of the Belfast Y.M.C.A., has concluded a mission to young men in connection with the Plymouth Association. Nightly a large number had to find accommodation on the landing and staircase of the Lecture Hall; very many having to leave, unable to find room. The workers were greatly cheered and encouraged by the results of the meetings; but the mission has again proved the need of extended premises.

Protestant Outlook.

At the confirmation, last week, of the election of Dean Williams to the bishopric of Bangor, Mr. Kensit entered a protest on the ground that the Bishop-elect had "deliberately appointed as an examining chaplain Canon Thomas, the Vicar of Holyhead, who is a member of a society for bringing back our Church and nation to the dark superstitions of the Church of Rome by introducing masses for the living and dead and setting up the abominable Confessional."

The feeling in the North of Ireland seems almost unanimously hostile to the proposal for a Roman Catholic University. The Earl of Erne, K.T., declares Mr. Balfour's letter to be a very astute but a very Jesuitical one, "worthy of Ignatius Loyola." Colonel Saunderson, M.P., addressing his constituents at Portadown, pronounced the scheme to be an incredible piece of fatuous insanity, which, if persevered with, would wreck the Government.

In another vigorous letter to The Times Sir William Harcourt suggests that responsible persons should formally and officially present to the bishops the most notorious and flagrant cases of violation of the law, with a demand that the same offenders be proceeded against. If, in such a case, the veto was interposed, he was prepared to take any measures, inside or outside of Parliament, that might be required "to abate a nuisance and repeal a Power which is so flagrantly abused, and to revoke a trust so unfaithfully administered." Sir William Harcourt said, in conclusion:—

I find some lawless gentlemen talk very glibly of disestablishment. I do not know if they have reflected that disestablishment will come in a very different shape from that which they contemplate at their ease. An unoffending clergy, which is disendowed on the principles of religious equality, is naturally and properly treated with liberality and generosity. But those considerations do not apply to a body of men who are dismissed by the nation on account of their lawless conduct. They need not lay the flattering unction to their souls that they are going to carry off the Protestant plant of that National Church in order to carry on their Romish manufactures. They are not to be allowed to occupy the parish churches or the cathedrals in which to erect confessionals and celebrate without restraint their high masses. They are not to be secured by life incomes, as commutation or compensation in the work of accomplishing the "conversion of England," out of the funds of the Protestant Establishment. These are the considerations on which the bishops and the clergy may with advantage reflect. Their time is short; their sands are running out; if they continue pusillanimously to shiver on the brink, their impaired authority will be finally extinguished, and the existence of the Church they have so ill-tended will be, and indeed is to-day, at stake.

Lord Halifax, writing on the "Crisis" in the Nineteenth Century, characterises Mr. Walsh's book as "a book of which it may be said, that if its facts are true its inferences are false." Now the whole force of the book is thrown into the facts, which need no one to draw inferences from them for the reader; and many readers, we fancy, would easily draw conclusions even beyond those set forth by Mr. Walsh. This ritualistic movement only needs to be known—the facts of its history only require to be lucidly and fairly stated—and the nation will quickly and truly draw the inferences. The first inference will be that Romanism cannot be tolerated in a State Church settled on a Protestant constitution.

A pressing duty at the present time is the circulation among young people of literature calculated to diffuse information and instruction regarding Protestant history. A generation ago a great work was done in this line by Dr. Merle-d'Aubigné's "History of the Great Reformation of the Sixteenth Century." In order to meet present demands, Messrs. Jarrold & Sons have published a new edition of this work, carefully abridged, so as to form one compact volume of five hundred pages. (2s. 6d.) Useful pamphlets dealing with current controversies include "Plain Words on Some Present-Day Questions," being four sermons preached in St. Peter-le-Bailey Church, Oxford, by Rev. Francis J. Chavasse, M.A., Principal of Wycliffe Hall (1s. Henry Frowde), dealing very ably with: (1) Confession of Sin, (2) the State of the Blessed Dead, (3) the Christian Ministry, and (4) the Lord's Supper. "Endowment of Roman Catholicism," by Rev. Thomas Connellan, is an important statement on the demand of the Irish Jesuits for a Papal university—serious facts and cogent arguments. (1d. "Catholic" Office, 51b, Dawson Street, Dublin.) "A Sacerdotal Ministry in the Christian Church—Unscriptural, Unprimitive, and High Treason against Christ," by Philip Valpy M. Filleul, M.A., of Upwey, Dorset. Strong in exposition and historical reference. (4d. Elliot Stock.)

The question of Ritualism was strongly in evidence at the meeting of the Liverpool Diocesan Church Building Society, owing to an application for a grant for a mission-room to St. Thomas's, Liverpool, a church where confession is openly taught and the ritual is extreme. It was held that the Rural Dean, who had vetoed the application, was exceeding his powers, and that the question of extreme ritual, however it might be objected to, should not militate against aid being given where, as in the case of St. Thomas's, it was much needed. The report disallowing the grant was carried.

Sir John Kennaway, speaking at Honiton, said there is a growing feeling of discontent and alarm at the reintroduction of doctrines and practices contrary to the Reformation settlement as found in the Prayer Book and the Articles of the Church of England. He felt confident that there would be a cry for short and sharp measures to deal with this state of things, and with those men who defied their bishops and claimed for themselves to be the judges of what was and what was not allowable.

A correspondent in Rome writes:—

The Vatican is following the Anti-Ritualist movement with lively interest, for the Pope has never renounced his project for a rapprochement with Anglicanism. Only lately he has devoted £16,000 to the establishment of an English college at Rome to receive converted Anglicans. The Pope is persuaded that the present crisis will indirectly serve the interests of Roman Catholicism, for he believes that many Ritualists who cannot remain in the Anglican Church will pass over to Rome.

The Y.M.C.A.

Taunton Association reports 384 members, ninety having been received during the year.

Y.M.C.A. work has begun in the Philippines, a Y.M.C.A. tent having been established at Manila for the American troops.

Blackburn Association reports 250 members. At the anniversary the collections realised £23. This will be spent on furnishing a sitting room.

A series of evangelistic services have been held at the Middlesborough Association, under the auspices of the North-Eastern District Union, by Messrs. W. M. Hudson, C. J. Dymond, and Henry Armstrong.

The Annual International Social Reception in connection with the Hackney Y.M.C.A. was given on the evening of February 2, on the invitation of Mr. W. H. Seagram. Upwards of thirteen nationalities were represented in the proceedings, which were marked by strong missionary interest and enthusiasm.

The Bristol Association has been the scene of great activity throughout the past week in consequence of a mission which Rev. W. Hay Aitken is holding in connection with that institution. Dinner-hour addresses have been given daily to business men in St. Peter's Church, and afternoon and evening meetings have been held in the Y.M.C.A. hall.

Birmingham Association reports a membership of 817, including the youths' branch, and a balance in hand of £2. This is the fourth year in succession that the year has been closed free of debt. The P.S.A. meetings for men, held at the Midland Institute, had an average attendance of nearly 600 during the winter and 354 during the summer.

The Bath Y.M.C.A., at a reception given by Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Thomas, gathered together in the Jubilee Hall on Monday week one of the largest assemblies of young men ever held in connection with the association. An address was given by Mr. W. Hind Smith. The Bath Daily Argus, in referring to the occasion, speaks of the strong hold that the association has upon the young men of the city.

The Rector of Exeter College, Oxford, gave a Reception in the building of the local Y.M.C.A. to celebrate the anniversary of the association. Mr. C. J. Procter, President of the Birkenhead Y.M.C.A., attended, and spoke of the wide ground covered by the association, expressing his intense sympathy with and interest in such work as this for young men and youths. Mr D. A. Black, of Belfast, gave a stirring address which aroused much enthusiasm among the large audience of men. The report indicated a year of vigorous work, the present membership being 561, with 275 members of the P.S.A. Society.

School for Bible Study.

It is a pleasure to be able to report that the meetings in connection with the Ten Weeks' School for Bible Study continue to grow. The gatherings last week were very largely attended, and in several instances the spacious buildings were crowded.

In the course of his addresses Professor White has occasionally referred to general matters that demand brief notice. (1) He disclaims any purpose of laying a track on which others should travel in Bible study; he is, on the contrary, exhibiting a method, to be used independently, and not slavishly, by students of the Holy Scriptures. (2) He has not been very ready in answering requests of friends that he should recommend works on Christian evidence, because he feels that what is urgently needed is study of the Bible itself in the light of history. The Book, when properly understood, is in itself an important element in

THE BODY OF CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE.

A person who refused to read the Bible because there was so much in it he could not accept, was afterwards induced to study it, with the result that he found much of which he was ignorant before, and witnessed the disappearance one by one of the difficulties which previously seemed so formidable. (3) Again, Dr. White pointed out that he did not lay himself out to decide controverted questions of doctrine. When so many were passing by the Bible altogether, he saw his path in stimulating people to get bird's-eye views of the material in general by a process of intelligent reading and study, always with a view to life and conduct being brought into subjection to the revealed will of God. Proceeding to deal with

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS,

Professor White showed its relation to the story of the Apostle Paul's career, as outlined in the Acts of the Apostles. Speaking broadly, the first twelve chapters of Acts are occupied with Peter's work among the Jews; and the remainder of the book with Paul's labours among the Gentiles. The latter period may be divided into two:—(a) Paul at liberty, making missionary journeys, and writing epistles to the churches at Thessalonica, Corinth, Galatia, and Rome; and (b) Paul in bonds, writing letters to the Philippians, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, also to Timothy and Titus. The Apostle dealt first with eschatology—to the Thessalonians (52, 53 A.D.); then with controversial subjects—to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians (57 and 58); afterwards with personal matters and Christological themes — to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians and Philemon (62 and 63); and finally with pastoral work—to Timothy and Titus (from 64 to 68). It was during his third missionary journey, as described in Acts xix. and xx., that Paul wrote to the Romans.

Proceeding to speak of the character of the Epistle, Dr. White contrasted Christianity with other great religions. The Gospel says—other religions say—"Do and live." Buddhism is morality without God; Hinduism, gods with immorality; Mohammedanism, God with immorality; Christianity, God with morality.

"LIVE AND DO";

Coming to the details of study, Dr. White recommended the association of chapters with outstanding facts and incidents in their contents, also suggested the condensation of the substance of chapters into a leading word. Though regarded as dealing with faith, the Epistle of Romans is not silent about works. In the first verse Paul speaks of himself as a servant, and says he received grace and apostleship "unto obedience of faith;" and the Epistle ends with the same striking expression (xvi. 26). The central sections are consistent with this, for in chapter xii. the Roman Christians were besought to present their bodies "a living sacrifice . . . . which is your reasonable service." The faith of which the Apostle speaks produces works of the only kind acceptable to God. It is consistent with the teaching of James, who denounces a faith that is barren, and commends a faith that is fruitful in good works. At the outset of his Epistle, Paul lays down an incontrovertible proposition—"The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Gentile" (i. 16). How does he develop this? Another proposition follows closely: "The wrath of God is revealed" (2-18). Between them comes another—"A righteousness of God is revealed." Examine the grounds of these statements. Note that it is three times recorded of the Gentiles that "God gave them up" (24, 26, 28).

Charts setting forth a detailed study of the Epistle having been distributed throughout the audience, Dr. White confined his attention to some of the larger facts that appear on an examination of the material. The object being to show how God saves men, the Apostle deals first with the condition of the heathen world, and then with the culpability of the Jews when brought to the Divine standard of rectitude. Forgiveness, as well as condemnation, is on a just basis with God—of whom we read that He is "righteous to forgive" (1 John i. 9, R.V.). Men talk of forgiveness on the ground of mercy; but God's forgiveness is on

THE GROUND OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Calling attention to Romans iii. 21—"apart from the law a righteousness of God hath been manifested"—Dr. White spoke of the place of Christ's resurrection and the Spirit's power in the scheme of salvation. The illustrations (from slavery and marriage) of chapters vi. and vii. were explained, and the relation of law to conduct was indicated. The function of law is not to relieve, but to reveal. What the law could not do, God did by sending his Son; and if we let Christ work in us, we shall find that "the requirement of the law will be fulfilled in us," as we "walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

At the Polytechnic, on Wednesday afternoon, Professor White rehearsed the characteristics of the Evangelists, preliminary to the study of

LUKE'S GOSPEL.

The general story of Christ's life may be thrown into nine stages:—

1. Thirty years' obscurity.
2. Early years' ministry.
3. Early Judæan ministry.
4. First period of Galilean ministry.
5. Second period of Galilean ministry.
6. Third period of Galilean ministry.
7. Perean ministry.
8. Last events (or Passion Week).
9. Forty days.

The Third Gospel is the work of a careful observer, who on many occasions shows the physician's mind. Mark opens with Jesus as a grown man; and, writing for Roman readers, presents us with a picture of action and accomplishment. Matthew speaks of Jesus from the point of view of his kingship, giving his genealogy from Abraham and David. Luke, writing an account for cultured Greeks, gives us the Gospel of Humanity; he uses the term Son of Man, and traces the Saviour back to Adam, who is called the Son of God. The principal contents of the chapters were indicated as follows:—

Chap.	Chap.	Chap.
1. John Baptist; Two Songs.	9. Transfiguration	17. "Unprofitable Servants."
2. Birth of Jesus; Other two songs.	10. Good Samaritan	18. Unjust Judge.
3. Baptism and Genealogy.	The Seventy.	19. Parable of the Pounds.
4. Temptation; Sermon at Nazareth.	11. Disciples taught to pray.	20. Parable of the Husbandmen.
5. Sermon in boat.	12. Warnings.	21. Lord's Second Coming.
6. Sermon on level place.	13. Infirmity 18 years.	22. Lord's Supper.
7. } Two Resurrections.	14. Dropsy case and Supper.	23. Lord's Death.
8. }	15. "Lost Things."	24. Lord's Resurrection.
	16. Steward; Rich Man.

Luke's is the Gospel of Joy; there are melodies in its opening chapters, and it concludes with the statement that, Christ having been taken from them, the disciples "returned to Jerusalem with great joy, and were continually in the Temple praising and blessing God." Observe also this note of joy in the "lost things" chapter (xv.). The object of these parables is made clear from the opening verses. Christ justifies his compassion for the lost. The story of the Prodigal Son is closely followed by that of the Prodigal Rich Man. No one of the Gospels is intended to be a biography; each is a picture from the life, adapted to a particular class of hearers or readers. Luke depicts the ideal Man—the Divine Man—in a way that specially appealed to the artistic Greek mind.

A large proportion of this Gospel is not found elsewhere. This is the Universal Gospel—the most "evangelistic" of the four. The hand of the physiologist is often apparent in deeply interesting touches. Here we read of Christ being subject to his parents; among other tokens of sympathy is special mention of women and children; and here we read the story of the Good Samaritan. The prayerful life of Christ is frequently brought out to view—at his baptism, transfiguration, and in Gethsemane (iii. 21, ix. 29, xxii. 44). The last touch of the picture presents Christ with outstretched hands blessing his disciples; and that is his abiding attitude towards all who love Him.

At Mildmay, on Thursday, in his Old Testament course, Dr. White continued to study the prophets of the Divided Monarchy. In a few words he sketched the career of HOSEA.

Three striking things were pointed out in the book of Hosea: (1) The frequent reference to Israel as Ephraim, the particular tribe, the strongest, being used to imply the whole; (2) the immoral condition of affairs in Israel; (3) the broken style of the prophet; his book seeming to be almost composed of cries expressive of disappointed love. As we read the denunciations of sin, we must conclude that there were tears in the prophet's eyes. God only sends judgment as a last resource: "O Ephraim, how can I give thee up? O Israel, how shall I deliver thee?" As to the first and third chapters, Dr. White understood them to describe the actual experience of the prophet, thus brought into deep sympathy with God. The idolatry of Israel was spoken of as harlotry, and God's disappointment with his people was indicated by the prophet's sad experience.

THE PROPHECIES OF ISAIAH, especially with reference to the first twelve chapters, were then outlined. Having read chapter vi. Professor White pointed out that first the prophet saw God, then himself and his surroundings. Next came confession of sin, followed by cleansing. Being thus ready to go whithersoever God might wish, he replied to the Divine call, "Here am I, send me!" The message was a great one—"Go, tell this people. Hear ye, indeed, but understand not." The result of the preaching was hardening. The people had, in fact, doomed themselves; Ahaz, the king, seeking a foreign alliance rather than listening to the words of the prophet of Jehovah. To outward appearance the prophets of Jehovah were all failures; the nation heeded the false prophets in preference, although, of course, there were, all along, individuals who were faithful and true.

Taking the book as he found it, Dr. White adopted the following division:—Chapters i. to xxxv., speaking generally, poetic and prophetic—the latter word not implying prediction alone, but preaching with reference to past, present, and future; xxxvi.-xxxix., historical; xl.-lxvi., prophetic. Sub-divisions having been indicated, as suggested by substance and style, Dr. White pointed out the way in which the prophet passed from present instruction to future promise and threat — proximate or distant. Chapter ii. gives a summary of the prophet's preaching. Asking why chapter vi., with its wonderful should be just where it is in the book—why the account of the prophet's call should stand where it does—Dr. White had a thoughtful suggestion. Like as the people of Israel challenged Amos for his authority to prophesy unpleasant things concerning them, so the grossly immoral but very religious people to whom Isaiah preached asked him why he troubled himself about their affairs. The story of the vision of Jehovah answers the question:—He was sent by God. Herein is found the secret of power and devotion to duty. The prophets saw God, and were faithful to Him in a dark and sinful age.

THE LATE

Dr. C. A. Berry.

THE death of the Rev. Dr. Berry, briefly announced in our last issue, has not only robbed the Congregationalist body of a trusted leader, but has caused sincere mourning in other and far wider Christian circles. Though Dr. Berry had been in poor health for some time, death came unexpectedly—in fact, with quite tragic suddenness. Despite suffering from heart affection, the energetic minister was full of engagements at the beginning of last week. He preached on the Sunday in his church, Queen-street, Wolverhampton, and on Monday he spoke briefly at a public meeting in connection with the Jubilee Free Library in Wolverhampton Town Hall.

Between and after these engagements he consulted a doctor regarding symptoms of an ominous nature, but it was thought that care and treatment would remedy the weakness. On Tuesday morning there was a wedding at Queen-street Chapel, at which Dr. Berry officiated. Returning home, he almost immediately left for Bilston to officiate at the funeral of Dr. Totherick, a late member of his church, who had been his attendant all through his illness. The funeral service was held at the Wesleyan Chapel, where Dr. Berry delivered a beautiful address, speaking for some twenty minutes. At the close, while offering prayer, he fell back unconscious. Several medical men being present, he had instant care and attention, but it was found that his spirit had fled.

Great consternation was caused by the suddenness of Dr. Berry's death. The labours of the few preceding days had led many to indulge the hope of his speedy recovery from the nervous prostration from which he suffered last year. As will be remembered, after a period of enforced retirement he resumed work with the New Year, although impressed with the fact that he was only on the threshold of convalescence. Apart from his nervous prostration, he was afflicted with angina pectoris, from which during the last twelve months he suffered acute pain, being frequently torn with paroxysms of agony. He knew that his life was uncertain, and often used to say, "I shall go off in one of these attacks."

On a former occasion we gave a sketch of the brilliant career of Charles Albert Berry. A native of Leigh, in Lancashire, and born in 1852, he was early converted to God, and took up Sunday-school work. Realising his vocation for the Gospel ministry, he entered Airedale College at the age of seventeen, and there he speedily made his mark, intellectual gifts and manliness of character combining to impress all who knew him with a sense of his personal sincerity and future usefulness. A splendid career was predicted for him, alike by professors and fellow-students, when, before the termination of his college course, he accepted the pastorate of St. George's-road Church, Bolton. For nine years he laboured in that busy Lancashire town, making a name as an acceptable platform speaker as well as a reputation for vigorous pulpit oratory.

In 1883 Dr. Berry removed to Wolverhampton, where, as pastor of the Queen-street Church, he found his true and suitable sphere. Besides a large body of communicants and an influential congregation, he had the oversight of several "branch churches with separate officers." These places have accommodation for 2,680 worshippers; the parent chapel seats 1,250. To get through the work, he had the aid of two assistants, with several laymen. The place became the centre of growing activity and ever-widening usefulness, the "driving power" being faith in the great verities of the Gospel. Along with speaking power, Dr. Berry possessed the art of an organiser and manager of men; and in this line his geniality and brotherliness stood him in good stead.

Among other incidents by which Dr. Berry was brought prominently under public notice may be mentioned the invitation that was sent him to succeed Henry Ward Beecher as minister of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, U.S.A., an invitation which he declined, to the great satisfaction of the British churches. He had preached and lectured with great acceptance in America, but he was disinclined to settle there. His abilities were fully recognised at home. In 1897 he was elected Chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. It was a great distinction for a young man of forty-five. During his year of office he consecrated himself to the service of the churches, being specially considerate of the welfare and comfort of causes carried on against great odds in distant country places. Dr. Berry was also first president of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, and he was untiring in his energies to advance the objects of that great organisation.

From a photograph by Mr. Bennett Clark, Wolverhampton.

After the Birmingham meetings of the Congregational Union in 1897, Dr. Berry paid a memorable visit to America, seeking mental refreshment and renewing old acquaintances. But he was not allowed to rest during his stay on the other side. In thirty-five days he delivered 101 speeches, lectures, and sermons. Wherever he went, he received ovations, and made profound impressions by his magnificent appeals for brotherly relations between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon family. He was welcomed by the President, and was invited to open Congress in both Houses as chaplain. It was on returning to England after this triumphal course through America that his health broke down.

Wolverhampton was in mourning on Saturday when the mortal remains of the deceased preacher were interred with every tribute of public honour and Christian esteem. Deputations were present from all parts of the kingdom, a number of clergymen of the Establishment standing alongside the large company of Free Church ministers. Among those who took part were—Dr. Mackennal, Professor Shearer, and Rev. Eric Lawrence.

In the course of a touching address, Dr. Mackennal said:—

The secret of Berry's influence—an influence unique among our Churches of this generation — was his personal charm. Intellectual power he had, promptitude in action, the sense of language, and great aptitude of thought. He was frank, he was thorough, he was brave; single-eyed, simple-hearted, patient, strong. But the inmost man was distinguished by an exquisite tenderness; he was tender in affection, tender of conscience, he had a great tenderness of faith. His masterful speech concealed from the world his sensitive soul; those who knew him best were aware that he spoke so vehemently, not because he was trying to bear down all before him, but because he himself was borne along by force of conviction and fervent purpose.

He was a man of fresh sensibilities, full of sympathy. The special quality of this sympathy marked Berry out from all the men I have known. It was spontaneous, not responsive merely; it did not wait to be evoked, it poured itself out by its own impulse. How lavish he was of his affection all his friends know. He was followed throughout his brilliant career by a large number of early companions, fellow students, contemporaries in the ministry, whom he had won to himself, who followed his lead unhesitatingly, and to whom he was the same Charles Berry as before.

He came into the society of older men as one who had a right there; a right they soon acknowledged when they saw how gifted, how honourable, how able, how trustworthy he was. There was another element in his character, which can only be lightly touched on here, but which must not be omitted, because it was the ripest element, the root of all he was, the inspiration and the source of all he did—he was a man of intense, reverent, awe-touched spiritual life.

Oxford Notes.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

INTERESTING light on the subject of missions in China was thrown by the Professor of Chinese on Friday in his inaugural lecture. In tracing the relations of China in the past with foreign Powers, he said that two religious influences from the West had touched China—Buddhism and Roman Catholicism—but that all traces of the old Roman Catholic Mission had disappeared, and the spiritual power of Buddhism had died. If it is a question of the survival of the fittest can we doubt the issue? Jesus shall reign in China.

At a meeting held in Wesley Memorial Church on Wednesday, on behalf of Home Missions, Rev. E. Smith stated that it was a matter of indescribable sadness that home missions were still so necessary, and there was something sad in the thought that the masses of our fellow men at home have still to be won for Christ.

Councillor Salter has been appointed President of the Y.M.C.A. in succession to Mr. Robinson Souttar. It has been felt for some time that a local president was necessary to the well-being of the work, and in Mr. Salter the society will have one whose interests are in the higher aims of the society, and sympathies with the spiritual side of the work.

Dr. Comandi's Work in Florence.—This good work consists of a Protestant Industrial Home, where destitute boys are clothed, fed, educated, and taught some trade by which to gain a living. There is also, a few miles in the country, a large agricultural school, where the boys are instructed in all that would make them good, practical farmers, and which, it is hoped, may soon be self-supporting. Evangelisation work, too, is carried on by Dr. and Madame Comandi, through Sunday schools, meetings, and by visiting the poor in their homes and in the hospitals. Many may not know how seriously ill Dr. Comandi was during last summer, although now able to return to his work. The current expenses of the Orphanage are heavier than they would be if all those who sent children there continued to pay for them according to agreement; but many, from various causes, have ceased doing so; therefore, the strain on Dr. Comandi is great, but at the same time he feels that he cannot send these children adrift, as they would at once fall into the hands of the Jesuits. May I again awaken kind interest in this work which God has so signally blessed? (Mrs.) S. Leigh Bayley, Park House, Farnborough.

Woman's Work in India.

A GLIMPSE OF LUDHIANA.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer.

THROUGH fields of yellow mustard, over the sandy beds of great rivers, past mud-walled villages, the train brings us to Ludhiana. The railway line runs parallel with the great military road from Peshawar. Friends are waiting on the platform, and everything is prepared that we may make as much as possible of three brief hours before we take up the mail for Agra.

Two Gordon Highlanders leave the train with us. They have had such a blessing at Lahore that they must needs accompany us here en route for their station at Umballa. When they presently sit at a table with a white cloth on it, and have tea poured from a teapot, they say that it reminds them of "mother," and their hearts rise to their mouths. They tell me that many of their comrades go to the canteen, and worse places, because they have no encouragement to do better. They will be well served here, however, for one of these Christian gentlewomen, whom I am to visit, is the child of a British soldier of some position. His sword hangs on the wall of the dining-saloon, and his memory has led her to prepare a soldiers' room near the camping-ground, so that they may obtain refreshments and hear the Gospel. She also visits in the soldiers' hospital.

A WARM-HEARTED IRISHWOMAN,

I can easily understand the secret of her popularity. She says she wants copies of The Christian, Leisure Hour, Sunday at Home, &c., for the soldier lads. Send them; only send them regularly. Miss Pogson, Ludhiana, Punjab, India, will be a sufficient address.

The horse is spirited and fresh; we drive swiftly through the streets, which are deserted and uninteresting; the turbaned man-servant shouts shrilly to the bullock carts and stately swarthy men to get out of our way. We pass the new hospital which is being erected to the memory of Miss Bessie Greenfield by her family and friends for the diseases of women and children. It will make up sixty beds, and is badly wanted. A sharp turn brings us through the gateway; we drive through a garden, and draw up at the one-storied building. This is the Ludhiana Medical School, which has been established for some 20 years, and is now under general direction of Miss Greenfield, who lives in the adjoining bungalow, and of Dr. Edith Brown, a thoroughly qualified lady-doctor, who is resident here. She is assisted by two fully qualified medical ladies, Dr. Eleanor Dodson and Miss Thornett, L.S.A. They are overworked, and need at least three more to share their labours.

WHO WILL VOLUNTEER?

And then, who will support those who volunteer?

It is difficult to enumerate all the work being done from this centre, or the immense blessing accruing to the women of India, through the instrumentality of these earnest and efficient Christian ladies. In the first place, there are twenty-five natives Christian girls, sent here by missionaries in all parts of India, who are being trained for medical work. Thirteen are taking a full medical course, and will obtain diplomas; nine are being trained as nurses, the others as compounders for dispensaries, &c.

As we pass, I notice twenty native midwives sitting around their teacher and being instructed to renounce their cruel and barbarous methods. So great is the importance that the Government attaches to this department, that it sets apart funds for the defrayal of any loss a woman may sustain in the exercise of her profession in attending these classes, that she may be able to attend them with an easy mind. A Bible lesson is always interpolated with the other instruction.

This is the hospital: lofty, spacious, clean, sweet. I am glad that most of the beds happen to be empty, but this is an exception. The amount of medical work done at this place, and in the three dependent dispensaries, is something surprising. Last year at one village 2,000 cases, at another 2,000, in the city between 12,000 and 15,000. Think of what is meant by 233 major operations—that is, those which required the administration of anæsthetics—and 1,100 minor operations!

I am shown the lecture-rooms, the isolation ward, and the laboratory. But I must not stay. As we pass from one to another we speak of the through ignorance of the simplest facts of medical science, wounds left open and uncleansed for days, and full of vermin; children's eyes unopened for weeks and covered by flies; sores so feculent that the poor patients must be kept in the open air of the compound; limbs dropping off because of the close, tight swathing which has stopped bleeding, but at the same time induced mortification. Oh, love of Christ, how strong and beautiful is thy reproduction in the hearts and labours of these gentle Christian women, so that they are willing to touch wounds from which all others shrink! though they confess that they are often obliged to turn away to overcome a natural and uncontrollable nausea, which is for a moment only, and from which they return to their beneficent ministry!

Across the narrow dividing lane is Miss Greenfield's "home." I use that word with intention, for she counts India as her country, speaks of the interests of the Punjabis as "ours." On the front of her house, immediately facing the main road, is the native chapel, whose pastor is held in much respect in the Punjab. Instituted originally by the American Presbyterians, to whom the initiation of so much of this work is due, this church is now self-supporting.

Though it is Monday afternoon, the building is filled by a native audience, singing now a native hymn, now one of Sacred Songs and Solos,—"He leadeth me." Two prayers, and I rise to speak to them by interpretation. "Be very simple," my interpreter says, nervous of his understanding my English. But he need not have cautioned me, as he is an apt English speaker. Then we dismiss all but those who understand English. Quite a large number remain, mostly girls from the medical school. I tell them that is its evangelisation by its own children, and urge them to receive that baptism of the Holy Spirit which alone can equip them for so stupendous and, to man's judgment, impossible an achievement. Their dark, lustrous eyes are fixed on me, and an evident emotion has touched them as we bow in prayer.

We hasten to the house as the sun is setting. "What is that semicircle of stone, raised above the garden surface?" "Ah, we sit there in the hot weather; it is the only way of being sure that you are not sitting on serpents." The verandah opens directly on the central room, as in most of these native houses, and to this the other rooms are adjacent. The oil lamp stands kindled on the table in the middle of the room; and its light falls on the mail—just come in. As I see the gleam of joy in those eyes, and notice the pleasure that letters bring to these far-off workers, I am filled with remorse as I remember my tardiness, and resolve to write more carefully to those whom I know on the field. There is one of the little group who looks disappointed and sad. She has nothing, and had nothing last mail. I espy The Christian under two covers, and other papers well-known, but three weeks old. On the walls are home portraits, texts, Mildmay illuminations. In the open hearth logs of wood are burning merrily. Cosy chairs and touches of womanly refinement are all around. But

NOTHING IS EXTRAVAGANT.

Dinner, cooked by a native Christian, is handed round by grave turbaned servants. We talk of the work being done by each of this little colony of Christian ladies—Miss Greenfield, superintendent of all the work, and specially devoted to the hospital; her sister, to whom is allotted the new Victoria Home, a sort of resting place and hostel for native women who for the time need a shelter. Hers, too, is the Y.W.C.A., and camping-out work in the villages. This other lady lives for the most part in one of the out-stations; and this is occupied in the dispensary work; and this devotes her time to zenana visitation, and so on. But each is working to the limit of her power, and often beyond. Dr. Brown told me that she has frequently to be content with four or five hours of sleep.

In addition to her medical work, there is the daily Bible class for the students, another for the servants, and yet another for the inmates of the hospital. How much we need to pray that she and her fellow-workers should be anointed with fresh oil!

The time is gone. The sisters of this House Beautiful wait to bid me farewell. One gives me a white rose, and tells me always to think of the soldier lads. Some little remembrances and eatables are tucked under the seat of the pony cart. We drive quickly to the station; but the train is late, so my friend and I walk to and fro in the deepening shadow, talking of eight years of friendship behind, of India and her needs, of the great possibilities of a Spirit-filled life, of the beloved church in London, and of that eternal home where there are no separations, no weariness, no lack of any kind. The train arrives overdue, stops, starts again, bearing us through these vast Indian plains, wrapt in weird solitude, stars overhead, and God's angels keeping watch.

MR. MEYER'S TOUR.

Rev. F. B. Meyer's visit to Lahore lasted for four days, January 5-8. More than 100 missionaries, Indian pastors, teachers and others came in from other places for the meetings. Two addresses were given by Mr. Meyer each day. The average attendance at the mid-day meeting was about 250, and at the evening meeting about 350. They were audiences which must be weighed, not counted. There were nearly a hundred missionaries soon to scatter to their work throughout the Punjab; there were a number of Indian pastors going back to their congregations. In reserved seats in the front there gathered sixty or seventy Christian Indian students, both men and women, who had received an English education and would become the leaders of the future.

Mr. Meyer's addresses were listened to with the closest attention, and the message was evidently going home. But it was not till the closing meeting on Sunday evening that it was seen how deep a work had been going on. Mr. Meyer spoke on John vii. 37-39, the cry of Jesus on the great day of the feast. The power of the Holy Spirit was very manifest, and at the close a large number rose to their feet to show that they had made a surrender to Jesus Christ during the conference; and almost the whole audience rose to testify their desire that out of them might flow "rivers of living water" to the Punjab. On Sunday afternoon

Mr. Meyer spoke to men on personal purity, when there were about 160 present, including a number of Hindus and members of the Brahmo Somaj.

J. H. O.

There have necessarily been some alterations in Rev. F. B. Meyer's tour in South India, and I subjoin, for the information of your readers, the dates as we expect they will stand:—Madras, February 9 to 16; Madura, February 17 to 20; Palamcottah, February 22 to 24; Colombo, February 28 to March 3.

Mr. Meyer will (D.V.) sail from Colombo in the Oriental on March 3. He writes of having had most blessed meetings in the Punjaub and the North-West Provinces.

Madras. Frank Anderson (Gen. Sec. S.V.M.I.C.).

Mr. Varley in America.

SOME weeks since, I promised to preach Christ at the Temple in Philadelphia. It is a remarkable building and the centre of an extraordinary work. I have not to my knowledge met the beloved pastor. It is about twenty years since that this devoted servant of Christ was "born from above." The Lord's use of Rev. Russell N. Conwell has been, and is, very remarkable. Before me lies what is called "The Workers' Hand-Book," issued from the Baptist Temple. It is as modest a statement as it is marvellous in detail. I venture to extract a few particulars.

The name of the church is the Grace Baptist Church of Philadelphia, organised February 12, 1872. There is seating capacity in the Temple for nearly 4,000 persons. In 1882 the assembly numbered 294. In 1898 the membership had risen to 2,749. It is literally a vast hive of industry in all departments of Christian work.

The Temple was opened for worship March 1, 1891. It is a noble structure, very substantial, built of stone. What is called the Lower Temple comprises a great number of large and airy rooms devoted to the needs of the fifty-eight different organisations connected with the Temple. The College comes next, and is without question of its kind in the United States. I confess that I was amazed and delighted. Take the following records and figures:—Temple College, date of organisation, 1884; number of students last year (1898) in regular courses, 3,137; attending lectures, 5,113; total, 8,850; number of courses 31, professors, 65; length of term, day department, 9 months; evening, 8 months; cost of tuition, day department, 50 dols. to 60 dols.; primary school, 30 dols.; kindergarten, 10 dols. per year; evening department, according to courses, 5 dols. to 10 dols. for the year. It is a non-sectarian institution. All the regular college degrees are conferred upon either day or night students completing college courses. Here the youths and young men of Philadelphia can avail themselves of admirable facilities for study, education, and fitness for life's battle and progress. The number of students since the foundation is given as 36,127.

I arrived in Philadelphia on Saturday, January 21, and soon reached the Temple. One of the officials kindly showed me over the vast area covered by these remarkable buildings. The pastor's study gave occasion for some rest, prayer, and preparation. I will only say that the Lord's Day (22nd) was memorable.

WONDERFUL CONGREGATIONS

greeted the speaker, and we had a glorious day. My theme was "Resurrection Triumphs," and surely this not-seldom depressed heart was made glad, as hundreds told how the Great Minister of the sanctuary had been pleased to bless his people by the Word preached. Now, as life runs on, the thought presses more and more—preach Christ Jesus the Lord! Exalt Him whom God hath raised from the dead and highly exalted. The living Christ alone can meet the need of sinful dying men. It was a bright and sunny day, and as some twenty told in confession of their reception of the Holy Son of God in the after-meeting, we gave Him praise, and rested that night with a thankful chastened heart, glad of some success. But oh, the wandering thousands who will not come to Christ that they might have life! What hinders us that results seem so small comparatively?

At the close of the morning service the financial needs of the college were presented by one of the brethren, and it was grateful to me to be at the incipient stage of an offering which it is believed will reach 56,000 dollars to be presented in February on the occasion of dear Mr. Conwell's fifty-sixth birthday. The amounts promised and given were, I believe, about 13,000 dollars. Monday was a charming day, almost as genial as summer. Dr. Gordon met me at the noble pile of buildings which belong to the Baptist Publication Society in Chesnutt Street. Really it is a magnificent structure, one of the finest book-rooms in the world. The building cost 500,000 dollars. It is twelve storeys high. The printing offices, type, and composing-rooms are said to be second to none in the world.

The ministers' meeting at 11 a.m. was crowded; it is said to be the largest meeting of Baptist ministers in the world. This I can believe. It is a cheering fact to record that no company of preachers in America have more stedfastly held to the old and divine Evangelical platform than the ministerial brethren of Philadelphia. "The qualifications essential to ministerial fitness" was the subject for presentation and discussion. The motion that an esteemed brother from England should address the conference resulted in a twenty minutes address, which was graciously received. President Weston, head of one of the colleges, a venerable representative of the full orbed Gospel, gave an inspiring address. The discussion which followed was interesting, and yielded suggestive thoughts. It was a delightful morning to me. The greeting on all hands, the kind words expressed, and the fervent desire that our way might be directed to some weeks of teaching and evangelistic work in as Philadelphia is called, was refreshing and gratifying after so many years of world-wide service for our gracious Lord.

I returned to Baltimore in the evening of Monday, where our robust brother, John Robertson, is at work in the midst of "a Gospel campaign." The meetings are being held at Dr. H. W. Wharton's large church. Great blessing has rested upon our brother's ministry. It was my privilege to address the audience of well nigh 1,200 persons. It was a solemn and in some senses powerful meeting. As Dr. Wharton put it, "The people of Baltimore have learned to love John Robertson." This entirely accords with my own experience and knowledge of our brother.

I return by steamer this evening (January 24) through Chesapeake Bay to Norfolk, Va., to resume meetings in the Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian churches. The work at Norfolk has been greatly owned of God, large numbers telling of blessing received. There is strong desire that Richmond, Savannah, and Philadelphia should be visited.

In conclusion, I may add that my wife and I expect to visit London about the end of April. Remember us with fervent prayer in this work of faith and labour of love. I rejoice to write that health and strength abound.

Henry Varley.

American Coloured Convicts.

WRITING in The British Friend, Mr. William Tallack calls attention to "the terrible condition of many thousands of the so-called 'freed-men' in some of the Southern States.

"Most of the convicts in those States are leased out to work for private contractors, the main object being to save the State from any expense whatever for its criminals, and to allow the contractors to exploit them. The overseers employed by these are too often men of a vile and cruel character. The St. Louis Vanguard recently contained an account of a visit to a Georgia camp, by Mr. P. G. Bird, who reports that a pleasant-looking negro girl gave him a terrible account of the way in which she and others had been stripped and flogged in the presence of male convicts. Such abuses as these are of constant occurrence. And in the remote and unvisited places where many of the private 'camps' are situated innumerable cruelties and outrages abound."

Many of the convicts are sentenced to long terms of punishment for very trivial offences. Sentences of years have been given for petty thefts by mere children.

Louisiana is about to abandon the system, but Georgia has arranged to continue it for at least twenty years longer.

In the Georgia (U.S.A.) Voice of Missions, Dr. H. R. Butler, of Atlanta, makes an urgent appeal for the aid of Christians of the white race in reference to the cruelties inflicted both upon the free and the convict negroes of the Southern United States. He says:—

"The Cuban War and its results, and the Armenian massacres, are nothing when compared with the thirty years of chasing by blood-hounds, murdering, burning at the stake, lynching, flaying, swindling, robbing, oppression, false imprisonment, and other sufferings through which the coloured people of America have passed and are still passing."

Armenian Relief.

IN Dr. Raynolds' report of the relief and orphanage work at Van, dated January 4, he says that grain is terribly scarce all over the province, that the Government has taken so large a share of the harvest for taxes as to leave the people insufficient supplies with which to sustain life; and that many will die from hunger before spring. In two villages not far off seventy-eight people have succumbed to starvation, and the suffering for food is already becoming appalling. The Koords have not been restrained, but on the contrary have grown more lawless, carrying off cattle and sheep and making more than the usual demands on the grain. In fact, the outlook is in some respects darker than it has been during the previous two years, during which old supplies have been exhausted.

Fifty more orphans have been received into the Institution, bringing the total number up to 400; 178 of the boys are learning various useful trades. For the hundreds and thousands outside now suffering from hunger nothing can be done unless further funds be sent.

Dr. Raynolds appeals for prompt and generous help. He and his wife "are utterly overborne by the weight of care now pressing upon them." All donations to the Industrial Bureau or Orphan account of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund will be thankfully received by Mrs. Madeleine Cole, 1, Trebovir Road, Earl's Court, London, S.W.

In a letter written after a three months' stay at Van, Drs. Belck and Lehmann say:—

Dr. and Mrs. Raynolds have accomplished great things during the two and a half years that have elapsed since the massacres; and if to-day hundreds of boys and girls are saved from misery, illness, death or forced perversion to Islam, and are receiving a well-regulated mental and physical education, and if many thousands of the Armenians, persecuted almost entirely on account of their religion, who would otherwise be near to starvation, enjoy to-day a modest if not a wholly adequate subsistence, this is mainly due to the indefatigable exertions of our friends. It is to be hoped that the boys and girls instructed—many of whom came here entirely ignorant, returning to their villages as teachers and artisans, and as Christians true to their faith—may be an example for the emulation of their fellows, and help to elevate the mental and moral level of their whole people.

Much has been achieved, but still more is needed. If twice as many orphans were taken in, and twice as many people assisted, the wants would still be far from being met. The means of the mission and the orphanage not permitting of much further extension, we can only most earnestly appeal to you and all friends to help in ameliorating the misery here existing.

Home Missions.

Victoria Homes for Men.

THE public are familiar with the squalor and vice, poverty and rascality of Whitechapel, but are, unfortunately, not so well posted in the excellent works of religion and philanthropy for which the district is certainly remarkable.

Prominent among its institutions stand the Victoria Homes for men. These are poor men's hotels, in which charity is not, for every man knows, as he pays his fourpence or sixpence, that he is as independent of doles and bounties as the magnificent patrons of the Cecil or the Metropole.

The very existence of three of these large and popular homes in the very heart of the dingy East-end must go to the credit of practical Christianity. It was in a spirit of keen desire for the salvation of men, and not merely to provide a clean bed and good food at reasonable rate, that the homes came into existence.

A brief inspection of "Number Two Home," under the guidance of Mr. Wilké, the general superintendent of the work, was a pleasurable experience. The frontage on Whitechapel Road is imposing in point of size, but affords no clue to the vast extent of the buildings in the rear. Part of the premises were formerly a workhouse, other portions were included in a brewery; all are utilised wisely and well for the shelter of the poor.

Tier after tier of cubicles and sleeping rooms were one and all perfectly clean. Indeed is of that character which the English hold as an ideal, but which as a rule only the Dutch achieve. The building accommodates six hundred men, and is always full.

The lodgers come from many classes. One sees them best in the large general rooms appropriated to the use of the fourpenny lodgers. There is the waterside labourer, wearied by the day's hunt after work; the respectable clerk, just getting a little employment and working his way up once more; and the gaunt and hungry elderly man "thrown out" after thirty years' faithful service owing to the liquidation of his firm. Indeed, in this great assembly of the sad are to be found in every imaginable stage of poverty representatives of all classes of society. That iron-grey man with piercing eyes was a barrister, yonder gentlemanly fellow "had money." Those of superior training are easily picked out by their bearing; but one and all are thoroughly at home. Obviously the insistence on the home idea has many advantages, not only in internal administration, but in helping the out of work men into situations, for employers understand and recognise the character of the institution. There is, however, always a number of men who require employment, for the tendency in business circles tends unceasingly to the substitution of younger men as soon as the older grow grey.

This great home is obviously well planned; the veriest details manifest loving care. The sanitation is beyond reproach, and from the dormitories to the basement there is not a single whiff of the indescribable odour characteristic of the ordinary doss-house.

Proceeding through the dining hall to the kitchen, the skilful lady in charge is found

SERVING UP DINNERS.

A fine brisket of beef hot from the oven, the flouriest of steaming potatoes, and most inviting of roley-poley puddings are rapidly dealt out to the highly contented throng. For threepence one gets a cut from the joint and two vegetables; suet puddings at twopence are in brisk demand, and for the very poorest out of work docker or impecunious pedlar there is a big basin of that comforting soup, the fragrance of which fills the kitchen, for one halfpenny only. The quality of the goods far surpasses that of the ordinary cook shop; it is homely, but in its degree perfect.

Still, there is no compulsion to buy. The long "men's kitchen" boasts two huge ranges packed with burning fuel, and affording an opportunity for those who so wish to cook food which they have brought in. "Odd job" men about the fish and vegetable markets are often able to obtain a bit of plaice or haddock, or a few potatoes, for little or nothing, and are glad to use the stoves, utensils being also provided, besides a scullery in which to prepare and wash up. The arrangement for cleansing the outer man are excellent, and the various baths and wash-houses of the establishment contain no more useful articles than the footbaths, with hot and cold water, which are a great boon to tired men after a long day's tramping.

Mental recreation is supplied by the reading saloons and library, the largest room being converted at night into where Gospel temperance gatherings draw large congregations from among the men, and where the kindly Rector of Whitechapel might recently have been heard soloing with great acceptance.

On Sunday evenings Mr. Wilké arranges hearty meetings, with plenty of singing and pointed addresses. But that does not satisfy little band of workers, they must needs adjourn subsequently to the downstairs "men's kitchen," where a second service is held for those who did not attend the first.

After a survey of the various departments, meeting here and there the business-like arrangements and smart cheerful officers, and after noting with something akin to reverence the intense desire and fervent labours for the salvation of souls, the only conclusion to be logically arrived at is that the Victoria Homes are model institutions. There is a keen satisfaction in recording such a verdict, since the deep modesty of the responsible conductors is apt to result in the homes being less well-known than they deserve. Many blessed cases of conversion are known, but not advertised. Sheaves of letters of gratitude are put away among the files.

Lord Radstock, Mr. Edward Trotter and Mr. T. A. Denny, members of the committee, have all along taken a practical interest in the work, and as they make no financial appeals, but conduct so good a work on a self-supporting basis, the Christian public may well come to the rescue in donating them what little they require, namely, a supply of Surgical Aid letters, and especially of cast-off clothing, which should be addressed to the Victoria Home, 77, Whitechapel Road, E.

Glasgow Evangelistic Association.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held last week in the Christian Institute, Lord Overtoun presiding. The Secretary, Mr. J. W. Arthur, read the annual report, drawing attention to the large and varied work of the Association, under the four heads of preparation, evangelisation, amelioration, and fresh air. The noon prayer meeting, conducted daily; the Bible Training Institute, with its 76 students, and the Bible Reading Prayer Union form the main features of preparation. Under evangelisation come the Tent Hall, Saltmarket; the Bethany Hall, Bridgeton; the Mizpah Band, with its eight branches; the mission to the Jews, local evangelistic meetings, &c. Amelioration covers the Sabbath morning free breakfast, with an average attendance of 1,800 hungry and needy; the children's Sabbath afternoon dinner, the four day refuges helping about 650 poor children, and the homes for destitute children at Saltcoats. The popular fresh-air movement has provided 7,294 of the city children with a fortnight each at coast or country, most of them housed in the ten beautiful homes now the property of the Association. The home of the weary workers has welcomed no fewer than 140, while various single-day outings were arranged by the committee in charge. The Association covers the work of seven or eight societies in its varied agencies, and hopes for support commensurate with the wideness of its efforts.

Mr. Mackeith, honorary treasurer, intimated that the Association is entirely dependent on voluntary contributions, carried on by voluntary workers, and managed by business men who gave their time as well as their money to the work.

Lord Overtoun said that those who had laboured in connection with the Association had an experience for which they were thankful. If they have helped others, they have had a blessing to themselves. In bringing back the wandering and weary they were treading in the footsteps of the Master, assured of his presence. The centre of the work had ever been the evangelistic department. But in seeking to save the whole man they must also attend to the physical. It was also true that if they wanted to be a blessing to the city and country they must seek to reach the young, which was the most hopeful of all the work. The work is non-sectarian, and affords a platform for ministers and members of all denominations.

Prayer for Students.

THE call to a second universal day of prayer for students on Sunday next, Feb. 12, has been issued by the General Committee of the World's Student Christian Federation. Reports received from Christian Unions in all parts of the country show how widely the day of prayer was observed last year, and how real a blessing it has been to those who observed it truly. The Call, which is signed on behalf of the Federation by Mr. Karl Friès, chairman, and Mr. J. R. Mott, Secretary, says:—

"To inspire us to thanksgiving and praise, let us remember that the year which has closed has witnessed in nearly every part of the world a great advance in the number of Christian associations or unions among students; the decision of probably the largest number of students to enter the Christian life who have done so in any one year; a marked increase in the number of students carrying on the systematic study of the Bible; a growing observance of the morning watch; wonderful manifestations of missionary interest and activity; and the continued progress, not only of all the student movements of the world, but also of the World's Student Christian Federation.

"Among the different objects for prayer, let a special request be made for the World's Student Christian Federation and its leaders, that it may faithfully and effectively serve all student movements and extend its useful ministry to the student centres of all lands; for all Christian student organisations throughout the world, that under the influence of the Spirit of God they may become increasingly fruitful; for Christian students everywhere, that they may live spotless, sincere and earnest lives, and thus by life and word win their fellow students to Christ; for non-Christian students of all races, that they may be attracted in increasing numbers to accept Christ as their Saviour and Lord; for the volunteer movement in the east and in the west, and also in the north and in the south, that by the power of God it may raise up an army of workers who shall preach the Gospel to every creature."

The Lighthouse, Bow, E.—On the thirty-first Sunday-school anniversary, Rev. C. Bryant (Wesleyan), Pastor T. J. Hazzard, and Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., were the preachers, and cheering accounts of progress were given. Addresses of encouragement were delivered by the chairman, Mr. W. H. Seagram, and others.

Mrs. Hilton's Crèche.—Dear Friends,—Please permit me to inform your readers that a satisfactory arrangement has been made to make over my late wife's crèche to Dr. Barnardo. For the formal transfer, a meeting will be held at the crèche on Saturday next, at 3 o'clock, when the company of all friends of the institution will be welcome.—Yours truly, John Hilton, Treasurer.

Are we Right?

A SERIOUS MISSIONARY QUESTION.

III.

RETURNING to the question, "What are we to do?" there are certainly grave and great difficulties; yet not so great perhaps as might be imagined. "We must have some organization, directly there are Christians." That is true; but for myself I believe a very simple organisation is enough, and any organisation beyond what is enough is a weight. It seems to me, we, especially in some churches, have become so accustomed to elaborate organisation that we cannot think of a church existing without it. And yet, perhaps, the native churches, generally speaking, are maimed even seriously, by the amount of organisation with which we encompass and load them. To import from home our complicated western organisation, the growth and outcome of centuries, and impose it on young churches and Eastern races, is, in my opinion, one of the mistakes we are making.

CHURCHES OUGHT TO GROW NATURALLY;

they cannot successfully be made to order, according to the particular patterns (varying in different towns, and maybe in different streets of the same town) which foreign missionaries choose to dictate for them. Granted that our organisations are excellent for full-grown men, it does not follow that they are excellent for babes; nor because they are suitable for the west, does it follow they are suitable for the east. Saul's armour was probably the best in the kingdom, and admirably suited for full-grown Saul, but not for youthful David. Our Davids are but infants at present, and it seems to me the feeble life and weak growth of many native churches, may be due, in part, to our smothering them with grown up people's clothes imported from the West.

Why not let the native churches develop according to their own instincts and along their own natural lines, subject, of course, to the Word of God? Why try to mould all nations into one groove—our groove? We are for ever bringing up the native churches in leading strings, and, as M. Coillard says, "Kept thus in an abnormal childhood, they lose"—(nay! in the church they never had it to lose)—"the power of independent action and of responsibility." They are too often content merely to exist. They will do (if they are good) what they are told to do; as paid agents, what they are paid to do; there their duty begins, and there it also ends. We do not give them a chance. I should advocate, then, leaving it as much as possible in the hands of the natives themselves. Very little stress indeed need be laid on the form organisation takes; but rather than split the native Christians into sects, let it be broad enough to include all the usages which the various churches regard as really essential, and which their consciences will not allow them to forego. But let all, when necessary, yield as far as they can.

THE SIMPLEST ORGANISATION,

I long for the day when the missionary societies shall say to their missionaries, "We represent different branches of Christ's Church at home, but remember we do not send you to the heathen lands to set up our different churches there. We have given up some, and are prepared to give up more of those non-essentials which distinguish us from one another rather than cause divisions among the little flock for whom we are collectively responsible. Take heed, therefore, in the country to which you are going, to do nothing which shall endanger the oneness of God's people. Make it your aim to unite all Christians everywhere, and to build up, with your fellow workers, one undivided Church of Christ."

Do you say this is impossible? Why is it impossible? But if one undivided Church of Christ is indeed utopian—an ideal which in this world can never be realised—is the whole matter therefore at an end? Are we now justified in going each one our own way—independent of one another—starting divisions in all directions? Can we do nothing? We can do a great deal. We must GET AS NEAR THE IDEAL AS WE CAN!

Not to get as near the ideal as we can, because we say the ideal cannot be fully realised, is inexcusable neglect. Surely we are bound to see to it that the points of division amongst Christians, which we say are inevitable, shall, at any rate, be as small, and as few, and as inconspicuous as possible!

Here then is something for us all to do, and to do at once. Do we assent to this? Because, if we do, we must not deliberately introduce customs, usages, not essential, not matters of conscience, but only of preference, when we know they are dividing the Christians from one another and stand right in the way of a united Church. Perhaps the majority of those who think about it at all hide themselves under this shelter, and comfort themselves with this reflection: "The churches we are setting up are only temporary; our hope and aim are for a united Church of China in the future." The people who say this I am sure I should love and respect. But such reasoning amazes and baffles me. If from the Midlands one's hope and aim are to reach London, why start our train on the lines to Edinburgh and Aberdeen? Our hope and aim are of China in the future. And therefore, in the present, we deliberately divide the Christians into many churches, and daily expend a part of our strength in making the separation between the churches more defined and more complete—even in things which we fully admit are not essential! I never could understand it at all, and a longer residence in China, with further thought and observation, does not help me to understand it better. Yet who am I that I should say this? And, as I said at the beginning, how can I be right, when so many of God's faithful, wise, and honoured servants apparently see no harm in what we are doing?

Nevertheless I am persuaded the present plan is not, cannot be, what God desires. Therefore there is, there must be which God does desire. And, if God's people would consult with Him, and with each other, and be perfectly willing to give up their own plans and preferences, and follow God's direction, then surely He would show us what his way is.

If anything that I have written has given needless pain, then I myself am pained. If anything has been harshly stated I am truly sorry; it is not intended. Whatever is wrong I pray God to forgive. But if this feeble voice from China, or rather, if the voice of God through a little child of his, might reach the ear and the heart of the Church of Christ, and lead to something being attempted—something done—how exceedingly I should rejoice! Among the many things which claim the attention of our societies and councils is anything of more moment than this just now? Something accomplished in this direction would outweigh a hundred ordinary achievements, because of its God-likeness, and the blessing, power, and joy that would attend it. How it would stand out by itself as the memorial, noble and glorious, and blessed of God, of this wonderful centenary season!

A Worker Wanted.—The new mission hospital at Lovedale was opened several months ago. Already it has proved a very real service during the wave of sickness which has followed in the wake of the rinderpest. Some 1,200 to 1,400 out-patients had been treated when the last mail left, and the Board find that it will be necessary to have another trained nurse sent out. If your readers know or hear of a lady of true missionary purpose, and with the necessary hospital training, who has the means and will to go out as a volunteer worker, I shall be very grateful to be put into communication with her. Even for one to go out on the short service system for one or two years we should be glad. D. A. HUNTER.

The Gospel in Prisons.

BY CHAS. COOK.

THERE has been a remarkable change for the better in our English prisons lately. The authorities are slowly finding out that the hard and harsh system of merely punishing criminals whilst "in durance vile" is not all that is required of them. Not only are judges giving shorter sentences of penal servitude, but the Home Office has recently arranged for special missions to be held in nearly all our large prisons by members of the Church Army, and also that certain lectures of an instructive kind be given in some of our gaols by competent gentlemen.

Twenty years and more some of us have been advocating the above reforms, and we rejoice that though we ourselves are at present shut out from preaching in our English prisons, others in whom the authorities have confidence are doing it. Let us pray that the revival may extend, and find an entrance even into all our gaols.

One who was described as "the greatest thief of the age" was under the preaching of the late Bishop of Rochester during a revival. This man had "done" nearly forty years' penal servitude, but lived a most consistent life for years, and died a martyr's death from assaults made on him by atheists and socialists whilst preaching on Peckham Rye.

But many of God's people are interested in work done in other lands. News to hand from Italy and Holland is encouraging, yet there are still many places where prisoners have never heard of Christ and have never seen a New Testament.

The Czar of Russia has recently made full investigation into the condition and treatment of most of the Russian prisons; and thus we believe the past visitations, and all the ventilations of the wrongs of that vast empire have at least done some good, but there still remains the fact that when I last visited Moscow there were passing annually through the forwarding prison of that city into Siberia. I believe it would be possible for some one to "lay up treasure in heaven" by giving up themselves and their means to the work of supplying each prisoner with a copy of the Word of God. What a splendid lifework it would make for some lady to take up her residence in Moscow and do this work!

I have on four occasions crossed over to Africa, and think the prisons of Morocco are the worst in the world, and the treatment meted out to those immured in the underground dungeons of that country every whit as bad as the cruelty of the Khalifa to the Soudanese. Hands and arms are lopped off and the stumps dipped in boiling pitch to stop the bleeding. Most of these dark habitations of cruelty are unvisited save by a few of our beloved friends of the North Africa Mission and one or two others, notably one English lady, who has visited and relieved many in these prisons.

"Out of sight, out of mind;" and we need to know of these things, that we may pray, "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before Thee."

I am hoping very shortly once again to endeavour to visit some places in Europe yet untouched, and to put the New Testament into the hands of the prisoners who have never had one. The command is, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature;" and unless someone goes into the untrodden fields of the prison world, how can the command be fulfilled?

I shall value the prayers of the Lord's servants, and be glad of their practical fellowship in this needy work that lies near my heart.

Artillery Lane Mission (4, Steward Street, Spitalfields).—The Gospel work continues to be carried on. The lodging-house work is very encouraging. The Sunday morning breakfasts are attended well, and the needs are great. The superintendent is Mrs. Finn.

Young People.

Strength: A Word for Boys.

WE want you to be strong. We should like to see you six feet high, and broad of chest, strong of limb, a fast runner, a good cricketer, and a plucky football player.

Here are some hints: Be pure in your thoughts, words, and actions. Do not smoke. Do not touch beer or spirits. Put your heart into everything. Good food, exercise, plenty of fresh air, a cold bath, and purity will make you into a strong, healthy man.

But there is a better kind of strength; to have hard big muscles is a capital thing, but to be really strong we want more than that (Ps. cxlvii. 10).

There was once a prize-fighter who was exceedingly strong. He became a Christian. One day he met an old antagonist who, hearing that he had become a Christian, wished to test him, and struck him in the face. "Jim," replied the converted prize-fighter, wiping his face, but not returning the blow, "once I would have knocked you to shivers for that, but I'm saved now, and I can only say, God bless you." The man was touched, and replied, 'I'll go with you, mate." He became a Christian.

Have you conquered yourself? It is a greater feat than to capture a city.

There is, however, something better than that. In Westminster Abbey stands a monument to Lawrence, the Indian hero and general. The inscription runs: "He feared man so little because he feared God so much." Boys, has the LOVE OF JESUS CONQUERED YOUR HEART?

The greatest generals are proud to bow before the Queen. You, strong fellows, who are the first in the football field and the foremost at the sports, have you bowed to Jesus Christ and made Him your king? That is true manliness, and will show whether you possess real strength, because you will have to endure persecution if you follow Jesus.

Here are a list of some men of power in the Bible, and they all had it, in spite of drawbacks:—

Jacob, or power in spite of self;
Joseph	,,	,,	trials;
Elijah	,,	,,	fear;
Daniel	,,	,,	circumstances;
Peter	,,	,,	cowardice;
Paul	,,	,,	bodily weakness.

The secret of the power of each of these men was the same. They had the power of God in their hearts. They fear God instead of men.

At Heidelberg, in Germany, there is an immense barrel which would hold 800 hogsheads. But while we are hearing of its immense capacity, we find that it has stood

EMPTY AND USELESS FOR A CENTURY.

There are boys with brains, and boys with strength; boys who are sound, and boys who are strong. But where are the boys who will devote their powers to the service of God and man?

We have in Liverpool the most powerful lifting crane in the world. No mass of iron or stone which, apparently, this great machine will not easily lift. It is so strong.

The strong should help and raise the weak. If you have a strong character and strong limbs, God bestowed them on you, not just to be used in your own pleasure, but that you might be able to "lift the more," to do more for God and your neighbour. Jesus Christ needs the strong boys and the clever boys, and He needs you. Do not be content with bodily strength only. Remember how God spoke to Joshua—"Be strong, and of a good courage." "Be thou strong, and very courageous." "Be not afraid; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest." Will you give yourself to Him?

A Message.

"I SEND them my love and my kiss,"
The baby lips parted to say;
A little child's message was this
To dear ones who lived far away.

How often our love has been sent
For want of a nice thing to say!
And nothing at all have we meant
Save only it just was our way.

But God when He sent us his love,
His tender and pardoning kiss,
Gave Jesus his meaning to prove,
And oh! what a token was this!

Who will give Him warm love in return?
Who will send Him an answering kiss?
Is any child willing to learn
The very best way to do this?

St. John's Foundation School.—This large and useful institution, which provides free education for the sons of those Church clergymen who are in necessitous circumstances, has issued its annual report, from which it appears that the number at present in the school is 255, and that as a result of the exertions of the staff the boys have reaped a considerable harvest of scholarships. The need of St. John's becomes increasingly great every year, as the number of the clergy increases at the same time that their incomes become steadily depreciated. The committee, therefore, again commend the school to the sympathy, both of the public at large, and of the members of the Church of England in particular. The offices are at 1, The Sanctuary, Westminster Abbey, S.W.

Evangelistic.

Billingsgate Christian Mission.

A WEEK of special services has been held in the Mission Hall facing the market, conducted by Charles Inglis. Mr. A. Walters, secretary, writes: — "There were good attendances of both salesmen and porters, and the earnest attention given to the utterances of the well-known Evangelist (who preached the Gospel fully and faithfully each day) was most marked. We were blessedly conscious of God's presence and power in our midst; and we are convinced that we shall learn of some who have been brought to Christ through the faithful ministry of his servant. We had the help of several well-known soloists, who gladly gave their services for these occasions.

"Some few weeks since you kindly noticed the fact that we had commenced a medical mission for the benefit of the men engaged in the fish market, and had employed a fully certificated hospital nurse (especially skilled in surgical work), who resides on the premises. Abundant justification of the need that existed for this branch of the work is given by the fact that already there are some twelve to fifteen cases each day receiving the nurse's attention."

Woolwich Tabernacle.

Writing in respect to a mission just held by Mr. W. R. Lane, Rev. J. Wilson says:—It has been a memorable eight days in our history, and we say goodbye to Mr. Lane with a much deeper feeling than regret. The meeting for men on Sunday afternoon was most impressive. The evangelist had not spoken five minutes before he had won the confidence of the men. He spoke of special temptations with such tact and delicacy that no stain was left on the purest mind, and with such strength of conviction that all were deeply moved. The lecture on "John Bunyan" was one of the best we ever heard. The views were most helpful. Christians understood, perhaps, more clearly than ever what the pilgrimage to the Celestial City involves. On Monday evening Mr. Lane told the story, "From the Gambling Table to the Mercy Seat." He told us in eloquent and burning words what the Lord had done for him, and what He was able to do for others. Over a hundred names have been given in of those who have decided for Christ, and there are more to follow. We feel sure the work will go on.

Mission in Lancaster.

An eight days' united mission in connection with the Lancaster and Free Church Council has been conducted by Mr. Gipsy Smith. Under the auspices of the same council a simultaneous mission in all the Free Evangelical churches of the town had recently been held, attended with large blessing to the churches and the harvesting of many into the Kingdom of God. This found the churches thoroughly united, expectant, and alive for Gipsy Smith's visit, so that from the first welcome meeting to the closing service the deepest interest was manifested by all the churches represented.

All the meetings were crowded. The closing lecture on "From Gipsy Tent to Pulpit" brought to a close a remarkable and fruitful mission. More than 200 entered the enquiry-room, while hundreds in addition witnessed by rising to spiritual blessing received, or decisions for Christ. The two missions have not only added numbers, but life and power to the churches, resulting in a closer fellowship and unity, a fuller and deeper consecration, and signs are not wanting that the town generally has shared in the blessing. H. S.

United Mission in Ipswich.

Many hearts in Ipswich have been made glad (says a correspondent), as a result of a fortnight's visit from Mr. George Clarke, which has stirred the town in no ordinary way. The mission commenced with a gathering of workers that augured well, and from first to last the characteristic of the mission seemed to me to be power—not the power of eloquence or personality, but a quiet, unemotional, solemn sense of the Master's presence. The hall has been packed each night with 1,800 to 2,000 people, often hundreds turned away. The Wednesday gathering of young men and women, and the last Sunday night, with its throng of men only, were specially wonderful times. Day by day 1,000 or 1,200 people assembled for the afternoon Bible Readings, which were searching and strengthening.

We thank God for the many who have openly confessed his saving grace, and we know there are others whose hearts are deeply touched who have not yet made a public profession. The special services are over, but the work is going on.

Mr. Richard Spragg has concluded a month's mission at Merrion Hall, Dublin, and many souls have been brought to decision.

Rev. John McNeill has been conducting a mission at Tain. The services have been held in the Free Church, and have been exceptionally well attended.

Mr. J. J. Sims has been conducting a week's mission in the U.P. Church, Airdrie, with much to encourage and evident signs of blessing every night.

Times of blessing are reported in connection with Mr. J. J. Scroggie's meetings at Rye Harbour. Numbers professed conversion, and the duration of the mission had to be extended.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander have conducted Gospel services at the Tanner's End Gospel Mission, Edmonton, during the past fortnight. The faithful preaching of God's Word has resulted in the spiritual quickening of many, both old and young.

Miss M. E. Parker (Methodist Evangelist) has concluded a very encouraging mission at Mansfield and Mastro. At the latter place, some fifteen years ago, in conjunction with Mrs. J. B. Horton, she laboured for many months, when numbers confessed for Christ. Last week, as once more these Evangelists visited the town, they found a very large percentage of the former converts (some of whom had been notorious evil-livers) standing firm, and many of them engaged themselves in winning souls.

Mr. Gerald Coultas writes from Barry Dock:—"We have closed a very blessed series of meetings in connection with our dear brother, Herr P. M. Redwood, of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews. The addresses were most helpful, especially those on the 'Jewish Feasts,' &c. 'From the Synagogue to the Cross' and 'The Story of My Conversion to Christ' was the last of his addresses. The mission has awakened deep interest in the Jews, and Christians have been quickened into fuller service for their Lord. We have had some glorious cases of conversion."

Penzance Y.M.C.A.—The work, which has been at a low ebb for some time, has been resuscitated, and the services have been secured of Mr. E. Thomas, of Bristol, who will give six months to the reorganisa- of the association.

International S.S. Lessons.

February 19.

"Christ Feeding The Five Thousand."—John vi., 1-14.

Golden Text.—"I am the Bread of Life."—John vi., 35.

Rest (1).

Christ often rested after his day's work. "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." He refreshed himself by communion with the Father.

Lessons.—

(1) Times of rest needed by all. "Your strength is to sit still."

(2) The purpose of the sabbath—not merely absence of bodily strain, lounging about, but communion with God, which feeds the spirit and so makes the man strong.

Why the Multitude Followed (2).

Because they saw the miracle. Some came for the loaves and fishes, but Christ turned none away, whatever their motive might be. Trouble, joy, success, failure, a variety of motives send men to Christ. He receives them all gladly.

We should try to come to Him with pure purpose.

The Compassion of Jesus.

He felt for and with the people. He knew what was in man. The disciples would have driven the little children away, but Christ loved them, and said, "Suffer them to come." The disciples would have sent the people into the city to buy meat. Christ said, "They need not depart."

The Hungering Multitude (5).

This multitude, typical of the world—hungering far something it knows not what. Some try to satisfy themselves by ambition, pleasure, money, &c. Still hungering and thirsting. Christ said, "I am the bread of life;" "I am the living water." This because He revealed God and men are hungering and thirsting after God.

Two Ways and Means (5-7).

Christ knew how the need was to be satisfied, but the disciples could not understand it.

Philip went into arithmetic, and found little to satisfy his faith. There is no answer to the world's cry for forgiveness and holiness anywhere except in Christ.

The drunkard, the impure, the thief, the liar can never be rid of their chains, except by the power of God. All the other means which are used should be in the direction of bringing men to the great fountain-head.

Power of Little Things (9).

The lad with the five loaves and two fishes was no good until he came to Jesus with his store. Little things very powerful, but chiefly so when consecrated to Christ.

Illustrations.—Moses' rod. Shamgar's ox goad. David's harp and sling.

Teacher should point out the use of little words spoken for Christ. The needle and paint brush used for him. The common made sublime and eternal by his touch.

The Disciples are the Channels.

Christ might have performed such a miracle as would have placed the bread before the people directly, but instead he used the disciples as channels. So good men are used by God to bear his mercies to their fellows.

God could save the world directly without using men; but the long line of prophets, martyrs, preachers, teachers, and parents are used, and are greatly privileged and blessed in doing God's work. Aim to be one of God's servants.

The Fragments Gathered.

In the midst of profusion Christ was careful about the fragments. These would prove that all were satisfied, and would be mementoes to strengthen the faith of the disciples. Every time God gives us a spiritual feast we should treasure the fragments. Children should store up the teacher's knowledge, both in day and Sunday school; treasure the marks of mother's love, of home comfort. They will all be precious in years to come.

Letters to the Editor.

"Are we Right?"

DEAR SIR,—It was with great satisfaction that I read Mr. Horsburgh's articles entitled "Are we Right? a serious missionary question.". The problem is one which ought to exercise the minds of all Christians of every denomination. We cannot look upon this question without feeling with Mr. Horsburgh the need for a solution of it.

It is certainly a crying shame that we should carry into heathen lands the sectarian spirit. Is it not possible in this enlightened age to formulate a creed to which missionaries of all societies and denominations could subscribe?

Is the Bible such an obscure book that it is not possible for us to obtain from it a set of doctrines which conscientious missionaries working for the same end would be able to accept and carry out?

I think this question which Mr. Horsburgh has raised is worthy of a conference at an early date of all those interested in the ultimate success of the Gospel and the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth.—Yours faithfully,

DAVID A. LEISK.

Are the Churches Ready?

DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for THE CHRISTIAN and the REVIVAL which you kindly sent me. They came opportunely. I have long prayed for a reviving again, and felt that God would soon send it.

In my own church we have had the beginning of good things in conversions. Most of these are from my Bible class and the Sunday School. The blessing came suddenly and swiftly after some years of apparently unfruitful toil. But God's people, at least most of them, in our midst know not yet the blessedness of the Spirit's fulness, and there is even a danger of relapsing into cold formality. The church as a whole needs yet the baptism of power, and I shall be glad if you will ask your readers to pray for this.

There is another matter upon which I would like your judgment. It is generally supposed that, if the spiritual blessing is present, other matters will run smoothly, and especially will funds be forthcoming to pay expenses. We have not found it so here. As a matter of fact, our contributions are less, and it is causing some anxiety to us all.

Many who used to attend are keeping away, because on Sunday evenings we try to impress upon the people the importance of immediate decision for Christ, and give them an opportunity to confess Him openly. This is not liked by many, and they leave to go where they can settle down in carnal ease.

I am persuaded that the churches, and especially those where the better classes attend, are not ripe for a revival, and if the ministers of these churches preached in apostolic fashion and power, there would be a great sifting of their congregations, and the effect would be to reduce their incomes considerably. Are they prepared for this? This question gives rise to another. Are they prepared for the baptism of the Spirit, with all its bitter as well as its blessed consequences? Will not many prefer the state of the Laodicean Church to that of the Pentecostal morn? Since you, sir, have taken up this matter, and are seeking to foster and fan a spirit of revival by the publication of your paper, may I suggest that you invite all ministers who are co-operating with you in this great thing, to send you brief reports of work being done in their churches, and the general effects of revival methods upon their congregations, upon the incomes of their churches, and upon the neighbourhoods in which their churches are situated. This will enable many goodly men to open their hearts, and may also bring encouragement and help to them from unlooked for sources.—Yours faithfully,

A PASTOR.

Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., intends during the debate on the address in the House of Commons to raise the whole question of the Romanising practices in the Church of England.

About Books.

WITH the title Lessons from the Cross Messrs. Nisbet & Co. have issued a small volume containing a series of addresses delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral during Holy Week last year by the Bishop of London. (2s. 6d.) In the course of twelve chapters the Passion is considered as a revelation of human life and of human motive upon its largest scale. Within the limitations thus indicated, the treatment is thoughtful and helpful. "That Passion which revealed the grandeur of Christ, revealed also the baseness of everything else." This incontrovertible proposition is strikingly developed.

Welcome assistance in private and united study is furnished by Helps to the Study of St. John's Gospel, in two parts, prepared by W. H. T. Gairdner, B.A., issued by the British College Christian Union, 22, Warwick Lane, E.C. (6d. each, nett) The first part deals with chapters i. to xii., and the second with the remainder of the Gospel. The notes are brief and pointed, designed to assist daily private study and weekly united review. The books are being used throughout the colleges; they should prove of great service to conductors of Bible classes. Spiritual profit and personal application are never lost sight of in these pages.

For many years "Mother's Last Words" and "Our Father's Care" have sustained the literary reputation of the late Mrs. Sewell in circles where her more general writings have not been known. It is a great pleasure now to welcome a new and complete edition of the Poems and Ballads—two volumes in one, prefixed by a deeply interesting memoir by Miss E. Boyd Bayly, and portrait of the author. Mrs. Sewell's charming and wholesome poems appeal to the hearts of young and old, and some of them are admirably suited for recitation. (3s. 6d. Jarrold & Sons.)

An admirable missionary book is Dawn on the Hills of T'ang; or, China as a Mission Field, by Harlan P. Beach. (2s. 6d. Student Voluntary Missionary Union, 22, Warwick Lane, E.C.) Here we have a description of the Flowery Land and its people—a text-book, historical and geographical, from the standpoint of a Christian missionary. The volume is one of a series in course of publication by the S.V.M.U., and will be used by students throughout the world. But though prepared for collegians in the first instance, this work will be welcome to all students of missions, whether members of Lay Workers' and Helpers' Unions, Watchers' Bands, or Christian Endeavour Societies. There is a good map, also a bibliography on China and Chinese missions. This is a book of solid worth, and sure to prove of service in exciting missionary interest.

In order to meet a very general convenience, Dr. Bullinger is issuing in serial parts his great work on Figures of Speech used in the Bible. (2s. each, net and post free, from the Author, 25, Connaught Street, W.) By "figures" is meant forms, literary and rhetorical, whereby language is invested with might and mirth, or other qualities needed to express the thought or feeling of heart or mind. Dr. Bullinger's work is the result of many years of labour. The first part deals with Ellipsis, a due recognition of which explains so many passages in the sacred Scriptures. The second part introduces twenty-five figures, in connection with which hundreds of quotations and references are made. This is a work of remarkable interest and value. The study of literary figures is calculated to yield much fruit and profit in independent Bible study.

A volume of varied interest is John Stoughton, D.D.; a Short Record of a Long Life, written by his daughter, Mrs. King Lewis. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) These pages admirably supplement Dr. Stoughton's "Recollections," and complete a fine picture of the man and his friends. One of the most attractive aspects of Dr. Stoughton's life was his geniality, which was happily combined with intellectual parts of a high order. Consideration for others and a sincere regard for truth made him generous in controversy, and no matter in what circumstances men of position or distinction entered the circle in which he moved, friendly relations were the inevitable result, affection growing as acquaintance increased. Hence this story of a busy life, devoted to the service of God, is characterised by much of sweetness and light, and some beautiful letters are reproduced in its pages. There are excellent portraits of Dr. Stoughton and his bosom friend, Joshua Harrison.

Mrs. J. B. Alliott, author of "The Dowager Lady Tremaine," has written a short story of some interest entitled GLEAMS AND GLOOMS. (6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

THE MAN WITH THE INKHORN is an exposition and application of Ezekiel ix., by Richard M. Holman. The pages deal solemnly with truths of extreme gravity. (1d. Alfred Holness.)

HOME.

Yesterday Mr. John Ruskin completed his eightieth year.

It is said that one of the measures to be considered during the Parliamentary Session which has begun will be a bill dealing with the evils of the half-time system, and raising the age of exemption from eleven years to twelve.

At a service held at Sandringham Church on Sunday week in commemoration of the death of General Gordon an offertory was made on behalf of the Gordon Boys' Home, resulting in the sum of £162. This amount was supplemented by a cheque for £400 from the Right Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes.

In a lecture on Saturday on prison work, Rev. J. W. Horsley said that a principal cause of the diminution of crime was undoubtedly the extensive child-saving work which had been established since the Queen came to the throne. The progress of temperance had also done something, for undoubtedly three-fourths of those who occupied prison cells got there as the result of drink.

FOREIGN.

Lord Tennyson has been appointed governor of South Australia.

The British Board of Trade officials at Antwerp are being thwarted in their efforts to cope with "crimps" who prey on the seamen landing there.

The premiers of the various Australasian colonies have agreed in conference on a plan of Federation, and will do their best to secure the passing of the scheme.

The news from France is again about as bad as it can well be short of an actual outbreak of civil war. At once in Paris, in Marseilles—where there have been disturbances—and even in Algiers, the match seems to be very near the powder.

A serious peasant revolt has broken out in Roumania, in that part of the country situated between the Olt and the Danube. It has already assumed grave proportions and called for the intervention of the troops. The agitation has a socialistic origin.

Recent news from the Congo Free State shows that the natives have been everywhere victorious, and that a state of panic exists amongst the Europeans many of whom are returning to Belgium. The natives have got possession of a large quantity of arms.

Mr. Jordan, an Englishman who lately returned from Coomassie, reports the country as peaceful. The Basle mission have erected two buildings in the Ashanti capital and the Wesleyan mission one. Both are teaching Fanti and English in the schools.

The steamer Lake Huron, with 2,296 members of the Russian Dukhobortsi sect, arrived at Halifax lately. Another party of 2,000 was expected last week. The Canadian Government has made elaborate preparations for their reception and maintenance until they can be settled on the land.

The Cuban insurgents through their leader have accepted the United States offer of three million dollars towards the pay of the army, and have agreed to disband. The Filipinos, however, continue to oppose the American troops. The Peace Treaty of the States with Spain has received ratification by a narrow majority in the Senate.

There has been a remarkable falling-off in the number of students entering the three Free Church Colleges of Scotland to be trained for the ministry. Six years ago as many as sixty entered in the course of the year, while this year the number has dropped to twenty-seven. Dr. Stalker, the convener of the college committee, traces the falling off to the entrance examinations.

Kurki and C. I. H. Mission.—It has pleased God to call to Himself at Chikalda, Berar, India, on Jan. 26, after two years' missionary work, Miss C. C. Murray, so long associated with Bethshan Hall, and also with the Missionary Training Home, Drayton Park, Highbury. No details have as yet come to hand. A memorial service will be held at Bethshan Hall, 10, Drayton Park, Highbury, London, N., on Thursday, Feb. 16, at 7 p.m.

Bithynia.—At the foot of Mount Olympus, and twenty miles east of Broussa, the capital of ancient Bithynia, is the town of Yenije, in which evangelical work has for some years been in progress under the American Board. Support from the New World being now withdrawn, the little Christian community is seeking to consolidate the work and carry it on independently. In order to secure the sympathetic co-operation of other Christians, the church has sent its pastor on travel for a time. In a letter of commendation, Rev. T. A. Baldwin, of the American Board, writes: "Rev. Jacob D. Stepanian is one of our tried and faithful Armenian pastors; he has been in charge of the evangelical work at Yenije for some twenty five years." Letters may be addressed to Pastor Stepanian, at 108. Notes & Comments

WE commend for thoughtful perusal and consideration the letter of "A Protestant" (see p. 25) on the subject of the Romish University, proposed by Mr. Balfour. It sets forth succinctly and forcibly the essential difference which places such an institution out of comparison with any existing educational establishment—a view that must not be lost sight of.

The great tide of Protestant sentiment is steadily rising, and the country from one end to the other seems awakening to the magnitude of the issues involved. There is no doubt that not since the Puritan revolution has a crisis so grave and imminent faced the British nation; and the result will largely depend on the attitude of public opinion during the present session of Parliament.

The discussion on Ritualism in the House of Commons last week did something to clear the air. Mr. Samuel Smith spoke with no uncertain sound on the subject of clerical treachery, and exposed the conduct of the many men who are eating Protestant bread while doing the work of Rome. Tracing the widespread lawlessness to its sources, he said:

A determined effort has been made to stamp out the Reformation, and to pour contempt upon all that savours of Protestantism, and the chief means of doing this is through the theological colleges, where young men are trained for the ministry. The great bulk of these institutions are now in the hands of the Ritualists.

Romanist doctrine brings in a corresponding morality; hence many men enter the ministry (or priesthood) without any real intention of holding by the standards to which they sign obedience.

In ordinary life such conduct would be stigmatised as fraudulent, and it is not the less reprehensible in ecclesiastical relations. Yet it is remarkable how persistently some defenders of the Ritualists endeavour to obscure the law of the land, which the clergy promise to obey, by discoursing upon canon law, to which only a secondary obedience is due. Lord Cranborne, in maintaining that the Church should manage its own affairs, said:

A spiritual society could not be managed by Parliament.

That sounds well; but it is more to the point, as things are, to discuss whether a State Church shall be law-abiding. The rising Protestant spirit of our day will not be content with excusing flagrant lawlessness; it demands remedies and guarantees against an evil that can no longer be tolerated.

The place of forms in the estimation of some of the advanced Ritualists may be gauged from the fact that at a Church in the South of London £250 is spent annually on choir, surplices, incense, &c., while at a recent sermon preached on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the offertory amounted to the sum of twelve shillings and sixpence. What kind of religion is that which spends more than 300 times as much on the mere machineries of its own ornate service as it does to send the Gospel to perishing souls?

The moral of the talk freely indulged in among journalists about "leaderless parties," &c. is that human nature in the aggregate is made to follow, not to lead. There must be a fountain as well as channels, a brain to plan and execute, a soul to inspire as well as hands and feet to carry out. In this we see the wisdom of the Christian revelation in its insistance on a personal God, a personal Saviour, a personal Spirit to lead us into all truth. To this principle Jesus bore witness when he said, "Without Me ye can do nothing;" and St. Paul, when he laid such stress on the lordship and "headship" to Christ. A religion without personality in its deity is absolutely barren. To unfold and emphasise the essential importance of accepting a living, ever present Saviour as the guide and master of his people, is thus one of the prime duties of the Christian preacher.

We shall watch with considerable interest the working of the Government measure which came into operation at the beginning of the year for the treatment of inebriates. It provides the reformatory rather than the felon's cell for those brought under the discipline of the law for drunkenness. They are to be detained for reformation, not punishment. With many who succumb to the temptation of strong drink, the over-mastering habit is a moral disease needing the most judicious treatment. To save the drunkard from himself will go a great way to help him. May the measure accomplish all that its best friends could wish.

How inevitably the balance is at last struck between opposites in nature and Providence! Last summer was particularly hot and droughty, and the rain-fall for the whole year was far below the average. Already during the wet weather of the past few weeks we have almost reached the point at which the loss of moisture has been made up. It is so in human experience. Life is full of contrasts, and yet taken soon and late the balance of joy and sorrow is restored. But there is this difference—the earth greedily accepts the overplus that makes up for previous withholdings. Men, however, after a long experience of joy and sunshine, take unkindly to the least trace of cloud and storm; and, on the other hand, after long sorrow and trial, fail to appreciate the days of brightness that follow. It is a valuable secret of true living to be able to turn all kinds of experiences to good account. Paul had learnt this secret when he said: "I know how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need." (Phil. iv. 12.)

It is a significant indication of the hunger for more definite religious teaching, which growingly prevails in all the churches, that the Free Church Catechism has already gone into a seventh edition, and can scarcely be printed fast enough to keep pace with the ever-increasing demands. The Catechism errs in being occasionally a little meagre in its expression of certain doctrines, and in stating others in a somewhat ambiguous manner; but as a formulation of the faith held in common among the evangelical churches it is a marvellous achievement. If it will help to end the vagueness and ignorance of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith that prevails among so large a section of the rising generation, it will do a great work, clearing the air of many prejudices, and promoting a robuster Christian character among believers.

Very opportune were some of the things Mr. Bryce, M.P., emphasised at Manchester recently. One was "the growth of the passion for pleasure." This is witnessed not only in secular circles, but in religious societies, Church guilds, and young peoples unions, &c. Where the social element, with music and singing, is an attractive feature a goodly company will be found. But unfortunately in proportion as such things flourish, there is great danger of the prayer meeting being neglected and the mid-week service shunned. Quiet waiting upon God, in these intense days, can alone establish the life of the soul. The feverish quest for pleasure perilously checks spiritual progress.

While it is true that "Religion never was designed, To make our pleasures less," it should be remembered that there are pleasures and pleasures, and that even legitimate pleasures may be followed foolishly, selfishly, and blindly, so that they tend to the undoing, instead of the making, of character. Some are in themselves degrading; others, right under certain conditions, become wrong when followed for their own sakes, and not as a means of recreation; or when they are indulged in to excess, or when associated with questionable practices, such as gambling and drinking. The regeneration of pleasure, and its regulation and due subordination to the higher ends of life, are matters that need more careful and honest treatment from religious teachers.

Christ has solved the vexed question of how to make desire and satisfaction keep pace. "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again," not because there is no power to quench our temporary need, but because to-morrow we may be travelling in a dry and thirsty land where no water is. "But the water that I shall give him shall be in him." The resources of the believer make him independent of his surroundings; there is an ever-flowing spring of comfort and strength within him; whatever his outward lot may be, he is in touch with the wells of Salvation. "I have learnt, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content (i.e., self-sufficing)." Paul said this because he knew that he had the Christ-life within him, and that it meant an inner wealth that made him think little of external conditions. How to reach this serene state of spiritual attainment is the true quest of life.

It is much to be regretted that the Postmaster-General has decided to arrange for delivery of "express" letters in London on Sundays. It has been said with some truth that he has shown a faculty for granting what is not wanted and withholding what is required. There are many postal reforms urgently needed, while this (which is an innovation but not a reform) can certainly be dispensed with. Cases of illness can be dealt with by wire as heretofore, and we strongly protest against this unnecessary encroachment upon the Day of Rest.

Those who would despoil us of the spiritual uses of the Lord's Day have turned their attack in yet another direction. A resolution was proposed (and carried) at the annual meeting of the Middlesex Rifle Association—held at King's College, a Church of England institution—

That in the opinion of the meeting it was highly desirable, in the interests of national defence (!), that rifle-shooting on Sunday should be permitted at the Bisley ranges during the summer; and that the council of the Middlesex Rifle Association approach the National Rifle Association on the subject.

This proposal shows how determined and widespread is the attempt to secularise the Day of Rest. Sunday excursions, Sunday concerts and amusements, Sunday trading, Sunday military practice, Sunday "express" postal delivery—here are a few out of many subtle channels in which the new spirit works. They constitute a clear challenge to those who have the spiritual interests of the nation at heart to do their utmost to educate the people in the true uses and privileges of the day, and to resist these encroachments of the secular spirit.

The references made in the Queen's Speech to our improved relations with foreign powers was its most satisfactory feature. There seems to be a real lightening of the cloud of suspicion and apprehension which has brooded for so long over the councils of the continent of Europe. Largely, without question, this is the fruit of the Czar's rescript, and the assurance which it affords of the peaceable intentions of the greatest master of battalions in the world. The spirit in which the Czar's proposals were referred to at the opening of Parliament, and the studied friendliness of all references to France, will help the purpose of the Peace Conference very considerably by showing that Britain is also sincerely anxious for peace. It would, however, be a lamentable mistake to imagine that this expression of goodwill will avail without an overwhelming expression of the will of the people to give it weight. Between now and the meeting of the Conference there should be no stone left unturned to voice the peaceable convictions of the nation.

While the Romanising party is doing its utmost to carry this country back to Rome, there are cheering signs that on the Continent there is a widespread set-back in the fortunes of that church. In Austria, for instance, to say nothing of Italy and France, the revolt has taken definite shape. The watchwords of the Pan-Germanic party have been made to include "Break with Rome" as a statement of one of its fundamental principles. There are wholesale conversions from the Catholic to the Protestant faith among the people. There is great alarm among the Austrian clergy, and that such a movement should be possible in a country priestridden for so long, is one of the most significant indications that the true character of Romanism is being recognised.

Romanists lose no opportunity of publishing the fact that there are eight and a half million members in their Church in the United States, and this is often thoughtlessly repeated in Protestant papers as though it proved that it is the largest religious body in America. This is an illustration of the fallacy of numbers. In point of fact, Roman Catholic estimates always include the entire population, good, bad, and indifferent, infant as well as adult, who nominally owe allegiance to the Pope; Protestant Churches, on the other hand, mention in their statistics members in active church fellowship only.

To equalise the basis of computation, the figures returned by the latter must, therefore, be multiplied by three. If this is done the 6,000,000 Methodists in America become 18,000,000 at once, and the other churches would be proportionately enlarged; and then we find that the Roman Catholics prove to be (what they are) only a small minority of the population. Religious statistics are, in the nature of the case, always somewhat untrustworthy, and must not be made a test of the real spiritual condition of any people. But they should be honestly compared in order that their real significance may be weighed.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has written a hymn addressed to the American people in view of their colonial expansion, which is worthy to take its place alongside of the one he wrote as a warning to the British nation some time ago. It is an appeal to take up the "White Man's Burden" of empire and control over less developed races in the highest spirit of disinterestedness and justice. The following stanza contains the gist of the poem:—

"Take up the white man's burden,
Ye dare not stoop to less,
Nor call too loud on Freedom
To cloak your weariness;
By all ye will or whisper,
By all ye live or do,
The silent, sullen people,
Shall weigh your God and you."

If the British nation had remembered more earnestly the truth enshrined in these last four lines, in their treatment of subject-races, the work of the missionary and evangelist would not have been so sadly handicapped by the contrast between our religious professions as a people and our dealings with them. Inevitably, they tend to judge of our God and of ourselves by "all we live and do," and that test has seldom been helpful to a lofty and enthusiastic judgment of either.

The American people are beginning to realise that Mormonism, so far from being in a decadent state, is fast becoming a national problem of the most pressing character. Facts show that so far from fulfilling their pledges to abolish the evil of polygamy, the leaders of this movement are living in open defiance of them; that an active propaganda is being pushed right into the heart of the New England States; that in the American dependency of Hawaii, there are already 5,000 followers of this false system; and that in the West Mormonism is spreading like a plague. Strong measures will be necessary to deal with an evil that has on its side some of the most unruly passions of fallen human nature. The best remedy for all error is truth; and for these out-growths of the depraved religious instinct, the pure truth and the consistent life are the only antidote.

The latest news the L.M.S. has received from Madagascar is of a favourable character. The persecution has abated, at least in its violent forms, and the commotion has subsided. Christians can now go about their daily business and do their Christian work. The steadfastness of the missionaries and the natives has had its reward; and the same thing is true, we believe, of the Friends' Mission and the Norwegian Mission. But quite a different story is told of the mission of the S.P.G., which seems to be going to pieces for want of a bishop. A correspondent says in the Church Times:—

Our mission to Madagascar has become the laughing-stock of the religious world, our enemies are triumphant, our friends are falling away, our missionaries are in despair, and their cry comes home mail after mail: "If you think that the mission to Madagascar should be continued, let it be done with all vigour and in due form; if not, let us withdraw, for the present condition of affairs can no longer be endured."

We do not remember ever to have heard such a cry from the men of other societies in China and elsewhere, heavily as they have suffered from persecution, and from all the discouragements incident to mission work in heathen lands.

It was scarcely to be expected that the acquisition of the Philippines by the United States would have been carried out without some conflict with the Filipinos. The result of the recent outbreak at Manila and Caloocan gives the situation entirely to the American troops. For the present the need is that the victors should show that it is their intention to use moderately their authority. Remedial measure on enlightened Christian principles can alone effect a stable pacification. The difficulties are enormous, but wise statesmanship in the fear of God will, we trust, not be wanting. Free access for Protestant missionaries will be of immense service in the religious education of the people.

Mrs. Josephine Butler mentions in the Storm Bell several ardent friends of the purity cause whom she has found among Jews. In Brussels, in Paris, in Geneva, at Avignon, in London, the Grand Rabbis gave her their cordial support. Members of the Rothschild, Montefiore, and other families have expressed approval. On the other hand, it would appear from the Jewish Quarterly Review that the Jews of Great Britain are much addicted to gambling, also to lying and deceit, and disregard of the needs of the poor. Miss Lily Montague writes that the East End Jews are intensely ritualistic; those of the West End careless as to spiritual things. To remedy this, she would have children's services throughout the kingdom, and would have the children taught that God is love, and that human love is only a reflection of the Divine love which reaches from heaven to earth.

In the Revised Version there is an exquisite touch of fatherly tenderness given to the exhortation to Timothy to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ (2 Tim. ii. 3). Paul says, "Suffer hardship with me as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." He does not drive the young recruit roughly forward alone, but asks him to come and be his comrade, almost as if the young man might be a comfort and a support to the seasoned veteran. This is quite in the spirit of the Master, who said: "Come, take up the cross and follow me." "We have fellowship one with another."

The system of transmission of wages adopted in 1897 by our Board of Trade has acted in a very satisfactory way for our sailors who receive their money at the British Consulate at Antwerp. In 1898, 5,888 British sailors discharged from British ships sent home nearly £30,000. The effect of the new system is not only good for the men's wives and families at home and for the men themselves, who are kept out of the hands of crimps, but also for our mercantile marine service. It is said that the work of crimps in foreign ports has done more to alienate our native population from the seafaring life than any one influence that can be named. It must also be remembered that men who are kept out of the way of temptation are more accessible to Christian teaching and influence.

Character in Business.

By Dr. JAMES STALKER.

IDLENESS is one of the greatest enemies of character. As some one has said, "The devil tempts other men, but idle men tempt the devil." Do not envy the idle man, whoever you may envy. You may have too much to do, and too many things to think about; still, do not envy the man who has not enough to think about, and has to fall back upon himself. The passions of human nature break loose in idle men, and wander over forbidden places seeking what they can devour.

There is no cure for the despair and the nervous misery, from which so many among us are suffering, like a long and steady piece of hard work. Work reacts on the worker. If it is slovenly it makes him slovenly, even in his outward appearance. If he does it, not with any love, but merely as drudgery, it gives him the careless look of drudgery. In fact, as somebody has said, "To scamp your work will make you a scamp." On the contrary, when work is well done it yields its reward long before pay-day comes round, because it communicates solidity and dignity to the character.

One hears too often of assistants in business to do things against their conscience. Only the other day, I read in a reputable paper an article on this subject, giving instances known to the writer; and recently a business man who had written a book sent me a copy, in which he gave instances which had come under his own cognisance. I have no doubt there are tricks of the trade, and business men find it difficult to avoid what others are practising; and especially do assistants find it exceedingly difficult to conform to them; but any practice which makes daily work a daily degradation instead of a daily discipline of character, cannot be the will of God for any man.

You have all heard it said that in our day it is impossible to do business honestly. Depend upon it that is just

THE CANT OF SCOUNDRELS.

Would you not despise a minister if he suppressed the truth in the pulpit to please his hearers? Would you not despise a soldier who turned his back when he came near danger? You know perfectly well the verdict that you have to pronounce on yourself, if, for any worldly consideration, you go on outraging your own conscience. No, it is honesty that succeeds. Perhaps it does not succeed immediately, and therefore those who are for immediate results sometimes are impatient; but a high-minded man will place his faith in a genuine article and a fair price, and in the end he will not be disappointed.

I cannot refrain from referring to a wrong which is very frequently brought under my own notice. I mean the unfair and indefensible hours often imposed, especially upon young employés. I refer especially to the grocery trade. There are hundreds and thousands of young men, hard wrought all the week, who on Saturday night do not get away till after 11 o'clock, and not infrequently are detained so long in cleaning everything up that it is Sabbath morning before they can get away home through the streets. I know that customers are to blame who have allowed themselves to fall into ridiculously late habits of shopping; but I maintain that it is not creditable to the representative men in this branch of business that they have not been able to unite in putting an end to such abuses, and it is a case in which I believe the legislature of the country might very fitly interpose to put an end to an odious form of white slavery.—Christian World Pulpit.

What We are to Preach.—2.

By Rev. JAMES CULROSS, D.D.

Luke xxiv. 36-49.

THE basal facts specified in this passage are these two—the death and resurrection of Jesus. Lying behind them, not named but obviously implied, is the great prior fact of the Christ-life, disclosing the character and heart of the Eternal Father. It is not enough to say that the story is ever new; more than this, it is growing ever more deep and wonderful. We know how in the course of ages the heavens have been growing greater and more glorious to the eye of reverent science. Every star was there in the time of the old Chaldee gazers, pursuing its silent march the same as now. But what glory has been kindled since!

Even so with the manifested Christ. He is becoming more glorious to every succeeding century—vaster, more full of blissful mystery; the Holy Spirit is still glorifying Him, is still revealing Him, deliberately, patiently, in the majesty of his Godhead, and the truth and tenderness of his human brotherhood. Now in so far as we have "seen Him" and "beheld his glory," our business is to show forth what we have seen and heard, that other men may have fellowship with us in the knowledge of the Son of God.

Rounding and perfecting the consummate Life, it behoved Him to suffer; suffering is in the world. It is one of the largest facts in the life of Jesus. "A Man of sorrows" He indeed was, and "acquainted with grief." Suffering came upon Him from every side; He stood, so to speak, in the very focus of attack, and the greatness of his nature broadened the target at which the shafts were aimed. It was suffering, too, of the most varied character; the waves and the billows, even the whole flood-tide of suffering that rolls over humanity, went over Him. No one can read his recorded life without seeing what breadth of experience He had in this respect, and how those profound events justify the expression, "made perfect through sufferings."

It is not, however, suffering in general of which we are to think, but his suffering unto death, his Cross, which was no accident or contingent of his career, but the contemplated end of his appearing. He came not to incarnate an ideal of excellence for men to reach up to: He came to die, the Just One for the unjust, that He might bring us to God. Now this fact of his suffering unto death is a fact of universal interest in relation to the soul's wants and sins and terrors.

IT WAS NO MARTYRDOM, parallel to that of Stephen or Paul, but is an offering for sin, a manifestation of eternal love and righteousness, and a Divine appeal of the mightiest kind to the insensate conscience and the selfish heart of man.

The companion fact to be proclaimed is that Christ rose from the dead. Of this fact, so unexpected by them, and so undeniably supernatural, the Apostles were witnesses. They did not, indeed, see Him rising; but they saw Him risen, saw Him in the most diverse circumstances, his appearances to his disciples not being mere reproductions or repetitions of each other, but marvellously varied; saw Him again and again, saw Him so as to be absolutely assured of his identity, even the most incredulous being satisfied. His rising is it occupies a foremost place in their Gospel addresses; it is interwoven with their whole teaching; nothing can shake their testimony; and even the fear of death cannot keep them silent. Never do they speak of it as the imaginative clothing of a truth—a parable of the glorifying of humanity; but always as a real event, in precisely the same sense as the Crucifixion. This fact is the keystone of our religion. Not merely does the doctrine of our resurrection stand or fall with it; the Gospel itself stands or falls with it.

These are the two facts on which everything Christian reposes. They are of world-wide interest, and of interest throughout all centuries. There is more in them than the Church has yet learned. They are a security, absolutely so, that the Christian faith cannot sink down into a vague and powerless Deism. They differentiate it from every religion of sentiment, philosophy, imagination. These facts, meeting us in the very outset, take the Gospel preaching out of the region of bodiless abstractions, and impersonalities and philosophisings, and give it a character of reality.

Thoughts for Parents.

SYMPATHY.

"Be ye kind one to another—tender-hearted." (Eph. iv. 32.)

A CHILD needs sympathy as much as he does love. "Ten are loved where one is sympathised with." Lack of sympathy on the part of parents is a cause of great unhappiness in families, and yet there is no surer way of gaining the ear of your children than by sympathising with their joys and sorrows, lessons and play; every true child needs it.

Parents, if you feel that sympathy is not easy to show, cultivate it diligently; remember, if you lose opportunities of showing it, your children will turn to strangers, for sympathy they will have. By this bond of sympathy mothers can gain their girls' confidence, fathers can enter into the life of their boys; and difficult ways are made smoother.

Have sympathy with your children's tastes. If they have a bent for any one thing, do not try to quench it. If your boys or girls come to you for advice, enter as far as possible into their wishes; if impracticable, sympathise with their disappointment. If religious doubts arise, do not try to stamp them out by severity; talk matters over, and show your sympathy with difficulties. Frances S. Hallowes.

Watch.

"Couldest thou not watch one hour?" (Mark xiv. 37.)

WATCH thou with Me while others all are sleeping,
And hold Me up in silent, patient prayer.
If thou should'st fail, my angels, vigil-keeping,
My fainting form in tender hands shall bear.

Watch thou with Me, the soul's brief hours are speeding;
Shall I grow weary knocking at the door?
Stand thou with Me, and join with mine thy pleading.
I died to save that soul; what could I more?

Watch thou with Me, and break thy heart in watching,
Where thousand souls are sick with thousand ills;
Then, from my heart some love for sinners catching,
Go forth and labour where thy Master wills.

Watch thou with Me; thy soul shall prove the stronger,
And kindlier, larger shall thy service grow;
And thou shalt tarry in this place the longer,
And heights and depths unfathomed thou shalt know.

Phœnix Home for Blind Women.—The annual report of this institution states the work among blind women has made satisfactory progress. Rev. Vesey Mason acts as hon. chaplain, and a band of lady visitors has afforded much cheer to the inmates in reading to them and writing their letters. The hon. secretary is Miss A. Bostock, Lismore Road, South Croydon.

School for Bible Study.

IT is gratifying to be able to report fully sustained interest in the work of the Ten Weeks' School for Bible Study. The courses were continued last week, the attendance being admirably kept up in the various centres.

At the first meeting of the week, in King's Hall, Holborn, on Tuesday evening, the Epistle to the Ephesians was taken up. Having remarked upon the profundity of the Epistle, Dr. White observed that it has been regarded as pre-eminently the Epistle of the spiritual life. The Apostle did not seem to have any particular error in mind in order to its confutation; he seems to bask in the sunlight of God's presence, and to grow exultant as he dwells upon the riches of God's grace in Jesus Christ. A profitable study with this, as with other portions, is to read the Epistle through at a single sitting; and every time we thus read we shall detect new truths and acquire a fuller knowledge of the contents.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

There are many grounds for believing that the Apostle intended this to be a circular letter, although it may have gone first to Ephesus (see R.V. i. 1. marg.). Tychicus, who delivered the letter, was to make known the personal condition and affairs of the author (vi. 21, 22); hence the document takes no account of salutations, such as, for instance, make up the concluding chapter of Romans. Proceeding, Dr. White called attention to Acts xix., where the Apostle's visit to Ephesus is recorded, also to ch. xx. describing his interview with the Ephesian elders.

Passing on, reference was made to certain words used in the Epistle, apparently in allusive contrast to their use in the heathen philosophies and religious rites—including "knowledge," "wisdom," "prudence," "mystery," and "light." The "unfruitful works of darkness" have given place to "light in the Lord." Prominence is given to doctrine concerning the devil and evil spirits, as we might anticipate from Acts xix. 13-16. The profound teaching of the Epistle is not inconsistent with practical endeavour. For three years the Apostle was in contact with the Ephesians, admonishing them "night and day with tears" (Acts xx. 31).

Paul combined close contact with God—searching into the deep things of God—with daily movement among his fellow men, with the object of enabling them also to see God. The first three chapters are mystical and spiritual, but fully in harmony with every-day practical contact with men and work for God. Note was taken of expressions regarding building up or edification, and prayer or bowing the knees. An important word in the historical situation is which occurs twenty-seven times in the New Testament, six of them in this Epistle. It was by secret rites that devotees—a select few—were initiated into the mysteries of the worship of the goddess Diana. As to the Christians, Paul says they all have a right to the mysteries of religion, Jews and Gentiles alike being admitted into the secrets of God by Jesus Christ.

We are in the habit of regarding a mystery as something perplexing or difficult to understand. In the Epistle to the Ephesians the word is employed to indicate something "made known unto the sons of men," and consisting in the fact that the Gentiles are fellow-heirs, fellow-members of the body, and fellow-partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the Gospel. The word is used of something which is perfectly intelligible once it is revealed. Having called attention to the message to the Church in Ephesus, as given in Revelation ii., Dr. White spoke of the comprehensive teaching of the Epistle, the thought of which he found expressed in the one sentence, "Blessed be the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places" (i. 3). The first two verses are introductory, and the last two are in the form of a conclusion. Otherwise the book may be divided into SIX PARTS.

Chapter i. Thanksgiving to God for past and present blessings in Christ, with prayer for fuller realisation of the same.
Chapter ii. Past and present condition contrasted; figure of the Temple.
Chapter iii. Apostle's call to the ministry; thanksgiving on account of benefits experienced, and prayer for fuller blessing.
Chapters iv., v., and vi. What to do and how to do it; what to be and what not to be; what to put on and what to put off. In chapter iv we meet the figure of the Body; chapter v. the figure of Marriage. The underlying thought is the relation of Christ and the Church.

The first three chapters of the Epistle are doctrinal and dogmatic, telling of God's provision for the Church; the remainder are practical and hortatory, telling of man's response to God's provision. Beginning with the deep things of God, Paul comes to the things of everyday life — relations with fathers and mothers, servants and masters, children and neighbours. This well illustrates the vital connection subsisting between belief and practice. Developing this point, Dr. White showed that when the Apostle referred to the future it was never with the object of obscuring the present, but rather in order that the present might be more definitely improved. Some Christians dwell as much upon the future, that they are in danger of forgetting the duty of to-day. When the prophets spoke of the coming of Christ, it was in order that the people might turn from their sins in the present and live in harmony with the ultimate outcome of life.

The Epistle to the Ephesians was briefly compared with that to the Colossians. Both were written about the same time, but that to the Colossians was designed to meet a more specific condition or situation. While the Epistle to the Ephesians emphasises the idea of that to the Colossians emphasises the idea of Christ and the Cosmos. At Colosse a false philosophy had spread the notion that there were intermediaries or angelic orders of beings between Jesus and God; so Paul wrote in order to sweep this away by showing that Jesus is the fulness of God. In Ephesians, Christ is the Head of the body, the Church; in Colossians it is shown that He is before all things, and in Him all things consist.

In conclusion, Dr. White spoke of the references to grace and love in the Epistle to the Ephesians: as, for example, Christians are "rooted and grounded in love," and "grow up in love." Paul was a lovable man—as much so as John; and John was a man of faith as well as love. Note the doctrine of redemption, also the doctrine of the Father and of prayer. What a formula of prayer is that of ch. ii. 18, "Through Him (Christ) we both (Jews and Gentiles) have our access in one Spirit unto the Father!" The study was concluded with the prayerful desire of ch. i. 18-21—"that ye may know what is the hope of His calling . . . . the riches of the glory of His inheritance . . . . and the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe."

THE PROPHECY OF MICAH.

At Mildmay Conference Hall, on Thursday evening, the prophecy of Micah was outlined. Having spoken of the work of the prophets in preaching to their contemporaries in the name of God, Dr. White referred to the gracious forbearance of God which lies behind all such approaches, remonstrances, menaces, and promises. The dispensations have been arranged for the bringing of blessing to the multitudes of men, and we do well to extend our view so as also to take into account the possible purposes of God for other worlds in the limitless universe. Before choosing Israel, God twice dealt with the race as a whole—first in Adam, then in Noah. The selection of Abraham and his seed was not the outcome of a narrow favouritism, but in order that in due time all the nations of the earth might be blessed.

The period of the Divided Kingdom, in which Micah's lot was cast, was a dark time. The Jewish nation was approaching its end; and the need for prophets explains their existence, for prophecy is "a light shining in a dark place." Among of Micah's prophecies the following were mentioned:—(1) The resemblance of this book to Isaiah; e.g., compare Micah iv. 1-3 with Isaiah ii. 2-4. Who wrote first? Did both quote from another prophet? Observe that whereas Micah goes on to speak of the time when "all people will walk everyone in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever and ever," Isaiah appeals to his people, "O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." Again compare Micah vii. 7, 8, with Isaiah viii. 16, 17. The prophets were preparing for a catastrophe, and sought to rally the faithful. Yet though the immediate future was dark, all the prophets looked forward to a time when the nation would be redeemed from evil and enjoy God's manifested presence.

(2) Another characteristic was found in the various references to false prophets. All along there were priests and prophets who made it easy for unscrupulous rulers to oppress the people. The scoffs and taunts of these men are exhibited in Isaiah xxviii. 7-11; and woe is uttered against them in Isaiah v. 18, 19. Micah preached in the face of suchlike opposition; the false prophets said—about coming evil; let us see it, and then we shall know!" The unfaithful went further, and spoke of the prophets' word as the occasion of evil, attributing the judgment to the words of the true prophets, and killing them accordingly (ii. 6, 11). The oppression of the people is described in Micah iii. 1-7 under the figure of cannibalism, and the part of the false prophets in condoning the same is mentioned with severe reproach. Infidelity is no modern growth; it was met with by all the prophets, and as surely as its counsels prevailed was there ruin to the individual, the city, or the nation.

(3) The religious formalism of Israel is also shown. The people said: "Is not the Lord in the midst of us? No evil shall come upon us" (iii. 11). God would not visit them in judgment, nor his temple, nor his city! But what said the true prophet? "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, &c." (v. 12). Micah declared that judgment in the reign of Hezekiah, who repented, with the result that the curse was deferred (Jer. xxvi. 19).

With regard to the familiar prophecy regarding that Ruler from Bethlehem Ephratah, "whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting" (Micah v. 2-5), Dr. White remarked that the object of the words was to in view of the Assyrian invasions, that they might remain true to their principles and teach their children so that a faithful seed might be preserved. In conclusion, the point of chap. vii. 7-20 was indicated. The false prophets rested upon the promises of God to preserve the nation, but the true prophets spoke of coming judgments. Yet though the nations came upon Israel to punish the people for their sins, the true prophets never lost sight of the Divine purpose to preserve a faithful remnant. Hence Micah said, "Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? He will turn again, and have compassion upon us." In his wrath with his people God remembered mercy, and the promises made to the fathers of the race (vv. 18-20).

Owing to the strain of the very large meetings upon Professor White, the following alterations have been made:—

Kensington Town Hall.—Meetings will be held on Tuesdays at 8.30 on the following dates:—Feb. 21, Mar. 7 and 21.

King's Hall, Holborn.—Tuesdays, 5.30, Feb. 28 and Mar. 14. There will be no meeting at Queen's Hall on Wednesday morning, but at 3 o'clock each Wednesday afternoon from Feb. 22 to Mar. 22 inclusive.

The Hampstead meeting on Thursdays will be given up after this week; but Mildmay will go on as usual.

The Friday afternoon Eccleston Hall meeting will be given up, being amalgamated with the Queen's Hall meeting on Wednesday afternoon.

Aldersgate Street meeting for men only will also be discontinued after this week.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, Feb. 19. Numbers ii.

ON the march, Judah led the van. As Jacob predicted, the lion, which was his emblem, stooped to the spring. His hand was on the neck of his foes. Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh immediately followed the ark, and this gives point to the Psalmist's petition—

Before Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasseh,
Stir up thy strength, and come to save us.

God is a God of order. The ordered stars, marshalled in ranks and squadrons; the regular march of swarms of locusts, of flocks of birds; the command that the crowds should sit down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties; and the precise regulations of the Holy Ghost, through the Apostle, for the exercise of gifts in the Corinthian Church, are all of a piece with this chapter. And it is certain that a holy soul will be an orderly soul. The chamber which is occupied by a true saint will have about it some traces of the order which characterised the grave as Jesus left it on the Resurrection morning.

God is a God of unity: Many tribes, but one nation; many standards, but one direction, one army; many folds, but one flock. The mischief is not in pitching beside or marching under your standard, but in trying to make out that your standard is the only one, and that those who do not muster around it have no right to call themselves by the name of Israel.

MONDAY, Feb. 20. Numbers iii.

The story of Levi will always be of profound significance, as showing how a curse may be transformed into a blessing. The dying Jacob classed Simeon and Levi in his condemnation, as they had been confederate in sin; and in the case of Simeon, his curse took deadly effect. In the course of a brief period, the tribe faded almost entirely from the map. But few tribes are mentioned oftener than Levi; indeed, all the sweet singers sprang from its sons.

The patriarch's words were exactly fulfilled in their history:

"I will divide them in Jacob,
And scatter them in Israel."

But this scattering became a national benediction; for the Levitical cities, scattered throughout the land, became centres of light and blessing.

And here, though they are condemned to servile work, yet they are the custodians and bearers of the sacred Tabernacle and its vessels. Moreover, the service of the Levites was the equivalent for that of the first-born sons of Israel, whom Jehovah from the night of the Exodus accounted to be his own. It appears that there were almost as many first-born sons as Levites, and the difference was made good by the payment of redemption money for the overplus.

TUESDAY, Feb. 21. Numbers iv.

The active service of the Tabernacle was for men between thirty and fifty, in the prime of man's physical strength. But at fifty there still awaited them the blessed office of exercising a teaching ministry throughout Israel, and for this their intimate knowledge of the sacred ritual, and their reverend experience, rendered them peculiarly fit.

Everyone had "his service and burden." These words are reiterated. They remind us of the Master's words, "To every man his work." For each believer there is an appropriate duty. Though it be light as carrying a tent-peg, yet if that peg be forgotten or mislaid, or left on the desert sand, the whole fabric will be marred in its erection, unless someone else, in addition to his own burden, assumes the neglected work of his brother. The cause of failure and breakdown on the part of some of God's servants is doubtless attributable to the indolence or inadvertence of others.

Do not think yourself above carrying your tent-peg; but do it with as much reverence as if it were the sacred Ark itself. It is not what you carry, but the way in which you carry it, that is all-important in the sight of God. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord."

How many there are who are like these Levites, in that they handle what they never see! Oh, for our eyes to be enlightened, that we may know the things which are freely given to us of God!

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 22. Numbers v.

"In the midst whereof I dwell." Yes, God was there. That Tabernacle in the midst of the Israelites was his own palace and court, and they were to think of Him as a fellow-traveller. Every person and every act was to be viewed in the light of that thought; whatever was distasteful to Him must be put away, whoever sinned against Him must be cut off. Thus the Holy Spirit is in the midst of the Church to-day; He dwells in her as his chosen home. It is his seat or see; and it was this that invested Peter's words with such profound significance when he addressed Ananias and Sapphira: "How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord?"

There were three steps to forgiveness and restoration, which are as vital to-day as in the days of these types and emblems. First, confession; next, restitution; thirdly, sacrifice. The two former would be ineffective but for the latter. But how living the lesson for ourselves! Too often we content ourselves with the blood that has been shed, while we shirk confession and restitution.

Let us think of jealousy as it is attributed to the flame of the Divine love, and remember how often we have given just cause for it. "Know ye not that the Spirit which God hath made to dwell within us yearneth even unto jealous envy?" (James iv. 7. See R.V marg.)

THURSDAY, Feb. 23. Numbers vi.

It is significant that this chapter, which contains the law of the Nazarite, also contains the solemn benediction which Aaron and his sons were to pronounce on Israel. The separated life always ends in blessing, in the light of the manifested face of God. Blessed, kept, beholding the face, receiving the grace, and resting in the peace of God—such is the beatitude of the separated life.

The Nazarite was to abstain from wine and strong drink; and if we would be separate to God, we must abjure the false stimulants of the world. "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." In other words, let the Holy Spirit produce the same results in you as are sought by the worldly in earthly excitements and stimulants.

The Nazarite was to allow the locks of his hair to grow naturally, unshorn and flowing; and if we would be separate to God we must refuse to conform to the fashions of the world around. Dare to be singular, dare to stand alone, dare to wear the garb of the New Jerusalem, even though the natives of Vanity Fair deride.

The Nazarite must not touch death, or, if he did, all the days of his separation went for nothing. "The former days shall be void." So, the separate soul must not seek his intimate associations and fellowship in those who are dead in trespasses and sins. "Let the dead bury their dead." Do not always be considering, however, how much you must renounce, but of all that awaits you in the risen Lord. Live on that side of your nature, and you will insensibly be drawn from the fascinations and lures of evil. The negations of Christianity result from its affirmations.

We are attracted by the stately enumeration of this chapter. A modern chronicler would have been inclined to generalise and say that the twelve princes, on twelve succeeding days, offered identical offerings. Not so the sacred historian. It is as though we were to understand that each gift we make stands out clearly and sharply defined before God. Each contribution in a whole collection is entered as a separate item in God's account, to be produced among the other books at the day of judgment. How foolish it would have seemed if one of these princes had given a kid of the goats and a salt spoon whilst acting as head of one of the tribes of Israel! Yet that is the kind of record which will have to be read out before assembled worlds of some of the wealthy men who attend our churches.

The closing verse of the chapter is most significant. When the princes had made their offering, Moses appears to have expected that the Divine voice would speak; nor was he disappointed. He went into the tent of meeting to speak with God, but before he could say what he wished, he heard the voice speaking from above the mercy-seat. Well would it be for us if this were our more frequent experience. We often go in to speak to God, and insist on speaking, and refuse to wait for his voice to us. But if only we would hush our words, and hold our breath and wait, we too should hear that voice, full and sweet as the sound of many waters; and God would give us messages which we in turn might pass on to others.

SATURDAY, Feb. 25. Numbers viii.

The Levites were, so to speak, offered to God as a wave-offering. Just as the priest waved a portion of a sacrifice before God, as an obvious method of presenting the whole, so metaphorically this whole tribe were waved as Israel's gift to God. "Aaron offered them for a wave-offering before the Lord. And after that went they in to do their service."

Surely the counterpart of this is found in Acts xiii., where the Holy Ghost said, "Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." Then they fasted, and prayed, and laid their hands on them, and sent them away. Now this laying on of hands evidently did not signify the communication of the Holy Ghost, but the presentation of these men to God, as the gift of the Church for his work. And in many other instances in the New Testament, where we read of the laying-on of hands, we must find the key of interpretation here.

This thought of the wave-offering might be carried into many departments of Christian service. Missionaries, Sunday-school teachers, principals of colleges, and others who are dedicated to special functions, which they perform on behalf of the Church, may be regarded as wave-offerings. But those who would minister to God or man must cleanse themselves through the washing of water by the Word, and through the atoning blood, that there may be no wrath upon them or those who commission them.

Other Lands.

Days in Lucknow.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

LAST evening we stood, with hushed voices, by the well at Cawnpore, into which Nana Sahib flung more than two hundred still palpitating bodies of the women and children who had been massacred at his command. The well is now filled up, and the mound is surrounded by a chaste balustrade, in the centre of which is the figure of an angel in white marble, her arms crossed on her breast, each hand holding a palm branch. It was very beautiful and very touching.

It was quite impossible to read without emotion the inscription over the entrance gateway: "These are they which came out of great tribulation;" or that around the wall: "Sacred to the perpetual memory of a great company of Christian people, chiefly women and children, who near this spot were cruelly murdered, and cast, the dying with the dead, into the well below, on the 15th day of July, 1857."

But to-day a yet deeper surge of emotion swept over us. Between our meetings we drove up to the Old Residency of Lucknow, which must for ever be sacred ground to all who revere the memory of Outram, Colin Campbell, and Havelock—three Christian soldiers, who sustained the noblest traditions of British chivalry, and added great renown during the terrible Indian Mutiny.

This is the gateway where most of the fighting took place. See how the plaster is dinted with bullet marks and the upper portions shattered by cannon! By this road Havelock and Outram made their way with their relief column, fighting every inch through the dense mass of rebels. In that room, on the left, the gallant Henry Lawrence died, from the splinter of an exploding shell. There is the banqueting-hall, used as a hospital, because secluded from the incessant cannonade, which for eighty-four days and nights was poured upon these buildings. In this large underground chamber the women and children were hidden, though stray shots would find their way even here. Near that pillar a mother was standing when a bullet killed her babe; and yonder a cannon-ball plunged into the brickwork, killing a woman with the fright. Everywhere births and deaths and prayers and agony to blood mingled.

There is the well to which they crept for water under a perpetual shower of hail. In one of these rooms must the meeting for daily prayer have been held, called by the Christian general, who knew that real safety was to be found only beneath the shadow of the Almighty.

On the mound there, beneath which are entombed the débris of the wrecked and shattered buildings, a chaste monument records the fact that here Sir Henry Lawrence and 2,000 British soldiers and others

LAID DOWN THEIR LIVES.

From this point the long procession of women and children started, under cover of darkness and between the long lines of soldiers, on the night when the Residency was finally evacuated, and the fugitives convoyed to a place of safety.

The buildings are covered now with the foliage and festoons of climbing plants. All around the grounds are rich with a tropical luxuriance. The palm, the rose, the forest tree give shadow and fragrance. The well-kept lawns are velvet to the foot; but the blackened ruins, the inscriptions on the houses where the fight was hottest and brave men fell, the dint of bullet, and the rent of cannon-ball tell the story as freshly as though it were yesterday, and not forty years ago, that Sir Henry Havelock (when the safety of the fugitives was assured), at the Alum Bagh, five miles from here, worn out by watchings, labours, anxiety, and dysentery, called his eldest son to his side, saying, "Come, see how a Christian man can die!"

We spoke a few words with the old soldier who passed through the siege, attached to the person of Sir Henry Havelock, and who fights again the battle, living more in the past than the present; then crossed the lawn to the cemetery with reverend and chastened hearts. It is not far from the ruined Residency, and was, of course, within the original enclosure. It is beautiful with flowers and feathery bamboos.

But ah, how great is the contrast presented to the calm beauty of nature by the gravestones, with their touching inscriptions! Each commemorates some incident in the story of the defence and relief of Lucknow. Here are buried the chaplain and his only child; here women and children, struck down by the fiery hail; here a brother officer erects a memorial to his friend; here is the spot where the body of General Neill was laid; and here Henry Lawrence rests well. It was through a mist of tears that I read the inscription, which he himself suggested, "Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty." During his last moments, when they asked him where he would like to be interred, and what should be engraved on the memorial tablet, he said: "Let me lie with my men; make as little parade and show as possible; and put on my grave that 'I tried to do my duty.'" Who is there that would not wish for a similar epitaph; but few can dare to claim even this. One sometimes fears that one dare not claim to have done, or even tried to do, one's duty, so full does life seem of failure, shortcoming, and

THE IDOLATRY OF SELF.

We tear ourselves from the sacred spot, and drive through the old harem of the kings of Oudh, a vast yellow-coloured quadrangle with apartments for 500 wives, a memorial of the degradation of woman, save where the religion of Jesus Christ has emancipated her from her chains, and raised her to share with man, on equal terms, a common home and life.

So to the hospitable home and welcome of Miss Thoburn, where a great assemblage of missionaries and others awaits us. Here is General Waller, who, though at liberty to enjoy retirement and leisure after a long life of military service, has returned to work among the soldiers. Here is Mary Reed, who has consecrated her life to the lepers, and who has just been recovered from leprosy in answer to prayer. Here are the representatives of the C.M.S., American Presbyterians, and American Methodists, ladies of the Indian Female Normal School Society, missionaries and their wives of all societies, from a wide area, and a great company of Miss Thoburn's teachers and workers—all one in Christ, greeting each other lovingly, and chatting of each other's work. Then for half an hour I speak of the best things; my heart yearns over this great wealth of life and power. There is force enough here, if it be energised by the Holy Spirit, to shake the whole of the North-West.

It is pitiful that Miss Thoburn is obliged to leave her great work here in order to visit the United States to raise £3,000 needed for the completion of her premises. Heavy expenditure has been incurred through the sinking of foundations and the inevitable extension which her success has necessitated. God has indeed honoured her, and it is a great privilege to sit beside her at meals and hear her matured views on methods of Christian work.

WE HAVE HAD GREAT BLESSING

on the meetings at Lahore, Agra, and Cawnpore. Writing from Lahore, a well-known missionary says: "The Conference has indeed been a time of refreshment to us all; and I think, with many, it is to be truly not the goal, but the starting-point." At Agra, several said that the meetings would be the beginning of a new life. To God be all the glory!

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance and benefit of a tour like this in the insight which it gives to methods of missionary enterprise. I cannot be thankful enough for the friendships which are being made, and the invaluable information being gained, to say nothing of the help one is permitted to afford to many of God's choice servants.

Lucknow, Jan. 14.

Since writing the above, we have paid a memorable visit to Benares, a description of which I hope to furnish in my next letter. Suffice it to say now that Dr. Lazarus invited all the workers of the neighbourhood to meet in his spacious drawing room, and I was able to speak to them for a considerable time on the anointing and enduement of the Holy Spirit.

Thence to Allahabad, where the unparalleled opportunity is given me of speaking for two hours a day at the meetings of the Indian Christian Endeavour Society. The Bishop's Diocesan Conference is being held at the same time, and many of the clergy are also able to attend our gatherings. I am humbled with a sense of thankfulness to God for permitting me to speak to so many of my beloved fellow-workers of the things that lie so near our hearts. Who am I that to me this grace should be given to declare the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to make all men see what is hidden for them in Him?

Mrs. Meyer and I are well, and certainly just now the weather is perfect—always pure air, unclouded skies, lovely sunshine, and beautiful breeze. But doubtless it will be more trying as we go further south. Our passage is taken from Colombo, March 3. Will my friends pray that, if it be God's will, nothing in the way of plague restrictions may prevent our carrying out the entire itinerary.

IN CALCUTTA.

A great blessing is coming upon the meetings in this city in answer to prayer. Day after day great audiences gather in the church built for Bishop Thoburn's ministry, which is the largest in the city; and though the addresses deal with the deepest questions of the Christian life, and are often much prolonged, the attention is unbroken. On many sides there are indications of the revolutions which are taking place through personal consecration and reliance on the Holy Spirit.

To be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Campbell White is in itself a great privilege, but in addition I have been welcomed at a special meeting of the Calcutta Missionary Conference; have addressed two meetings of Bengali Christians, the students at the Duff College, and those of the L.M.S. Theological Seminary, besides special gatherings at the C.M.S. and L.M.S. centres. The kindness shown me by all classes and denominations can never be effaced from my memory.

The associations of Calcutta and Serampore, a town at twelve miles' distance, are very interesting. The day before yesterday we visited the chapel which Dr. Carey succeeded in erecting after heart-breaking delays caused by the opposition of the East India Company. We looked into the baptistry, where he baptized Dr. Judson, and handled the massive Communion service presented to him for his valuable services as Professor of Eastern Languages.

Yesterday we visited Serampore; held a meeting in the room where Carey died; went through the magnificent college buildings, which were built largely at his own cost; handled the first edition of his Bengali Bible; saw the chairs which he, Marshman, and Ward were accustomed to use; lifted the crutches on which he leant in his old age, and marvelled at the array of grammars, dictionaries, and translations in various languages to which he devoted so much time and labour.

Then we visited Henry Martyn's Pagoda, for that scholar and saint spent six months at Serampore on first landing in India. His diary is full of reminiscences of the place and of his loving intercourse with the Serampore missionaries. This pagoda stood in the grounds of the friend, David Brown, with whom he was staying, and he made it his constant resort. It was very sweet to pray aloud in that place, of which he had said, "I prayed aloud to my God, and the echoes returned from the vaulted roof. May I so pray that the dome of heaven may resound!"

We went then to the cemetery, where lie the mortal remains of the three great missionaries who had lived in loving and unbroken friendship, and of a little child of Dr. Judson. It was touching to read the inscription on Dr. Carey's monument, placed there at his own request :

"A wretched, poor, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arms I fall."

We also visited the Temple and Car of Juggernaut, mentioned by Carey and H. Martyn, and the chapel which the missionaries erected on the banks of the Hooghly, looking across to the Governor-General's residence.

What marvels have been wrought in this 100 years! And of how many translations, buildings, and achievements have not these been the progenitors? Heathenism is not dead, but in the great cities it has received a mortal wound. For instance, the discontinuance of annual sacrifices is being seriously discussed in all parts, and the attendance of the great heathen melas is not what it was. And some day soon the structure, which has so long defied the soldiers of the Cross, must suddenly crumble to the ground, because men of this generation are rapidly ceasing to believe in the religion of their fathers.

Calcutta, January 26.

Livingstone College.

THE highly important objects of Livingstone College and the deeply interesting record of its work account in large measure for the genial warmth of the proceedings on Thursday last, when the annual meeting was held at the Memorial Hall. The remainder of enthusiasm evinced on the occasion may reasonably be put down to a growing sense of the place of bodily health in the economy of missions, and the urgency of missionaries being prepared to deal with common diseases, although they may not all be qualified by full medical training to do much more in the way of treating disease. A conversazione which preceded the meeting gave opportunity for pleasant exchange of thought and opinion.

Dr. Harford-Battersby read extracts from a report which gave of the work of the college and its associated medical mission. It is little more than five years since the College was founded, but already students that have passed through its courses of study are at work in north, south, east and west of the African Continent; in various parts of India, in many districts of China, in the Straits Settlements, New Guinea, Samoa, and North Queensland, in Venezuela, Peru, and other parts of South America, and in North-West America and Labrador. Quite naturally the report took account of these developments, and gave details of the work of students in many lands. For instance, Mr. E. A. Thomas, labouring at Valencia, Venezuela, where there are many qualified doctors, said: "Daily, and often several times in the day, I find the knowledge acquired at Livingstone College of the greatest service. When one is in a foreign country, surrounded by people speaking a strange tongue, with stranger ideas concerning how to treat sickness, a very little knowledge is far from being dangerous; it is of the utmost value." With reference to the old adage referred to by Mr. Thomas, a new version is contributed by Mr. T. Torrance, who is at work in Inland China. He finds the chief value of his training when itinerating, and says:—"Then is the time one appreciates the benefit of knowing something, and as a proverb says, 'A little knowledge is easily carried about.'"

These and similar facts suggest ample reasons and arguments why missionary societies in general should equip their workers with at least an elementary knowledge of the care of their own health, and the treatment of common ailments, before sending them forth to dangerous and isolated spheres of labour. The report held out promise of further unfolding in the work of the college in the following terms:—"Only a comparatively small number of missionaries are able to devote sufficient time to take up the Livingstone College course, yet there are certain elementary facts as to sanitation—these and many kindred subjects should be studied by every intending missionary, and it is the neglect of the simplest precautions in these departments which have led to most serious results. How a knowledge of such matters as these may be provided, so that all may be able to obtain the information which is necessary, is engaging the attention of the council of Livingstone College; and it is hoped that, before another year is out, practical steps may be taken to disseminate much more widely hints on tropical hygiene, so that they may be within the reach of all."

As to the medical mission in East London, which has not only been of service to the poor, but done much to bring students into contact with experimental treatment, an interesting announcement was made. For some time there has been doubt as to the district in which this work should be continued, but at length it has been decided to carry it on at Bethnal Green, in connection with the vigorous parochial work of Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield. In this department home and foreign mission work is combined in a way to enlist the sympathy of all. Mr. R. L. Barclay, treasurer, made a brief financial statement, from which it appeared that while the medical mission will always need assistance, the requirements of the College will depend upon the extent to which missionary agencies support it by sending students. Mr. Theodore Howard (who occupied the chair) followed with some hearty words. No argument was needed to show that knowledge, on the part of missionaries, of the conditions of health and the means of treating disease, must result in

WIDER SERVICE AND LENGTHENED LIVES.

Four missionaries at present studying in the college also delivered brief addresses; and as they knew from observation the great importance of some medical knowledge in daily work on the field, their words carried much weight. These were Rev. H. J. Molony (C.M.S.), of the Gonds' Mission in India; Mr. E. J. Butler, of the Friends' Mission in Central India; and Messrs. F. W. Savidge and J. H. Lorrain, of the Assam Pioneer Mission.

The least attentive listener could not but be struck with the ardour of men who devoted their months of furlough to studies intended to qualify them for more thorough service. Communications to Dr. Harford-Battersby, principal of the College, should be addressed 83, Hamfrith Road, Stratford, E.

Sailors' Rest, Antwerp.

THE work at the Sailors' Rest during the last few months has been steadily increasing. Although shipping has been slack, the reading-room has been well-attended and Gospel services have been held every eving. Many, when leaving, say they shall never forget the time spent at the rest. The last month has been a season of peril and shipwreck, and as we hear the tales of suffering and loss of life, and visit in the hospital men who have been injured during the gales, it makes us doubly anxious to bring the good news of salvation to them.

We are in need of Flemish tracts and suitable English ones for distribution on the ships and in the boarding-houses. We shall also be grateful for help towards the carrying-on of the work. Our treasurer in London is Mr. W. C. Parkinson, L.C.C., 18, Carleton Road, N.

Work for Lepers.

CHEERING tidings of blessing come from Almora, where the mission to lepers supports some sixty inmates. At Christmas there were seven candidates for baptism. So marked has been the spiritual blessing in this large asylum that Rev. G. F. Bulloch is able to report that there is only one non-Christian inmate in it. There is urgent need of a small hospital building in which helpless cases can be better treated than is possible in the little cottages. The cost will be about £130, of which one friend has generously promised £100 providing the balance is raised.

From the neighbouring asylums of Pui and Poladpur we hear of as many as 100 baptisms during the past year, and there also the need of extension is urgent. The missionary in charge, Rev. I. B. Bawa, has had literally to turn away homeless lepers who have sought admission. These could each be sheltered, fed, and evangelised at an annual cost of £6.

The West Indies Disaster.

FIFTEEN out of seventeen Wesleyan chapels in the Island of St. Vincent alone are still lying in ruins, besides numbers of mission houses, teachers' houses and schools. The missionaries survey the ruins with sighs, but are comparatively helpless. The Lord Mayor's Fund was wholly applied in relieving the starving and houseless victims of the hurricane. A belief has widely prevailed that the mission churches would receive a share of the Imperial grant proportionate to their needs. This belief has led many to withhold help under the impression that it was not needed.

The facts are these. The Home Government have granted and loaned to St. Vincent £53,000, and the three denominations have received only £3,000, £1,040 falling to the share of the Wesleyan Mission. The cost of restoration of buildings and reinstating the mission premises will approach £20,000. The missionaries know not what to do, and they implore us to stand by them. One who has been forty years in the work writes: "I am almost broken-hearted, but I shall be willing—so will my brethren—to suffer a while longer if we can only get help to rebuild our churches and mission houses. I am very disconsolate over our waste places. We can wear our worn-out clothes a little longer, and live on fungee for some time yet, if we could only see our way to restore our churches and to house our people."

I may say that I am co-operating with the Wesleyan Missionary secretaries.

Probably the most urgent need of the Missionary enterprise in India at the present time is a steady supply of suitable literature, thoroughly permeated with the Christian spirit and available at prices that will not only bring it within reach of all classes, but tempt indifferent ones to purchase. Not one-hundreth part is being done of what might be done without over-reaching the demand if funds were at the command of the Christian Literature Society and the various tract societies of the country. Books and tracts find their way where missionaries cannot go, and do their work surely, though silently.—Indian Witness.

Tunis.—Miss Case, writing from 9, Rue de la Municipalité, Tunis, says:—"Our Sunday and week-day Bible Schools are prospering, and of the fact that the Lord is still with us, willing to bless and save, we recently had proof, when two for whom we have often prayed came to our house, asking: 'Will you tell us what we must do to be saved? From this evening we wish to be wholly the Lord's.' We are now asking very earnestly that some brother may be sent to care for the converts of the mission, and to carry on the work. Next summer, Miss Gitsham and I hope to take a rest of some months at home, and she cannot return to Tunis, as she needs a more bracing climate. I cannot work alone, even if I am led to live again in this city."

Work among French Priests.—A second monthly paper appealing to French Romanists is Le Prêtre Converti, edited by a band of ex-priests, who have taken their stand by the evangelical faith. Though friendly disposed towards Abbé Bourrier's paper Le Chrétien Français, the new comer moves on a slightly different plane, and opens with a bold pronouncement for Protestantism, both in doctrine and practice. Le Prêtre Converti takes good account of current work among priests. It is under the management of M. J. B. Corneloup, 25, Rue Carle-Hébert, Courbevoie, Seine, France. The subscription price to foreign countries is 3fr. 5c. per annum.

A Persecuted People.

RUSSIAN "WARRIORS OF THE SPIRIT."

In view of the recent emigration of this interesting sect from Russia to Nova Scotia a brief review of their origin and tenets may be of general interest.

The "Doukhobortsi" had their rise in Russia about the end of the last century, when the name of "Warriors of the Spirit" or "Spirit Wrestlers" was given to them, probably by the Bishop of Ekaterinoslaff. They were markedly peculiar (especially in Russia), in so far as they frequented no churches, recognised no outward form of Sacrament (whether of baptism, communion, or marriage), had no definite form of liturgy, and refused to bear arms. Yet the general consensus of opinion, even from the most unlikely sources, has always been to the effect that the "Spirit Wrestlers" afforded wonderful example of well-organised, social, peasant life, wherein love, charity, and faith in God were held to be the essentials. Thus in 1792 Kohovsky, the Governor of Ekaterinoslaff, in his report to those in power, said they were of exemplary conduct, led a moral life, avoiding idleness and drunkenness, and occupying themselves with the welfare of their households.

Again in 1801, Senators Lopoukim and Neledinski, who had been sent to report on two of the provinces in which these people lived, said practically the same thing to the Czar Alexander I., with the result that he (anxious to isolate the people) allowed them to settle in the so-called "milky waters" of the Taurid province. In 1816 the Czar, in one of his rescripts on the subject, stated that "All the measures of severity exhausted upon them during the thirty years up to 1801 not only did not destroy the sect, but more and more multiplied the number of its adherents." He therefore proposed more humane treatment; but in Russia the Czar proposes, and the things

DO NOT ALWAYS HAPPEN.

Under Nicholas I. the persecution waxed greater, and in 1840 and 1850 the "Spirit Wrestlers" were all banished from the Tauris district to Transcaucasus, near the Turkish frontier. The explanation of this is to be found in a resolution of a Committee of Ministers held in 1826: "being transported to the extreme borders of the Caucasus, and being always confronted with the hillsmen, they must of necessity protect their property and families by force of arms." The place chosen had, in addition, a most severe climate—the altitude being 5,000 feet above sea level, and the crops being frequently destroyed by frost. Yet there these steadfast folk continued to live their peaceful patient life, eliciting admiration from their Mohammedan neighbours, and transforming the semi-wilderness into flourishing colonies; so that what persecution had failed to achieve, prosperity accomplished; and little by little the younger members began to fall away (in intensity at least) from the faith of their forefathers. Yet at the fresh breath of persecution the old enthusiasm blazed forth again. In 1887 universal military service was introduced into the Caucasus, and those who had formerly been exempted on religious grounds were compelled to serve. Unprepared for this move, the "Spirit Wrestlers" at first complied, but the elders exhorted the young men, while submitting to the outward observances, never to really make use of their arms. As might be expected, such a compromise could not long endure; and a question of internal administration in the party

BROUGHT MATTERS TO A HEAD.

One of the "Spirit Wrestlers," by what is alleged to have been an illegal decision of the Government, succeeded in getting the public property of the sect (estimated at half a million roubles) vested in his own interest. This led to general protest, and several of the leaders of the party were banished; but the feeling thus roused could not easily be subdued. The majority (perhaps regarding this somewhat in the light of retribution for their backsliding) determined to reinforce the older and stricter rules (including that of communal property, which the dissenter had thus broken), and about 12,000 members accepted the new regime. They returned to their strictly Christian life, renounced all shares in acts of violence (including military service), divided up all their property (thus supplying the wants of the poorer brethren), and returned to their earlier mode of living, abjuring wine, meat, tobacco, and every kind of excess.

In token of their sincerity the members of the "Great Party," as they were now called, decided in 1895 to burn all their arms. These, be it noted, were not Government property, but personal goods, which they had, contrary to their earlier tenets, begun to keep for their own protection. The general burning was fixed for June 28, 1895, and was to take place at the same time in three different districts, viz., at Tiflis, Elisavetpol, and in the territory of Kars. At the time fixed the bonfires were lighted, and the people stood singing Psalms as they watched the destruction of their property. In Kars nothing of any moment happened; in Elisavetpol many of the party were imprisoned, but in Tiflis

THE RESULTS WERE TERRIBLE.

There the burning was to take place near the village of Gorelve, which unfortunately was the headquarters of the "Small Party"—those who had obtained possession of the large portion of the public funds.

Whether they were really alarmed for their personal safety, or whether they merely wished to destroy their opponents, certain it is that they informed the authorities that an organised attack was to be made upon the village; whereupon the Cossacks were ordered out. They arrived at the bonfire in the early morning, and the men and women who had destroyed their arms and were singing Psalms, were soon taught the bitter results of their newly reinforced tenets. Men and women alike were beaten with whips. Later on the troops were quartered on the "Wrestlers," their property was destroyed, men were ill-treated, and women degraded. The three hundred men who refused to serve in the army, were thrown into prison, or sent into a penal battalion. Many were banished to unhealthy neighbourhoods, and illness was soon rife amongst them; thus in one place of exile, the district of Signak, 106 deaths occurred amongst the 100 families settled there. Nor were actual martyrs wanting. In July, 1895, Kerill Konkin died from the direct results of his corporal punishment. Nor can his case be regarded as a solitary example.

Finding it impossible to gain religious freedom in their own country the Wrestlers looked for help elsewhere. Some of the leading members of the sect, when offered the alternative of banishment to the Baltic provinces or complete exile from Russia, chose the latter course as a means whereby they might help their brethren, and so it has proved.

THE STRONG NOTE OF PEACE,

as sounded in their creed, appealed strongly to the English Quakers, who have proved friends indeed to these persecuted people; and it is to a large extent owing to their assistance that we now wait to hear of the arrival of the "Spirit Wrestlers" at St. John, New Brunswick.

It is difficult to formulate the creed of the sect, it being to some extent negative. They never have definite churches, nor do they worship images. They keep no fasts (a great offence in Russian eyes), and they take no part in the recreations of worldly people. They have no fixed Holy Day (for all days are holy), and meetings are held in each other's houses. Should the owner be poor, he provides what he can, and the others bring the rest, for the eating of a frugal supper is part of their service. On entering, the men greet the men, the women the women, by clasping hands, bowing, and kissing. By this they signify love and kindly feeling, the rejection of pride and the cleansing of the body, as well as reverence for each other, inasmuch as they are the "Temple of the Holy Spirit." During the meeting, the men and women recite such prayers as they know; they sing Psalms, and explain the Word of God to each other. The virtue most esteemed amongst them is mutual love; they respect and show hospitality; they are compassionate to animals (rarely killing anything), insist on strict obedience from children to parents, and observe scrupulous cleanliness, and order in domestic matters. For the rest, they have no written rules, and punishments are unknown amongst them. Reverence for the dead is shown, they say, by good works; in fact, they do not speak of the death of a Christian, but merely that "our brother has changed." Simple in their mode of life, and steadfast in their faith, with a background of hideous, cruel, suffering, as the result of their heroic determination, the figures of these emigrants stand out with startling clearness; and one can but hope that their lot may now fall in pleasanter places; while all who are interested in spiritual matters will watch with eager eyes those "Warriors of the Spirit," who are about to begin again the battle of life in their new found land.—The Scotsman.

Off to Zambesia.

On Saturday last a party of fourteen missionaries left in the Pembroke Castle to join Rev. François Coillard in the Barotsi mission on the Upper Zambesi. At Bulawayo these devoted friends will be met by others, and the expedition up country will start about the middle of March. Such a reinforcement of a mission of historic interest is ground of hearty rejoicing among supporters of the work, and much prayer is being offered for God's blessing, not only upon the labourers now in the field, but also upon the outgoing missionaries, which include six newly-married couples.

A deeply-interesting meeting of farewell was held on Friday last in the Swiss Church, Endell Street, W.C. Those who attended could not but be impressed with the words that were spoken by four of the new missionaries. Their utterances were characterised by a spirit of sobriety and consecration that augurs well for the future of God's work in the Central African field of the Paris Evangelical Mission. The meeting was presided over by Mr. J. E. Mathieson, and brief addresses were delivered by the outgoing missionaries.

Rev. M. Liénard (Montauban) showed how prayer had been marvellously answered in the reinforcement of the Mission, and appealed to Christian people to follow the work with a prayerful sympathy. Rev. M. Bouchet (Geneva) spoke of the command of Christ and the claims of the heathen. Those who go will face many temptations; therefore he asked for the prayers of those who stay at home. Dr. von Prosch (Berlin and Geneva) spoke of the joy with which, after conversion, he determined to devote his life to medical mission work. His brief experience in Senegal would prove of service; but his trust was in the Lord, who had opened his way in a wonderful manner. The last missionary speaker was Rev. Th. Burnier (Lausanne), who found encouragement in the assurance that God's strength would be his stay in the far-off land.

Hearty words were also spoken by Dr. Tron, of the Waldensian Church in Florence. Several other foreign pastors were present, including Revs. F. Dègremont (French Church, Soho) and M. Arnett (French Church, Bayswater). The gathering was memorable for its noble object, but it also afforded striking evidence of the high place which the great mission cause is taking in the minds of French-speaking Protestants. It was fitting that these signs should be manifested in London, for from Continental papers we learn that the farewell proceedings in Paris were of unparalleled interest.

Madrid.—Some interesting gatherings were held in this city in connection with the Christmas festivities given by the Evangelical Mission, superintended by Miss Leake. The poor people were impressed by the kindness shown, and the gospel message fell on welcome ears. Now and then unexpected visitors attend the meetings, and the work is a testimony for the simple truths of salvation in the midst of Romish error and superstition. Miss Leake would gladly receive the practical help of Christian friends: her address is Calle Diego de Leon, 8, Pral y Bajo, Madrid.

The Late J. C. Lanphier.

Founder of Fulton Street Daily Prayer Meeting.

HAVING nearly attained the venerable age of four score and ten, Mr. Jeremiah C. Lanphier, of New York, was, a few weeks since, called to his eternal rest. For considerably more than a generation his name has been a household word in praying circles throughout the world, as the man who inaugurated the daily noon meeting for prayer at Fulton Street, New York. That meeting has been held on week days without a break for more than forty years. For a good part of that time our departed brother was the leading figure in the daily gathering of suppliants, and he only relinquished his place when compelled to do so by growing infirmity.

Of Dutch ancestry on the maternal side, Mr. Lanphier was a native of the State of New York, and as a young man worked in the city at the occupation of tailoring. He attended the Broadway Tabernacle Church, and was there led to faith in Christ under the pastorate of Rev. E. W. Andrews. He soon began to take an active part in church work, and became acquainted with some members of the consistory of the North Dutch Church in Fulton Street. He was led to relinquish a business career and accept the post of missionary in connection with the Dutch Church. Part of his duty was the visitation of the many hotels near by, and he was also made superintendent of a daily gathering for prayer held in the church building.

Mr. Lanphier entered on his new sphere in 1857, the year of the great American Revival, in which many thousands in the Eastern and Middle States were swept into the visible Church of God. Prayer meetings were held daily in many centres, and a wave of spiritual power overflowed the land. A most interesting record of that hallowed time was published in an American contemporary journal a year ago, and a portion of the narrative will appear in an early issue. The writer of that account thus describes the starting of the famous meeting in Fulton Street and its outcome:—

Mr. Lanphier was walking along the streets when the idea was suggested to his mind that an hour of prayer, from twelve to one o'clock, would be beneficial to business men. Arrangements were accordingly made, and at noon on September 23, 1857, the door of the third-story lecture-room was thrown open. At half-past twelve the step of a solitary individual was heard upon the stairs, thus indicating that Mr. Lanphier passed the first half of the first prayer-meeting hour alone in a place now more honoured than the palace of any earthly monarch. To the first meeting three persons at length came; the next week, six; the next, twenty; the next meeting was held in the middle lecture-room on the second floor; and soon all three rooms, one above another, were filled. The meetings were then held daily instead of weekly. Presently the very passage-way became choked with men seeking entrance, and the initial public demonstration of the great national awakening that was to follow thus projected its tidal or tenth wave upon these shores, which was to roll its mighty surge onward until the sweep of an overwhelming flood should bear away with resistless energy every obstacle that opposed its progress.

Here began a movement which without exaggeration may be emphatically styled the chief religious event of the century, and in which occurred the nearest reproduction of the scenes of Pentecost that has been witnessed since the cloven tongues, like as of fire, sat upon the heads of the apostles. Starting in that upper room, there sprang up a line of prayer meetings which are the wonder of our history. During the latter part of that winter rarely could a traveller pass the lecture-room of any evangelical church in the evening and not find it lighted up for prayer or preaching service. From the Atlantic seaboard there was such a line of prayer meetings, stretching even beyond the two great rivers, that wherever a Christian in going westward might break his journey, he could find, on any evening of the week, a crowded prayer meeting and the mind of the whole community filled with deep religious solemnity.

Thenceforward the history of Mr. Lanphier may be said to have coincided with the development and history of the daily noon meeting in Fulton Street. He kept a diary of notable events in connection with it, and many striking facts were there preserved. As at similar gatherings in our own city with which we are more familiar, united prayer was daily made for a multiplicity of persons and objects, and many answers were vouchsafed. Mr. Lanphier's genial and tactful manner in welcoming strangers and dealing with their spiritual difficulties rendered him singularly helpful in this important work. Numerous incidents illustrative of this are on record. He was a skilled singer, and formed one of a male quartette, who devoted their musical gifts to the furtherance of Christian effort, and sang the Gospel into many a heart.

In addition to his daily duties of Fulton Street, Mr. Lanphier maintained much varied Christian endeavour for a lengthened period; and when at length he was obliged to cease his activities, he passed into retirement amid the good wishes and benedictions of a host of friends and fellow-workers. Some of these were wont to visit him in his quiet rooms from time to time, and found him full of quiet contentment and surrounded by souvenirs of his faithful service at Fulton Street.

With the waning of the year he passed away, and on December 28 loving hands laid him in his final earthly resting place. The memory of his persevering devotion and his faith in a prayer-answering God will long be an inspiration to all who frequent the historic meeting with which his name is linked.

English Poor in Paris.—An appeal is made by Miss M. A. Carmichael, 77, Avenue Wagram, Paris, on behalf of the work among the English poor. During the winter months, "soup dinners" have been given three times a week. The tables have been crowded, and on each occasion the meal has been followed by a brief service. It is specially desirable to continue this useful work, as owing to the severe weather large numbers of the poor are unable to obtain employment.

The Claims of Home.

IN common with many of your readers I have read with deep interest the series by Mrs. Hallowes, entitled, "Thoughts for Parents." Surely there never was a day when from the pulpit and the home such teaching was more needed. Is there not a danger, in the multiplication of outdoor work and workers, that home duties be neglected even by earnest Christians? May not the sorrowful refrain be sung by many, "They made me a keeper of vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept?"

Are the wonderful teachings in Deut. iv. 9, 40, Isaiah xxxviii., and in many other parts of Holy Writ, so dwelt upon that our young people can say, "Our fathers have told us"—"The father to the children shall make known thy truth"? How many, when reading the lives of Scottish Worthies, or old English Evangelicals, sigh for the days when the bairns clustered round the fireside to hear the father expound the Word, and to join in the psalm? How many passages in Scripture indicate that much of the future of our children depends upon home and parental teaching!

We read the command given by God Himself through Moses in Exodus xviii.: "Thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shalt show them the way wherein they shall walk." In Deut. xiv. parents are told to teach them to their children, to talk of them, "when thou sittest in thine house, when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." Do all Christian parents obey this teaching? Has it not struck many how little share in this duty is taken by many fathers? Is the remark made by one son of an excellent man inapplicable to some others: "Father is so busy doing good to the world, that he is obliged to forget us"?

Long years ago, the writer knew an eminent minister, a writer and theologian, who tried to fit in home and public duties. He gave up the latter when they involved a sacrifice of the former, and devoted one evening every week to his children. There were talks with the boys about the week's lessons, when games of cricket were also discussed as well as the books read, and a little help given to a bit of Euclid on a knotty problem. Boys and girls would each give a little music, even when the youngest could only play her scales. Advice was asked and given on all sorts of subjects, and a short service and hymn ended, which all thought the nicest evening of the week. Each realised how fully father and mother took a share in everything that concerned them.

The writer once went to Pendeen in the days when the saintly R. Aitken was rector. Here was a lesson of home teaching in humblest life. At the Saturday evening prayer meeting Mr. Aitken would say, "Now, all you dear men, be in good time at church while the wives get you the one comfortable meal you enjoy in the week. Then at night you stay in and let your wives all come to church while you forget the pit, and enjoy the pure air of heaven, read, and sing, and pray, and mind any of the little ones left at home."

East London Tabernacle.—Monday, Feb. 20, is annual thankoffering day, a practice inaugurated by Mr. Archibald G. Brown at the opening of the Tabernacle and continued ever since. Rome and the Scriptures.

A Contrast.—I.

By MAJOR MACKINLAY.

IF we carefully examine the practices of the Roman Catholics, and of those who tend towards them, we shall find that many of their customs not only have no scriptural authority, but are in direct antagonism to Divine teaching.

This examination, however, the ordinary Roman Catholic is not inclined to make. He is taught to reason in this way: "The Bible is difficult to understand, and there are many different interpretations of it. I am not myself specially instructed, so it is best for me to trust to the guidance of those who have studied religion all their lives, and who, by their sacred office, are more qualified than I am to discover its meaning."

The authorised Spanish Roman Catholic catechism published in Burgos, 1892, contains the following (p. 18):—

Question: "Dost thou believe in other things beside the Creed and the Articles?"

Answer: "Yes, father; I believe in all that is in the Holy Scriptures, and in that which God has revealed to his Church."

Question: What things are those?"

Answer: "Do not ask that question of me who am ignorant; the holy Mother Church has doctors who know how to reply."

The Master: "Thou sayest well; that it pertains to the doctors and not to you to explain in full the things concerning the faith; it is sufficient for you to know the Articles as they are contained in the Creed."

This seems a specious argument, but let us look at Scripture to see if it is the right one to make. When Paul and Silas were preaching at Berea (Acts xvii. 11), the Jews, who heard them, were commended because they searched the Scriptures daily to see whether those things were so—even though they were uttered by the lips of an Apostle. In James i. 5 we are told, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him; but let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." When I was living in Spain I used sometimes to show this passage to Roman Catholic Spaniards. Putting my finger over the words "of God," I would request a man to read the rest himself; and then I would question him of whom he was to ask, whether of church, or of priest, or of whom? Then, my finger being raised, the man read the truth for himself.

A priest whom I once met in a remote village in Spain said to me, "You Protestants are so proud, you each believe what you choose for yourselves." I replied, "Pardon me, you and I have never met before, and it is impossible for you to know what I believe. As a matter of fact I do not now believe what I choose, though I once did so." "I once believed," I continued, "that good works would help in my salvation." "Very good," he replied. "Also that attendances at religious services would help me." "Very good," again he said. "And that trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ would also help in part," I continued. And again he assented. "But after a time," I said, "I was shown by One who knew better than I did—better even than those around me—the true way of Salvation." "Yes," he replied quickly, "the Holy Church is the only one to do that." "Oh," I said, "I was taught by one who knows better than the Holy Church, I was taught by the Holy Spirit of God, who guides into all truth (John xvi. 13). Then I was converted, and then I knew that the Lord Jesus Christ alone gave me life and salvation; and that it was not by works of righteousness which I had done, but according to his mercy He saved me (Titus iii. 5). He was interested and surprised, and we shook hands on parting, although our conversation had begun with abusive words from him.

Some years ago I met an earnest French-Canadian Christian. He had been brought up a Roman Catholic, but in early life he was converted and led to trust in Christ alone for salvation without other aids. When his convictions were growing upon him his grandfather tried to bring him back to the Roman Catholic religion, and said to him one day, "Don't you think it great presumption on your part to set up your opinions against those of your father and grandfather and of the priests of the Church who have devoted their lives to studying these things?" The lad was silenced and could not reply, but yet he knew that this argument was delusive; so he went away and prayed over the reply which he should give, and when next he met his grandfather he said to him: "There were once some not very learned fishermen on the shores of a lake, and One came and said to them, 'Follow Me' (Matt. iv. 19), and they obeyed Him; but if they had listened to the teachings of their learned priests, they would not have done so. Was Peter wrong in following the Lord Jesus?" "Oh, no," said his grandfather; "but then he was led by God's Spirit to do so." "And so am I," said the lad. "The Holy Spirit has led me to follow Christ and to believe that salvation is by faith in Him alone." The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord (Rom. vi. 23).

The Roman Catholic, however, is not only disinclined to search the Bible for himself, for fear he may not understand it; but he is taught to believe that even if he could do so, matters would not be settled, because traditions have still to be understood and explained. As Cardinal Cuesta, Archbishop of Santiago, Spain, boldly asserts in his catechism concerning Protestantism (Orense, 1869 p. 100)—

In addition to the written word of God, we Catholics recognise the word of God which comes to us by tradition, and which has the same value.

It is worthy of note that this is not asserted in the authorised English Roman Catholic Catechism, which contains some forty-seven Scripture references, while the approved Spanish Catechism of about the same size has hardly a single direct Bible quotation at all. In England, Holy Scripture is held in great honour, and consequently English Roman Catholic writers quote from it freely to support their arguments. But in Spain, which has been under the power of Rome for so many centuries, an appeal to the Bible has little force; the ipse dixit of the Romish Church is that which carries weight.

I remember meeting on a voyage from Spain a couple of English Roman Catholic students who were preparing for the priesthood at a college in Lisbon, and I had most interesting talks with one of them. On one occasion our conversation turned on the reverence for images and processions, and the so-called miracles, so frequently seen in Spain. I shall never forget his remark when he said, "Don't suppose that Roman Catholicism in England is of the same type as that which you have seen on the Continent." And he gave me a sidelong glance, to see how I took it. I quite agreed with him, as in Spain and Portugal there is a grossness about the processions of images, &c., which is not to be found with English Roman Catholics; but then the thought naturally came to my mind that this grossness is the result of Rome's unfettered sway; and the respect for the Bible and the lack of the more superstitious customs among English Roman Catholics are due to those who have opposed Rome. He evidently wished me to believe that the English type of Romanism is the better of the two; I thought his argument was most condemnatory of the efficiency of Rome's unhindered rule.

Let us ourselves not be content with the guidance of men, however wise or pretentious they may be. Our faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God (1 Cor. ii. 5). God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise . . . . that no flesh should glory in his presence (1 Cor. i. 27-29).

Protestant Outlook.

THE POPE AND RITUALISM.

THE Rome correspondent of the Daily Mail writes: "I have spoken with Monsignor Prior, who on the occasion of the last English pilgrimage to Rome was nominated domestic prelate of the Pope, and who quite recently was appointed director of the new College of St. Bede, established for the reception of young Englishmen converted to Roman Catholicism, who are desirous of becoming priests.

"He tells me that the Pope is deeply interested in the English crisis. Recently, when receiving a batch of students of the college, the Pope, speaking on the question of Ritualism, said:—

"'The English now accept the rites of the Roman Church. Soon they will accept the substance of our holy religion. What is now happening in the Anglican Church, added to the progress of Roman Catholicism in England, confirms my hope that England will assuredly re-enter Roman Catholicism.'

"The Pope," says Monsignor Prior, "once said to him as director of the College of St. Bede:—'You have to consider yourself a trainer of gladiators, to whom is confided the religious education of the English, who will re-enter the religious arena of their country, and who are charged to obtain new triumphs for the Roman Catholic faith, so that England may again be able to call herself the Isle of Saints.'"

An important memorial prepared by the National Protestant Church Union was presented to the Queen through the Home Secretary on the 9th inst. The signatures of the general public had not been asked for, but only those of "Churchmen" in representative positions. It included the names of 3,900 Churchmen, of whom thirty-one are peers, fifty are members of the House of Commons, 2,000 are justices of the peace, and 1,300 are clergy. The memorial assures her Majesty that "there is widespread dissatisfaction and disquiet in the land" because a large section of the clergy has been avowedly trying to undo the work of the Reformation, introducing "mediæval doctrines and practices," and invading the sanctity of home life with the practice of "Sacramental" confession; also that the movement has been encouraged by the extreme teaching given in ertain theological colleges. The petition finally ppeals to the Queen to take measures "to preserve this nation from the reimposition of the acerdotal yoke."

In a leader on last week's Church debate in he House of Lords, The Times says:—"It nust be clearly understood that, if the archishops and bishops are not successful within a noderate time in obtaining by their proposed rocedure the obedience of the clergy, the laity will take the matter in their own hands, making se of the final authority of Parliament."

Our Irish correspondent writes:—The Irish University question is the almost all-absorbing me in this country at present; but the feeling argely is that Mr. Balfour's proposal is a horoughly reactionary one, and that with the ame rights as other denominations in both the Royal and Dublin Universities, and with Maynooth, which has cost the nation at least a million nd a half of money, exclusively under its control, he Roman Catholic Church has no real grievance in the matter of University education. To refuse to them a state-endowed University s only to treat them as Protestants would wish o be treated under the same circumstances. At all events, it is clear that the Presbyterians re not going to close their mouths in opposition o the proposal, and accept the bribe of a University at Belfast.

The Methodist Times of last week declared strongly for Nonconformist interest in the Evangelical cause in the Church of England:—

> The Evangelical Free Churchmen of this country are under moral obligation to co-operate with loyal High Churchmen and Low Churchmen, notwithstanding the offensive intolerance with which we are almost invariably treated by both sections of the Anglican clergy. The sacredness of law, the vindication of legitimate authority, the rights of the laity and the supreme interests of the Protestant Reformed Faith ought never again to be sacrificed to some speculative theory about the best way of promoting disestablishment.

The annual meeting of the Scottish Protestant Alliance, held last week, was notable for the earnestness of the speeches delivered. Sir John Neilson Cuthbertson, a staunch Church of Scotland upholder and a veteran in the Protestant camp, urged the necessity of Protestants adhering to the principles of the Church Catholic as laid down by the councils of the fourth and fifth centuries in the Nicene Creed. On the part of Rev. Mr. Wemyss, of Edinburgh, it was claimed that we must maintain Protestantism if we did not want the very foundations of our social and commercial existence sapped, as they would be by the supremacy of Romanism.

Candidates for the post of chaplain to the Grey Coat Hospital School for Girls at Westminster having expressed a desire that no restrictions should be placed upon their liberty to hear "confessions," the question was recently considered by the board of governors. Whereas in December last it was resolved that private confession should only be permitted to girls whose parents or guardians expressly requested it, the governors have now added a strong rider to the resolution to the effect that the practice of confession is, in all cases, to be discouraged.

New booklets and pamphlets include: "Is the Church of England Protestant?" a vindication of Reformation Principles, by Rev. James Silvester, of Nymphsfield, Glos. (1d. each. W. Wileman, 27, Bouverie Street, E.C.) "The Limits of Toleration," by Rev. P. Valpy M. Filleul, of Upwey, Dorset, an address delivered at a meeting of the Wilts and Dorset branch of the National Protestant Church Union. (1d. Elliot Stock.) "What does Britain owe to the Protestant Reformation?" an address by Rev. H. Grattan Guinness, D.D. Girls' Letter Guild.—May I again tell of the need for lady correspondents for our Nonconformist girls at the Leeds centre, who are waiting for ladies to write to them. A simple friendly letter is all that is required. There must be many of your readers who would undertake this small work for Christ's sake.

The Protection of Eastern Christians.

By BUDGETT MEAKIN.

FEW English readers are aware how complex and important a phase of "the Eastern Question" is represented by the position of the various Christian Churches under the rule of the Turks. It comes even as a surprise to most that a large proportion of the Arabic-speaking races of Western Asia are of the Christian faith.

It was only persecution and slaughter that drew attention to the numbers of Armenian or Gregorian Christians in the northern parts, and the Chaldean, Greek and Latin churches are seldom heard of. But the Kaiser's politic move with regard to one of the many fanciful "actual spots" around Jerusalem has brought the question of the protection of these churches to the fore. Yet the most patent fact in the matter is that the coveted honour is not sought for the protection of the weak so much as for the excuse it may some day afford of supplanting the strong. Whether Russia, Germany, or France succeeds in establishing a prior claim to be heard on behalf of the Nazarene "tributaries"—"Dhimmeeâ"—of the Porte, it will probably prove to be Great Britain that takes up the case when oppression recurs. The other Powers may then be expected to tie her hands as in the Armenian affair, and as was tried in vain in Egypt. It is truly lamentable that we have not yet reached that state of civilisation in which can work together on behalf of the down-trodden, when humanity calls with a claim more urgent than that of patriotism itself.

Even among themselves these Eastern churches are at loggerheads. In governing them, almost as much trouble is experienced as in maintaining an even balance among our many-creeded fellow-subjects in India. The most numerous in Syria are the Greek Orthodox, akin to the Church of Russia, and it is therefore natural that Russia would take the lead in protecting the whole. The members of this church speak Arabic, in which they also conduct most of their services, and they form an important native body, bitterly opposed to the Latin or Roman Catholic churches, whose interests irreligious France affects to study, and for whose support the German Emperor has made a bid.

But these Latin churches are by no means so numerous or important as the Greek and Syrian Catholic churches, both off-shoots of the Church of Rome, though independent of it. They celebrate their mass in Arabic, and occupy a curious half-way house between the Orthodox and Romanist camps. Their priests may be ordained though married, but may not enter wedlock if ordained. Sacrament in both kinds is administered by them to the laity, and in many ways they form

A SORT OF COMPROMISE.

Though fostered by Franciscan, Lazarist, and Jesuit missionaries, they maintain a constant enmity between themselves and with the Roman Catholics, whom they regard as foreigners. Only a few years ago a Papal order had to be issued forbidding the proselytising one of another, and permitting inter-marriages. Representatives had to be summoned to Rome with a view to securing more complete control over them, and also over the Maronite Church. This is another independent body in affiliation with that of Rome, whose special foes are its neighbours the Druses, a peculiar heretical Mohammedan sect.

The constant friction between these churches centres in Jerusalem, where foreign guards of some sort are essential to protect the many fictitious sites of reputed sanctity, and to decide between the devotees. The traditional scenes of the birth and death of Christ, with nothing to prove their claims, have long been desecrated by un-Christian strife among his so-called followers, a strife which would be chronic but for the presence of Turkish police. The whole thing is a disgrace to Christendom, yet if either of the Eastern churches had entire possession of the various Christian Churches under the rule of the Turks. It comes even as a surprise to most that a large proportion of the Arabic-speaking races of Western Asia are of the Christian faith.

The whole thing is a disgrace to Christendom, yet if either of the Eastern churches had entire possession of matters could only be worse, while as it is no Jew is allowed to approach those spots. The one idea of the Oriental Christians seems to be to follow their priests, not Christ. Their teachers are not only generally ignorant, but often immoral. All are maintained by investments in land and property, which place them beyond the control of the laity, and the funds of the Greek Church have been considerably supplemented by offerings from Russia, which sends yearly many thousands of pilgrims to Jerusalem.

Although, taking it as a whole, only about a fifth of the population of Syria is Christian, in some parts, such as the Lebanon, Beirût, &c., the majority is of that faith, as well as in Armenia. Bethlehem and Nazareth are instances of this. The Lebanon indeed has, since the massacres of 1860, enjoyed the rule of a Christian governor, who may be of any sect, and was, when I was there, a Latin. This arrangement was arrived at under pressure from the European Powers, with the guarantee of six of whom it has been carried out. Almost all the work of the has been done among the members of these churches, since, in spite of nominal religious liberty, it would be death for a Mohammedan to acknowledge the claims of Christ.

Although the noble labours of the evangelical missionaries have done much to set a good example and to purify the existing churches, they have not as yet gathered round them a very large body of Protestant Christians. Indeed, they would much rather see these churches cleansed from within than from without, though in the absence of a general movement this is hardly possible. The American Presbyterians have been engaged in Syria for over seventy years, their work centring round their excellent college in Beirût, with nearly three hundred students, and its ever-busy Press, which has disseminated more instruction in all branches of knowledge than was ever known in Syria before. Other missions there are, too, on a smaller scale. Irish Presbyterians, Anglican—to Jews—Covenanters, and undenominational efforts, such as the British Syrian Schools, the Female Education Society, and others. Then the Germans have their hospitals and deaconesses, and there are "peculiar people" of every shade. Side by side with the American Press and schools in Beirût, the Jesuits have set up their rival establishments, and in many parts there are various Romanist orders at work, to say nothing of the hospices and other institutions for the benefit of foreign pilgrims to the Holy Land.

Ecumenical Conference of 1900.

THE year 1900 is to be marked in American annals by the most notable gathering of Christian workers which the country has ever seen. On April 21 in that year an Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions will convene in New York City, and will continue in session for eleven days. This will be an event of no local quality, of no limited scope; but one of equal interest to every church and communicant throughout the Protestant world.

Every foreign missionary society connected with the various divisions of Protestant Christendom the wide world over has been invited to send delegates to New York, and the invitation has been accepted with rare unanimity. From England and Scotland and Ireland and Wales these delegates will come in force; from France and Switzerland, from Belgium and Holland, from Norway and Sweden and Denmark, from all parts of Germany, representatives will be present to speak for the churches of those distant realms; men are summoned from Africa, from India, from Australia, to represent the Protestant faith in those lands. Missionaries will be there from Turkey and Persia, from India and Ceylon, from Burma and Siam, from every part of China, and from Japan, from every shore of Africa, from the far islands of the sea, and from every post which this sacred army holds and whence it presses its ceaseless inroads upon heathenism and every false faith.—*N.Y. Home Missions.

Central Wesleyan Mission.

THIS well-known and thriving mission, in Clerkenwell, celebrated its thirteenth anniversary with a series of meetings characterised by remarkable fervour. The proceedings opened at the Holborn Town Hall, Ald. F. P. Alliston presiding. He expressed his satisfaction that they cared not only for the souls, but also for the bodies, of the people of Clerkenwell. They might differ widely in beliefs, but after all the practical touchstone of religion was the result it produced in the life.

Mr. J. Beachcroft, L.C.C., speaking as a "Churchman," emphasised the necessity that all enlisted under the banner of the one Master should join hands in actual service. Mr. Churchwarden Robson and Rev. Isaiah Parker spoke in forcible terms of the value of mission work.

The afternoon meeting was the last public service to be held in the St. John's Square Chapel before its REMODELLING AND RENOVATION.

For some time to come, the morning and evening services on Sundays will be held in the Clerkenwell Town Hall, the afternoon service being continued in the Holborn Town Hall, as aforetime, and the various other meetings being scattered over several buildings in the district.

A sympathetic speech from the chairman, Mr. J. A. Owen, founder of the Free Methodist Deaconesses' Training Home, was followed by Rev. Jabez Ingram's description of the Central Mission as an object-lesson of what God could do for people who were willing and had a mind to work.

After Pastor C. B. Sawday and Rev. J. E. Wakerley had given telling addresses, Rev. Peter Thompson urged that London and the world would never be saved by the labours of a few prominent and powerful evangelists like Caughey. It was necessary that every member of the Church should be baptised with the same Spirit of power. He dwelt on Mr. Ingram's point as to the need of a spirit of solicitude for the work of God. The rich men of Methodism needed it, and the well-paid working men, whose incomes were much larger than thirty years ago, and yet whose expenditure, except in the matter of house rent, was not necessarily higher.

A demonstration was subsequently held in the Holborn Town Hall, at which Mr. H. Holman presided. Mr. Wakerley gave a cheering report of the work. Large congregations crowded their chapel Sunday by Sunday, and God had greatly blessed the preaching of the Word. They had just upon 1,000 members in church fellowship. Last Sunday night at St. John's Square Chapel both their temporary vertries were full of

SEEKERS AFTER GOD.

At the Holborn Town Hall services the large hall was well filled. The Medical Mission, the Home of Rest, and many other branches of the many-sided work were all referred to.

Dr. Briggs, of Denver, U.S.A., vividly expressed his impressions of Methodism, salting his remarks with interesting Americanisms. Pastor Cuff, of Shoreditch, followed with a short speech of encouragement and cheer. A representative of the Congregational Church—Rev. T. E. Davies, of Beckenham—particularly commended the Sisterhood, and the fact that the mission was helping to stop "this damning Niagara of liquor." After the collection Rev. Dinsdale T. Young said sad notes were heard in some home branches of the Christian Church, but it was a great comfort to know that there was no dirge to be sounded in connection with the Central Mission. He was glad of the warmth of their services. The commencement of Methodism, the speaker continued, had been described by Wesley himself when he said, "I felt my heart strangely warmed," and that had been the power of Methodism all along. Evangelical faith was a faith of passion, enthusiasm, and white heat. The meeting concluded amid great enthusiasm, £402 being contributed towards the £600 appealed for.

Metropolitan Tabernacle.

THE Lower Hall of the new Metropolitan Tabernacle, now in course of erection, presented an interesting spectacle one afternoon last week. With a view to raising the necessary funds—for a sum of £16,000 is still required—a reception had been organised, at which purses and other donations would be received by Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon. At 3 o'clock Mrs. Spurgeon took the chair, supported by her two sons, Revs. Charles and Thomas Spurgeon. The big hall was soon filled with people, evidently belonging to every class, many of the very poor being present, and for two hours they continued to file on to the platform in endless procession, to present their offerings and to shake hands with Mrs. Spurgeon, who greeted everyone in a most pleasant and gracious manner, and had a kindly word for all her old friends. Tea was then served to guests at pretty little tables in the hall.

About half-past four the welcome news was announced that £5,000 had been received, whereon the company arose and cordially sang the Doxology. At five, when Mrs. Spurgeon was obliged to leave, the total had risen to £5,680. A vote of thanks to her was proposed by Rev. Charles Spurgeon, who referred with pleasure to the "golden sheaves she had gathered." The resolution was seconded by Rev. C. B. Sawday, and put to the meeting by Rev. T. Spurgeon, who remarked that the audience could "signify their assent in any way they pleased," and a very hearty cheer was the immediate response.

Mrs C. H. Spurgeon, who was evidently greatly moved, said in response:—"Dear friends, my heart is full. The thanks are due to you and not to me; and I do thank you, from my heart of hearts, for coming here to-day, and for giving so much to the cause which is so near my heart. God bless you all." The reception was afterwards continued by Rev. Thomas and Mrs. Spurgeon, and at the close of the evening the total amount raised was £6,300.

A Girls' Guild.

WE desire very much to enlist the sympathy of our readers on behalf of the work of the Girls' Guild of Good Life, the headquarters of which are at Hoxton Hall. Considering the special needs and circumstances of those working girls whom it helps and counsels, we do not think that a more real or practical bit of Christian service is being done in our great city than that which is maintained by those ladies who take part in the work of the guild.

The object of the guild, in the words of the latest printed report, is "to mother our girls and make their lives more safe and sheltered. We cannot remove troubles from their path, but we can teach them the secret of power in fighting against evil, and show them that an inner peace and gladness can be felt underneath all the sorrows of life." There is a true Christlike and good Samaritan ring about these words that must commend such an endeavour to all—especially to those whose girls are "safe and sheltered" in happy Christian homes. Alas that so many of our poorer young sisters in London, who have to earn their own daily bread, know little or nothing by experience of the sacred sanctions of the word "home!"

Besides direct Christian teaching, the best and most effectual way to keep evil influences out of young hearts in leisure evening hours is to fill them with some form of useful work, mingled with pleasing and innocent recreation. This is freely done in a most loving and sisterly way by the lady workers of the guild, who give much time on week evenings in teaching the girls all sorts of industries, and in ministering to their happiness. We are not therefore surprised to read in the report that "a spirit of greater earnestness has prevailed among the members, and they have tried more consistently to let the teaching given them be carried out in the life they live in the home and the workroom." We note, as new features of the season's programme of work, "classes for stocking-darning, basket-making, crewel work and scrap-books. Old scraps and Christmas cards will be gladly accepted."

The devoted president and secretary of the guild is Mrs. John F. Rae, 17, Darenth Road, Stamford Hill, N. Should any lady readers wish for more detailed information as to this delightful work, we counsel them to apply to Mrs. Rae for a copy of the report. She informs us that money help is specially needed just now. We earnestly trust and believe it will be forthcoming.

"Our Coalies."

A SPECIAL meeting of employers and employés interested in the coalies' branch of the London City Mission was held on Wednesday, February 8, in the Somers Town Presbyterian Church, N.W., preceded by the usual social tea.

About 500 gathered in the church, and the chairman, Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., was well supported on the platform by ministers, merchants, and others. In an interesting address he dealt with some of the honest spiritual difficulties men have, and concluded by recommending all present to taste and see for themselves that the Lord is gracious.

A stirring address was given by Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, who declared the curse of the neighbourhood to be strong drink, and urged all to abstain from it. Many coalies and their families, he said, are associated with his church.—Mr. G. C. Locket (coal merchant) said a marked improvement had been noticeable in the men during the last four or five years. This he attributed to the efforts of the missionaries.

Two coalies having testified to the power of God in saving and keeping them from a life of sin, Messrs. Prentice and Munns, two of the missionaries, gave earnest addresses. Mr. Cousins, a manager, urged the men to give up gambling and drunkenness.

A sixth missionary is needed, and will be appointed by the mission as soon as funds are obtained.

Queenstown Soldiers' Home.

DEAR SIR,—Your readers will have heard with real regret of the loss sustained by Miss Sandes through the destruction of her Soldiers' Home at Queenstown by fire. It is not so much the loss of property that Miss Sandes feels as the great loss the home will be to hundreds of soldiers and sailors who crowded it every week. Any of your readers who know Queenstown will understand how many and how great the temptations are which surround soldiers and sailors on every hand.

I trust many in England who know the value of Miss Sandes' work will come forward and relieve her of some of the burden that has fallen so unexpectedly on her, and thus enable her to provide some temporary home, and especially sleeping accommodation, for men passing through Queenstown while the old home is being rebuilt.—Yours, &c.,

Richard Hinde.

Estate Office, Roscommon, Ireland.

Rescue and Evangelisation Mission.—Mrs. Elizabeth Corbridge, the superintendent of the mission, writes that the Sheffield No. 1 Branch is now established in the Iron Hall, Thomas Street, where the workers have been cheered by much blessing, a number of penitents professing conversion. A debt still remains on the building. Accounts of a remarkable revival have been received from the Barnstaple branch, where, in a special mission, much spiritual quickening resulted in numbers seeking the Saviour. Open-air services were held and the town processioned. The chief offices are at 97, Gell Street, Sheffield.

"Christ at the Feast."—John vii. 14, 28-37.

Golden Text.—"If any man thirst, let him come to Me and drink."—John vii., 37.

"When all Men Speak Well."

TEACHER should impress the bravery of doing what is right in face of opposition. In doing what is right we must expect opposition. If we do not get it, perhaps we are not doing our duty.

Illustrations.—The Disciples, Luther, Cromwell.

Jesus Teaching in the Temple (14).

By using this place for his teaching Christ was

(1) Likely to get the largest audience, for the people thronged the Temple at feast time.

(2) He would be protected by his own people from Galilee, who were there.

(3) He would be associating Himself with the sacred history of the national religion.

(4) But He would also be near the priests, and more likely to inflame their jealousy and hatred.

Too Well or too Little Known (28).

He is referring to his earthly parentage and training. They knew Him as the Son of Joseph and Mary, and in this sense they knew Him too well. Distance is needed to judge of the height of a mountain. Lapse of time is needed to estimate the work of a great person. The people knew Him too well in this respect to be able to give Him his due.

Teacher may illustrate this by the fact that many great poets have lived and died poor; their works sold for a mere pittance—e.g., Milton. In another sense they did not know Him well enough.

The Authority of Jesus (28).

The test of true teaching is whether the teacher seeks his own glory or that of God. Jesus was willingly in the hands of his Father all through his earthly career.

For every Christian worker there is a visible and invisible side to his work—that which the world sees and understands, and that which only exists between the worker and his God.

The Destination of Jesus (33).

Christ knew what his destination was. The load of care which would be lifted from the minds of men if they were certain that when their earthly pilgrimage is done they go to the Father. The certainty may be as great for us as for Christ. If we have been sent into the world to do a work for God, when we die we shall go to Him who sent us. Where the burden of responsibility should press upon us is in the striving to fulfil our mission, so that we may not be ashamed when we meet Him.

Mistaken Signs (35).

The statement in verse thirty-three was misunderstood. They were blind to the spiritual, therefore Christ said: "Whom ye know not." When they tried to interpret the saying that "I go unto Him that sent Me" they did not rise above the earth. The signs of God in Nature, Providence, and the Bible can never be appreciated unless we view them from the spiritual standpoint. Jacob's ladder, stretched along the earth, leads nowhere; but, hoisted to touch heaven, it becomes the highway for prayer ascending and blessings descending.

Drink for the Thirsty (37).

Every man is full of longings and thirstings. Sometimes like little children we cry after impossibilities; or like old people we scarcely know what we want. But for the thirst caused by care, temptation, labour, sin, and disappointment—

A fulness resides in Jesus our Head,
And ever abides to answer our need.

This is the only fountain where all wants can be supplied—the healing waters which can cure all complaints. Teacher should point out the ways in which men try to quench their thirst—ambition, money, learning—but nothing like the deep, eternal joy of dwelling in God.

New York Notes.

AMONG the prominent events in the religious world of Greater New York during the past week has been the acceptance by Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, of Chicago, of the call from the congregation of the world-famed Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. This church likes variety in its pastors, and there seems to be some ground for the feeling that has got abroad that a minister who had not already made himself conspicuous for some words, opinions or actions decidedly out of the ordinary would not be likely to meet the requirements of the position. Dr. Lyman Abbott is not an orator, as was Henry Ward Beecher, but a theologian of much learning and great sincerity, who appears to have felt himself called upon to do his utmost to destroy in the minds of his hearers any last remaining faith in those "old-fashioned" doctrines, which it may be presumed originally furnished him with the principal reasons for his being a minister at all. Dr. Hillis will certainly be a pastor whose teaching will differ widely from that of his predecessor if his telegram of acceptance is to be taken as literally as it was doubtless intended to be. For in it he expresses the hope that: "While time endures may the Gospel of Christ's redeeming life, teaching, death and resurrection make Plymouth Church to be a temple for those who aspire and worship, a hospital for the sin-hurt, a school for Divine friendship, a college for teaching the oracles of God, a gateway unto the life that is immortal."

Rev. M. G. Coker, pastor in charge of the Mariners' Temple, finds his work in the heart of one of several foreign quarters of this Cosmopolitan city. It is just across the Bowery from the Chinese colony, and is surrounded by Italians, Germans, and Hebrews from the Continent of Europe. Sandwiched in among the regular meetings of the Temple are services in Italian and Yiddish. A short time ago, however, he was asked to grant the use of the Temple as a religious asylum, where could meet for worship the members of a Baptist Communion who have come here from the Russian provinces of Courland and Lifland. There are several hundreds of these people in this city and Brooklyn, and last Sunday seventy-five of them gathered together for prayer and praise. Mr. Coker told me that it was quite affecting to witness the joy with which many members of this little congregation greeted friends whom they had last seen in Russia, perhaps several years ago, and learned some valuable information about the trials that the founders of this branch of Baptists endured some thirty years ago. One curious fact was that the farmer who really started the work had found the light at a Baptist church in Memel, Prussia (whither he had gone to inquire concerning it). This church had been founded through the efforts of Pastor Oncken, of Hamburg, who had himself been converted through the efforts of a Swedish sea captain, who had found salvation at the Mariners' Temple a number of years ago.

Colonel Hadley, of the United States Church Army, has recently made a notable capture in the form of a building of the very worst repute in one of the most notorious streets in this city. It has been used now for several weeks as an "open door" into the kingdom of heaven for the benefit of those who stand most in need of such a place, and I believe the results have been excellent.

The National Prohibition Party has ceased to exist as such, but has been reconstructed upon lines that will doubtless commend its work to the support of many who have hitherto held aloof because of their conviction that much of the effort put forth was simply hitting against a stone wall, in view of the strong attachment to one of the two great political parties felt by many who sympathise with the Prohibitionists, but who have considered that voting for the candidates put up by them, was simply throwing away their ballots. As reconstructed, however, it seems likely that the work prosecuted by these excellent men and women will not only be more widely extended, but produce visible results more quickly.

New York, Jan. 23. Roger Martin.

Oxford.—At the invitation of Canon Christopher upwards of 400 members of the University attended the twenty-third annual Church Missionary breakfast in the Town Hall, Oxford, on Saturday morning. An interesting address was delivered by Rev. H. E. Fox, who has visited some of the missions in India, Palestine, and Egypt. The extension of missionary work in Uganda was one of the most remarkable phases of modern missions. As to India, if Christianity was presented in its pure form, without attacking and vilifying religions which it came to supersede, but with sympathy and with consistency of life, he was quite certain that the people of India as a body were not hostile to Christianity.

Y.M.C.A.

AN association has been successfully launched at Oldham, in Lancashire.

Mr. R. L. McKeown, Secretary of the Londonderry Y.M.C.A., has been accepted for foreign work at Qua Iboe, West Africa.

The forty-fourth year of the Cheltenham Association has been one of unprecedented success. The membership has increased from 129 to 204.

Anniversary meetings have recently been held by the associations in Inverness and Beauly. Encouraging reports were given of the work of these branches during the past year.

The Bayswater Association, of which Mr. Walter Wild is secretary, is making arrangements for a holiness convention to be held at the end of October. Several well-known friends have promised to take part.

The anniversary meeting of the Tonbridge Association, which was held on the 8th inst., was addressed by Rev. W. R. Mowll, and Mr. W. Hind Smith. The report showed that much excellent work had been done during the past year.

The Bournemouth Association (Cavius Memorial) is making a strenuous endeavour to clear its debt of £1,018. Sir F. Wills promises £200 on condition that the whole be raised this month. This, if secured, makes with other promises and gifts about £700, leaving £300 more to be raised.

The Lord Mayor of Sheffield presided on Monday afternoon, in the Town Hall at a meeting in support of the local Y.M.C.A. Eighty pounds was received in contributions. Among the speakers was Lord Kinnaird, who took the chair at a second public meeting, held in the Association Hall in the evening.

The annual meeting of the Fulham and South Kensington Association was held in Fulham Town Hall on Feb. 9, Mr. F. A. Bevan presiding. About 600 persons were present. Rev. Wm. Houghton, of Upper Norwood, gave an address. The hon. secretary, Mr. F. C. Wood, announced that an effort is to be made to pay off the mortgage of £1,225 on the property of the association before 1900, the members having guaranteed £186 toward the fund. Much good work has been done during the twelve months.

At the New Cross Y.M.C.A. on February 9 a conference took place, under the presidency of Mr. W. Hind Smith, on the subject, "An Ideal Young Men's Christian Association." Members were present from Kennington, Lewisham, and Blackheath, as well as New Cross and Brockley; and an interesting paper, emphasising the original standard of association work as the ideal, was presented to Mr. H. C. Mott, hon. secretary at Lewisham. The gathering was unanimous as to the importance of preserving the distinctly Christian character of all association aims and agencies. It is hoped that this conference may inaugurate a system of intervisitation among the Y.M.C.A.'s of the South-East Metropolitan District Union.

The "English Year Book" of Young Men's Christian Associations has been published. The growing size of the volume indicates the wide developments that are taking place in the work. The number of centres throughout the world is now returned at 6,698, and the gross enrolled membership at 506,107. Illustrations are given of handsome new premises at Cardiff and Bedford, as well as of a building erected specially for juniors at Birkenhead, and of the three officers engaged by the English council in India and Burma. It is perhaps in the foreign field that the growth of the movement is most striking. In India, for example, there are already no fewer than ninety-eight associations, with a membership of over 5,000; while in China and Japan there are seventy-seven, with 2,550 members. The latest addition to the world's list is that of an association in Iceland. On the continent there are at present more than a hundred well-equipped association buildings, whereas twenty years ago there was not one; and over a hundred men in connection with continental unions are devoting their whole lives to the promotion of the work.

Gambling in Belgium.—A Brussels Correspondent writes that a practical movement is on foot in Belgium to do away with the gambling evil by the total suppression of all the Cercles des jeux at present existing. There is a widespread desire to put an end to what has become a European scandal. The Government has the best part of public opinion with it, and is supported by Parliament. The Chamber of Representatives recently passed a resolution calling upon the Government to pass a Bill which shall adequately deal with the evil complained of. The recent Cabinet crisis placed M. Vanden Peereboom at the head of the Cabinet, and his anti-gambling proclivities are well-known; had he a free hand all so-called "private" clubs would soon disappear from the country. It is asserted that the King of Belgium is obstructing the movement.

Deliverance.

"I am with thee, to save thee, and to deliver thee, saith the Lord" (Jer. i. 8, xv. 20).

FIRST, I will tell you a true story to show you how God delivers:—There was a cruel King called Theodore who had shut up many prisoners in his strong fortress at Magdala, and among them were some Englishmen. So an English general was sent with an army to try and release them. When Theodore heard that the English were coming he threw himself from the top of his fortress and was killed, and the soldiers entered and found the poor prisoners in wretched dungeons. There were a great many poor creatures from various towns who could scarcely believe they were free and were afraid to leave their prisons; they said there were enemies all round, and they should never get safely home. It was long before they could be made to understand that the English general would take care of them all the way home. But so it was; they were put in the middle of the soldiers, and when they came to a town, those who belonged to it were safely escorted there, and joyfully received by their friends.

We are captives (2 Tim. ii. 26); we are buried in the depths of sin, and the Lord Jesus Christ is our Deliverer (Isaiah lxi. 1; Luke iv. 18). Some young people are just like those poor captives, afraid to be saved for fear they should fall again into the snares of their enemies; but Jesus not only saves, but promises to keep all whom He delivers, and guide them safely by his Holy Spirit, all the way home to heaven. In 2 Cor. i. 10, it says that God delivered us from the great death to which we were hastening, that He does deliver us now from all temptation and evil, and that He will deliver in the future also.

How can God deliver us from the bondage of sin? He has provided a ransom. He sent his well-beloved Son to pay the penalty that sin deserved (Job xxxii. 24). When Richard the First, King of England, was taken prisoner the people in England had to raise a large sum of money and pay it as his ransom, before his enemies would give him up.

"Two brothers went to the same school, the little one was disobedient and broke the rules, so the master said he must have the cane, when he went up to receive the punishment, his big brother left his seat and, standing between the master and the little boy, said 'Please give me the strokes instead of him,' which the master did, and the offender was let off because two could not be punished for the same fault.

Just so, Jesus has borne the punishment which our sins deserved, and has thus delivered us from the power of evil. When will God deliver us? When we ask Him to do so, trusting and believing that He will. Read Psalm xxxiv. 6 and 17. Psalm xci. 15.

Can God deliver us always from all evil? Yes, our Deliverer is strong, He is mighty to save. There are numbers of texts and examples in the Bible to teach us about God's great deliverance.

Are we grateful to our good, loving, heavenly Father for doing so much for us?

An Indian woman once fell into the river, and was drowning, when a missionary jumped in and saved her; after he brought her to land she threw herself at his feet, talking in a violent manner. The missionary thought she was thanking him for her deliverance; he could not understand her words, but some standing by said, 'she is scolding you because some of her silver bangles are lost in the water, and you have not got them out for her.' How ungrateful! and yet some of us are treating God just like that.

Why does God deliver us? If you will turn to Luke i. 74, 75, you can read the reason why.

A Bible Clock.

Take the word, Faith for one o'clock, and find texts, in which it occurs having two, three, four to twelve words to represent the hours. Give chapter and verse for each.

[Children under ten do any four; under thirteen any seven.]

Personal.

Jennie Holmes.—I shall be pleased for you to send your answers on a post-card. You must not use a halfpenny stamp as it is not allowed.

Vera Dickenson.—I should be very pleased to welcome the new "niece" you write about, and it would be pleasant for you to explain the questions to her. If she could not do more, she might do the same as you.

Olive and Irene Grandy, E. M. A., and Jessie Donaldson.—I am pleased to welcome you among my "nephews and nieces." It is necessary to write your name in full and to give age and address.

Lily Metcalf.—I have not seen any of your letters, and shall be pleased to answer your questions if I can.

Dorothy Alchin.—I will index your names for the answers of which you have copy. If your birthday occurred after this quarter began you need not do the whole of the questions.

Margie Marston.—I am sorry your sisters have been ill, and hope they are better now.

Grace and Dudley Joyce.—You must write out the answers as well as give the references.

Albert Davis.—I only give the first Christian name in the lists.

Laura Percy, Leonard Browne, May Reed.—Your papers were examined and found to be incorrect. In future I cannot re-examine any answers, as they are corrected very carefully; and with the numbers I receive it is impossible to look up back searchers every week.

National Blind Relief Society.—The annual tea to 1,000 blind persons and their guides was recently given by this Society in the Queen's Hall, People's Palace. In the United Kingdom there are 550 blind pensioners, not one of whom has had to wait more than a year before being awarded assistance by the Society, the pensioners being elected without regard to votes, each case being dealt with solely on its merits. The visitors were cordially welcomed by Rev. J. Pullein Thompson, the hon. secretary, and after tea an entertainment was given, at the conclusion of which the pensioners received a new shilling, fruits and buscuits.

The Gospel in its Simplicity.

UNDER the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, special devotional meetings were held on Tuesday last in Exeter Hall to proclaim and affirm belief in the fundamental truths of the Christian faith, in the "Gospel in its simplicity."

At the morning assembly, which was largely attended, the president was Mr. Martin J. Sutton, who, after reading 1 Cor. xiii., indicated the aim of the gatherings as one of spiritual revival, and dwelt on the need of cultivating charitable feeling at this time of controversy and stress. A general return to reformation principles would be accomplished by love, not by strife and asperity.

Mr. Field, secretary of the Alliance, read a letter from Lord Polwarth, calling to personal heart-searching and humiliation; and Rev. H. B. Macartney engaged in earnest prayer that the land might be cleansed from filthiness, that unity among evangelical bodies might lead to an insurrection against idols, and that the movement in favour of reformation might be lifted on to a high level of purest, holiest character, free from any expression of human passion.

Rev. E. A. Stuart, who gave the address, spoke on 2 Timothy ii. 19, remarking that Paul passed through many perils of a varied character, but the one which touched him most keenly was the peril from false brethren. In these days the chief weaknesses were half-heartedness, heresy and worldliness. Paul's protest against false brethren arose from a deep realisation of the truth that error is a canker which results in ungodliness. Passing to a brief review of the present position of the anti-Ritualist movement, the speaker declared that superstition had always been the parent of infidelity, and that just as Paul was concerned for Timothy, so evangelicals, themselves firm because grounded in the truth, were bound to stand for fundamentals, for their children's sake. Nevertheless the servant of the Lord must not strive, but with gentleness and love oppose the light of divine revelation to the darkness of human error. The present crisis was attributable, in a considerable measure, to past slackness and unspirituality among those who, while holding correct doctrine, manifested but lukewarm interest in the extension of the Kingdom. After a calm but telling appeal to every one who named the name of Christ to depart from iniquity, the speaker encouraged his hearers to remember that in spite of all that seemed likely to undermine the religious truths they so inestimably prized, "the foundation of God standeth sure." The proceedings closed with fervent prayer.

In the afternoon Lord Kinnaird was chairman, Rev. G. W. Olver giving a devotional address; while at night Revs. Preb. Webb-Peploe, R. Glover, and G. Campbell Morgan were the chief speakers in a third meeting, of which particulars will be given in our next issue.

Sicily.—An organisation has been at work in Sicily for two years for the promotion of humane ideas, and for the prevention of cruelty to children and the lower animals. A refuge for friendless and homeless children, and for those whose parents are undergoing terms of imprisonment, is maintained by the society, the director of which is Mr. A. P. Brown, 95, Via Stabile, Palermo, Sicily.

The Armenian Home, at Chigwell (under the care of Madame Thoumaïan), holds on its way. The report for 1897-8 says: "We have had seventeen boys at the home, their ages varying from eleven to sixteen years, and representing eleven different places in Armenia. They have been rescued from the deepest misery, and most of them arrive in a very low condition. Three left us lately: one went to his people in Constantinople, and two others went to learn trades—one that of a carpenter and another that of a tinsmith. Both are progressing very satisfactorily, as shown by the testimonials of their employers. At present fourteen remain at the home; but four applicants, whose cases have been gone into thoroughly, have not yet arrived because of the difficulties thrown in their way by the Turkish authorities. And we have many other applications for admittance." Communications regarding the work should be addressed to Professor or Madame Thoumaïan, Chigwell, Essex.

About Books.

THE ROMANCE OF EVANGELISM.*

At first sight it may seem strange to attach the idea of "romance" to the serious matter-of-fact work of a Gospel preacher. We usually associate the word with tales of adventure or the imaginative creations of the fiction-spinner. Disregarding, however, the mere dictionary significance of the word, and taking it as descriptive of the supernatural and the extraordinary in the region of the spiritual life, we feel that Mr. Aitken amply justifies himself in the use of his title. With our present limited capacities there must ever be to us an element of wonderment in the working of the unseen powers; when our vision is widened by the removal of the fleshly veil, we shall doubtless see that the things we regarded here as marvellous were but the commonplaces of the Divine method, in its action on the human spirit.

No man living is better qualified by mental endowment and by long-varied experience in his particular field, to prepare a work of such singular and supreme interest as this, and we are thankful he was led to undertake the task. The facts and narratives brought together are very largely the fruit of Mr. Aitken's own unrivalled evangelistic experience. But he has strengthened his record with incidents gathered from other sources and well authenticated. The whole work, as we remarked in our first announcement of the book, constitutes a storehouse of facts and events that must make it a classic in the literary archives of Christian evangelism. The value of such a record to preachers and Christian teachers of all kinds, and specially to evangelists, needs no emphasising. Very often the simple narration of the way in which another was guided into spiritual liberty, or was led through some striking experience, will prove more helpful to a distressed soul groping its way amid doubt and self-accusation than piled up arguments of a doctrinal or theological sort.

The aspects of spiritual experience are so varied that classification is essential in setting them forth or illustrating them. Mr. Aitken has fully recognised this and has arranged his book in a very orderly fashion, that not only makes it easy of reference, but gives a wonderful cumulative force to his array of fact and incident. So we have chapters under such heads as "Great Results from small Causes," "Strange Calls and prompt Answers," "Confession and Restitution," "Remarkable Conversions," "A great Salvation for great Sinners," "The last call Unheeded," "The Bow drawn at a Venture," "Special Providences," &c., &c. The author does not pretend that he has reproduced the many conversations here recorded, with minute verbal exactness. In many instances he had to rely on recollection after the lapse of years; but substantially, and as nearly as possible in the same phraseology, these chapters in spiritual history are set down as they happened. Of course they must be only a selection from the innumerable cases the evangelist has met with in his long career as a mission preacher; but we may take it that they are really the cream of his experiences during the past thirty years or more—for Mr. Aitken began the work of Gospel preaching when a very young man.

We can personally vouch for the intense interest that marks every page of the book. We heartily commend it to all who love to study the ways of God with men, and to all who long to witness a widespread revival of true religion in our midst. One thought that constantly presses in on the mind of the reader is this—that if the needful conditions are fulfilled, God is willing to grant a continuous revival in his Church. May this volume conduce to that end, and may God raise up many more proclaimers of his blessed evangel so thoroughly consecrated and so richly qualified to be an ambassador of the Cross as the author of this record, which is really a continuation of the Acts of the Apostles. In the matter of giving to his church able preachers and evangelists, God's sovereignty is manifest, and we can but beseech Him to increase their number.

We have already quoted from Mr. Aitken's repertory, and we hope to cite further examples of the remarkable and stimulating narratives it contains.

*The Romance of Christian Work and Experience. By Rev. W. H. M. H. Aitken. (6s. John F. Shaw & Co.)

PHONOGRAPHIC LITERATURE.

In the acquisition of the winged art of phonography, the reading of correctly-outlined and graceful shorthand is equally important with assiduous writing practice. Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons cater well for this in their serial publications, and for the more advanced student they have furnished a number of interesting reading books printed in faultless phonography. Recent issues of their shorthand library comprise "Tales from Dickens;" "The Battle of Life," by the same immortal author; "The Sign of Four," by Conan Doyle; and "The Silver Ship of Mexico." These may be had bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s. each.

The same firm have issued a small volume of specimen business correspondence in shorthand, as a guide to commercial shorthand clerks, and a key to the same in ordinary print. Paper, 6d. each; cloth, 1s.

Cassell's Illustrated Universal History is being reissued as a weekly serial. It is a work of real utility, and will be completed in twenty-five sixpenny parts.

A new monthly is The School Board Gazette, the official organ of the Association of School Boards. Those who have responsibilities in administering the Education Acts will find this a useful magazine. (1s. net. Bemrose & Sons.)

The authoress of "The Cloud of Witness" has produced an attractive little work, entitled The Vision of Righteousness, aids to meditation for the season of Lent. Printed in red and black, this is a choice book—like others prepared by the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton Gell. (2s. 6d. Henry Frowde.)

A revised and enlarged edition has been issued of Which Bible to Read—Revised or Authorised? By Frank Ballard, M.A., B.Sc. (3s. 6d. H. R. Allenson.) Preference for the "Revised" is strongly expressed. Apart from the controversy, a perusal of this book is a useful study of the principal variations of reading and rendering adopted in our most accessible versions of Holy Scripture.

A chaste little volume of devotional extracts from the writings and addresses of Archbishop Temple has been edited by Rev. J. H. Burn, with the title Helps to Godly Living. (5s. Elliot Stock.) There are many good and strong things in this handsomely produced book; also there are some things incompatible with Scripture and fact, especially in sections describing the Church, as to its origin and continuity. For presentation purposes, this is an interesting book.

The works of Dr. Andrew Murray claim attention not only on their own account but as emanating from a mind and heart given up to the service of Christ and the promotion of holiness in the Church. New books from his pen are The School of Obedience (1s.), containing addresses delivered in July last at the Students' Convention at Stellenbosch, South Africa; and The Two Covenants and the Second Blessing (1s. 6d.). These are works of an eminently practical character. They deal with life as well as service, and should promote heart-searching and excite many to a renewed consecration.

God's Gentlemen, by Rev. R. E. Welsh. (3s. 6d. James Bowden.) The reading of these lively pages is a bracing experience. Mr. Welsh takes a very robust, breezy view of men and things, and he spares neither saint nor sinner, though his mailed hand is covered with the glove of a large charity and an unfailing hopefulness. The title chapter of the book, "God's Gentlemen," covers a heavy indictment of the lack of real gentleness and courtesy that often characterises the professing disciples of Christ, so many of whom are so unlike their Master. The writer makes us wince, but we feel the truth of his impeachment. The chapters headed "Chambers of Imagery" and "A Double Life" are fine examples of faithful yet tender admonition. Here and there it looks as if Mr. Welsh held a brief for the other side, but he generally saves himself from the charge of exaggeration and unfairness. Young men especially will find his pages stimulating and refreshing in a high degree.

In a booklet called Ought (6d. per dozen. Partridge & Co.) Mr. J. L. Stanley states forcibly the Christian argument for total abstinence.

In a booklet, The Parables of Balaam, Rev. A. C. Gaebelein gives an interesting exposition in brief of Numbers xxiv. and xxv. (5 cents. Hope of Israel Mission, 128, Second Street, New York City.)

A booklet for the times, by Rev. Charles Bullock, is Our Church in Peril—"A Divided" House; or, "Facing Both Ways." (2d. "Home Words" Office.) The chapters have been reprinted from The News.

Why I am a Christian, by a Commercial Traveller (3d. net. A. Stevenson & Co., 9, North Bank Street, Edinburgh), is a cogent and comprehensive apologia for Christian discipleship, with a special appeal to commercial men.

The Story of The Oxford Movement, by G. H. F. Nye, will be published immediately by Messrs. Bemrose. The object of the work is to correct mistakes which have been and are being freely circulated amongst the people concerning this religious movement in the Church of England.

To the excellent series of temperance leaflets issued by the "Friends' Temperance Union," Mr. J. Deane Hilton has contributed one on Marie Hilton and Temperance Reform (2s. per 100. Headley Bros.). Mrs. Hilton's labours for the spread of temperance principles and practice were ardent and fruitful.

Rev. M. N. Bose, B.A., B.L., gives the narrative of his conversion in the Free Church of Scotland's Institution, Calcutta, in a book entitled A Spiritual Autobiography, or the Bengalee Missionary of Gopalgunge. Dr. George Smith writes an introduction to the interesting story, which is now in its eighth thousand. (2d. Edinburgh: Religious Tract and Book Society.)

In the "Present Day Pamphlets" series, Mr. Alfred Holness has included Irvingism, and the Gift of the Holy Ghost, from the pen of D. M. Panton (6d.). There is, doubtless, reason for reviewing once again a subject which was largely discussed fifty years ago. While truth is distorted, and deadly error presented in its place, it will be needful to warn the young and inexperienced in the language used by our fathers.

Evangelistic.

Great Assembly Hall.

MR. LEONARD WEAVER commenced a mission in Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, London, on Watch Night, and carried on the same throughout the month of January with marked success. Mr. and Mrs. Baker, from Philadelphia, accompanied him. Their pathetic singing of Gospel hymns made a great impression upon the audiences. On several occasions many were moved to tears. Night after night during the month the congregations increased, and with them the blessing. The effects of the proclamation of God's truth upon the hearers was that the inquiry room found seekers asking what they must do to be saved, beside the many who were left to be dealt with in the body of the hall. On the closing night of the mission, the first gallery had to be opened to accommodate the large number who desired to be present. Many who had been blessed at the Tottenham meetings came over to join the Assembly Hall workers in praising God for the great blessing vouchsafed during the month. It was not until eleven o'clock the last hand shake was given and the mission closed that had been the means in God's hands of bringing so much blessing into many an East End home.

Mrs. Baeyertz in Dumfries.

At the request of the Y.M. and Y.W.C.A., Mrs. Baeyertz conducted a sixteen days' mission here. The meetings were held in Free St. George's Church—one of the largest in the town. She was well supported by some of our leading ministers. From the first the attendance was large, and numbers each night professed to receive Christ. Each afternoon, Mrs. Baeyertz conducted Bible readings, which resulted in much quickening and refreshing to believers. Her clear and lucid exposition of Scripture shed fresh light on many passages; with backsliders she dealt very faithfully—one man who had been a backslider for seventeen years was reclaimed by reading one of her addresses.

It is impossible to estimate results; many who attended the meetings from country districts round about returned home with their spiritual life so quickened that they in turn became a blessing to others.

John Thomson, President, Y.M.C.A.

Mission to Railway Men.

On Friday night, at the Railway Mission Hall, Wandsworth Road, Mr. Charles Inglis concluded a twelve days' mission to the railway men of Nine Elms and neighbourhood. The rainy weather prevented some from attending, but large numbers were present at each service, and night by night the workers were much encouraged by seeing men and women decide to begin a new life. Mr. Inglis gave many thrilling illustrations of the necessity for men to be saved from the power of evil habit. Bible readings were also given on Wednesday afternoons. The preaching of the old Gospel was much enjoyed, and many railway men will have to thank God throughout eternity for the visit of the evangelist.

Mr. Charles Minor has been evangelising in the Southern States. He has held services for prisoners in various places.

Mr. W. A. Boyd, of the Dublin Y.M.C.A., has concluded a ten days' mission to young men in connection with the Cork Y.M.C.A. No night meeting passed without young men professing to find the Saviour.

Mr. Monro Collings has been conducting a fortnight's mission at Croydon. God's presence and power were manifestly felt, and not one service was held without definite fruit. Mr. Collings commenced on Sunday last a united Free Church Mission at Feltham, where a good work was done under his preaching twelve months ago.

Mr. James Wharton has been holding revival services in Park Temple, Washington, D.C. The meetings were of the greatest help to the Christians, reclaiming backsliders and resulting in the conversion of the careless. The evangelist preached every afternoon at Howard University (Dr. J. E. Rankin, president), and blessing came to a number of students.

Mr. S. J. Hewlett, of Redhill, has completed a fortnight's mission for children and young people at the King Street Hall, Southsea. The Hall was well filled every night with attentive audiences. At the close of every meeting some anxious ones were prayed with, and spoken to personally. We have reason to believe that many received lasting blessing. Mr. Hewlett also held services and Bible readings for adults, which were appreciated and blessed.

John Denning.

Mr. Newton Jones has closed a ten days mission in Canterbury, and from the first day to the last God has richly blessed us. We praise Him for the visible results; we have had cases of conversion in the Sunday school and Bible classes, backsliders have been restored, and careless men and women have been led to Christ. The work is left in our hands, and with the entrance given us to new homes and hearts, we hope to see many more deciding for Christ.

H. K. K.

Rev. Thomas Cook has conducted a mission in Witney with very blessed results. From the first Sunday the influence spread, and all during the week the congregations were large. Many received help in the inquiry rooms, and some have already united themselves to the Church. The Bible readings were seasons of great blessing. Rev. Mr. Cook has also held a mission in the Fawcett Street Chapel, Sunderland, where his labours have been abundantly owned of God.

Mr. Wycliffe Pascoe, of the Evangelisation Society, London, has concluded a five weeks' mission at Dundee and Leven. The work at both places was characterised by great spiritual blessing. Mr. Pascoe is comparatively young in this branch of Christian work, but is evidently called of God to it. His addresses are thoughtful and convincing, and his manly appeals are almost irresistible. Many have confessed Christ, and Christians have been quickened in their spiritual life. The evangelist begins a Free Church Council Mission at Camelford, Cornwall, on February 26.

A long-anticipated mission of Rev. Thomas Waugh at Penzance has been held. The whole town and district has been moved, as no such spiritual work has been witnessed in the Wesleyan Church for many years. A large number of persons entered the inquiry room as seekers, among whom were married couples and members of the leading families of the congregation and many of the choir. A feature of the mission was the ready response of those under conviction to enter the enquiry room in response to Mr. Waugh's invitation. The good work is still going on.

In connection with the Railway Mission, a nine days' mission was held in the large Swimming Bath Hall, Swindon, by Mr. Josiah Nix with blessed results. The town is almost exclusively inhabited by railway people, about 10,000 men being employed in the works of the Great Western Railway. The attendances were very good during the week; and on the last two nights the hall, which seats about 2,000 people, was crowded. The names of many were taken in the inquiry room of persons who professed to accept Christ as their Saviour, and nearly 200 total abstinence pledges were taken. Regular weekly meetings will be held in connection with the Railway Mission at Swindon.

Mr. Henry Collins, of the Evangelization Society, London, has concluded a fifteen days' mission at Cox Green Mills, belonging to Messrs. J. and T. Garnett, near Bolton. Every night men and women have remained behind to inquire more definitely the way of salvation, and in most cases, if not in all, have departed rejoicing in having found the Saviour. The attendances were good throughout, and, as usual on Sundays, some difficulty was found in supplying sitting room for the numbers who came. The last Saturday evening was set apart for a prayer and testimony meeting. A goodly number were present and many joyfully gave their experience of living for Christ; several of those converted during the mission expressed their determination faithfully to serve the Saviour.

Rev. John McNeill has recently held a fortnight's mission in Tain and Easter Ross. Wherever Mr. Macneill has spoken (says the Northern Weekly), large assemblies have gathered, and in Tain evening after evening the large church has been well filled by deeply interested hearers—men and women, young men being also present in large numbers. When all his services have been so impressive it is difficult to select those that have been signally so. Among the addresses delivered in Tain those on "The axe head that swam," "What manner of man is this?" and "The Passover," may be said to have been of outstanding power. The last address was delivered on Sabbath evening to a deeply affected audience. It occupied two hours in delivery exclusive of the other parts of the service, yet the interest never failed nor flagged, and out of a crowded congregation few would say it was too long. Mr. McNeill, whose labours are so arduous and incessant, proceeds from Tain to Golspie and other centres in Sutherlandshire.

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on a fifteen days' Gospel Mission in the City Mission Hall, Benwell, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

For blessing on a two days' Bible conference in Birmingham, on February 21 and 22.

For services being held under the auspices of the Faith Mission in co. Sligo, Ireland, and that God may guide to future openings in the same locality.

For a Gospel Mission to be held in the Baptist Chapel, Waterford, Ireland, commencing March 5, to be conducted by Pastor Gibb, of Limerick.

For Special Mission to Young Men in Oldham, February 19-26.

For "Out-and-Out" Conference, at Oldham, February 26.

Praise.

For remarkable manifestations of God's presence and blessing, and hundreds of persons professing Christ at Westbourne Church, Belfast (Rev. W. Witheron).

For blessing on a ten days' Gospel Mission to railway men of Chelmsford, commencing February 12.

Torquay Y.W.C.A.—The annual report of this branch is a record of advance in every department of the work. The prayer meeting and Bible classes happily constitute the chief sources of blessing. Notwithstanding losses by removal, the net membership has greatly increased, and the institution has become increasingly popular as a holiday home. Many useful efforts are made on behalf of foreign missions among the Kaffirs and in the Punjab, and the Temperance Society has secured a large number of pledged adherents.

Notes & Comments

OUR readers will have seen with much regret the announcement in Tuesday's papers that Dr. Barnardo was seized with illness at a Belfast hotel. We are glad to learn, in response to a special inquiry, that he showed considerable improvement on Monday night, and we earnestly hope that recovery will be speedy and complete.

The awful storms and meteorological disturbances of the last few weeks are a revelation of the tremendous forces that sleep under the even tenour of Nature in her normal aspects. When these are disturbed, we find our best science and our boasted civilisation almost powerless to combat with them. Lost or damaged vessels, railways torn up, sea-walls destroyed, hundreds of lives sacrificed and thousands more imperilled, the city of New York cut off from communication by land or sea with the outside world, as completely as though invested by an army—these are a few of the incidents which prove that man is but the vicegerent and not the lord of creation; that his rule is on sufferance, not by royal right. In spite of the foolish boasting by the Daily Telegraph that "man has at last conquered the ocean," it is a great lesson in humility, and a warning against the self-sufficiency which is a growing feature of the scientific world.

Nature in these matters is a mirror to man. In all of us individually, and in human society as a whole, vast forces are sleeping of which we are often quite unaware under the ordinary conditions of life. The temptation is to imagine under such circumstances that our self-mastery is complete, that the victory is won. Those who live in this mood of complacency, however, are liable to rude shocks, and sometimes fall into sin before they are aware from sheer over-confidence in themselves. It is well to stand in awe, to shift the centre of confidence from self to God, to live in conscious submission and dependence upon Him, if we would save our souls alive in a world so electric with evil forces and passions that would destroy us. It is better to acknowledge that we do not know our own dangers and possibilities, than to pretend to a false science of our own hearts. The psalmist was right when he said, "Who can understand his errors? Save Thou me from secret faults," &c. (Psalm xix. 12-14.)

The "new astronomy" tells us that the sun's heat is maintained by gradual shrinkage of its volume. Were it not for this curious feature it would long since have lost its power to heat and comfort the earth on which we live. Is there not a lesson in this for those in advancing years? As we grow older the fires and exuberance of youthful energy die down, and to attempt, as many do in this feverish age, to keep up the activities of early life undiminished into the years of maturity, is foolish and mischievous. A wise concentration of interest and effort on a few worthy ends is the secret of undiminished usefulness. We should specialise in the service of God as in the pursuit of our earthly callings. A few things well done are better than many performed indifferently.

This caution applies to the church as well as the individual. Many churches attempt too much in the way of activity, and vast stores of energy are spent on subsidiary organisations which often thrive at the expense of the central object for which every church exists. This object, of course, is twofold—the conversion of sinners and the upbuilding of believers in the faith. Where these aims are cordially acknowledged and faithfully pursued, there is a sure promise of divine help on which to rely. But where the dissipation of energy leaves the prayer meeting empty and the fires of enthusiasm cold on the altar of sacrifice, there is no wonder that "results" are so slow in coming. There is no call more needed on the part of the workers than this—"Concentrate, Concentrate!"

The Registrar-General's report for the last quarter of 1898 contains facts that throw a lurid light on the terrible results of the system of overcrowding which is drawing so much attention just now, thanks mainly to the well-written but appalling articles in the Daily News. During the above period, which is but an average sample of the whole year, the figures show that while the proportions of deaths is smallest where the population is least dense, the proportion of births to the thousand inhabitants is greatest where the population is most dense. There is nothing like overcrowding for thinning the population. A large proportion of children are born of vice, and they are surrounded by conditions which make survival impossible. The survivors in turn are weakened in disposition and depraved in nature by their environment, while remedial measures have no chance to act efficiently so long as the overcrowding continues.

Comparisons may be odious, but sometimes they set forth the truth in a most effective way. It is, e.g., startling to be told that the conditions of life in London for hundreds of thousands of our people are worse than would be permitted in any African village! If we permit worse things among our boys and girls than the heathen permit, we shall have men and women worse than the heathen. Bishop Wilkinson gives this as his testimony:—

> I have lived in Zululand, and am able, therefore, to state, without fear of contradiction, that such a state of things as you have lately depicted would be impossible in a Zulu kraal. Amongst the natives of Africa the utmost care is taken, not only to separate the sexes in different huts, but a responsible female shares every hut in which the girls of the village sleep, and supervises the conduct of such huts.

Our Lord declares that in the judgment He will acquit or condemn according to our treatment of His hungry, thirsty, naked, imprisoned brethren; will he not, then, make inquisition for these suffering, degraded poor who are at the very heart of our country?

"The football madness" continues to receive a healthy amount of attention in the reviews. Mr. Ernest Enson brings a severe indictment against the way in which professionals are "bought and sold like slaves." Their mode of life is a perpetual temptation to drink, and when their term of efficiency is over, the only calling which seems open to them is that of the publican. The element of healthy sport is dying out of the game, and the spectators are interested in the result, and not in the play itself, and this mainly for betting reasons.

When we remember the fact that every Saturday afternoon over a million of our fellow citizens, mostly men, are collected round the football grounds of the country, this indictment, which is but the corroboration of many others, testifies to an unhappy condition of things. It means that our most popular "national game" is a hotbed of education in one of the worst "national vices." Is it not time that more were said by our leaders of thought in denunciation of this spreading evil?

We are thankful that a Bill is to be brought into the House of Commons for raising the age of "half-timers" in the great centres of industry. We hardly understand the opposition of some of the Lancashire operatives to the measure, except on pecuniary grounds. But surely the physical health of their children should be a consideration of the highest importance. Excessive child labour is a barbarity that the closing decade of the nineteenth century should sweep utterly away.

One of the growing evils in business life is the custom recently exposed by the Lord Chief Justice of "illicit commissions." It is a matter of common knowledge that such payments prevail in almost every branch of business. Wherever an employé has any voice in directing the channels of an employer's purchases, he is beset by dishonest traders with bribes. The London Chamber of Commerce has been recently carefully collecting facts which place it beyond doubt that the custom is widespread, and has affected the highest offices in municipalities, and even government officials. The bad effect of such practices is enormous, and at present the law is by no means able to meet it. A Bill will soon be brought before Parliament with a view to deal with the evil. This may do something, but the trouble can only be adequately met by the principle enunciated by John the Baptist to the soldiers who came to him for direction—to be content with their wages and to exact no more than their due.

A high standard of honour and a spirit above corruption are among the most precious heirlooms of the past in the political life of this country. The recent debate on the subject in the House of Commons, as to whether ministers of the Crown should accept office while continuing to occupy a position on the directorate of public companies, gave opportunity for publicly ventilating the question. The vote taken was inconclusive, but the debate was healthy in tone, and should do not a little to help reform. The discussion has applications to a much wider range of public duty than the Parliamentary. Every representative body should be composed of men who will allow no personal interest to compete with public duty. This is the only guarantee of just legislation and of sound administration. The state of political life in other countries (notably in America and France) is a standing warning as to the disastrous effects of corruption.

Rev. Thomas Moore (rector of St. Michael's with All Hallows, London), in a paper read at a lay and clerical meeting, gives some timely advice on the question how "Churchmen" should deal with those outside the communion of the Church of England. Instead of the lofty scorn exhibited by some Anglicans towards Nonconformists, he advocates freer intercourse, a willingness to consider their reasons for separation, the cultivation of friendly relations, and even "parochial conferences" in which "parishioners on both sides should be willing to talk over their differences in a perfectly friendly manner." If such a method were more generally followed, much of the bitterness which prevails among those who differ on questions relating to Church life would be removed; and though the result would probably not be so favourable as the speaker imagined to individual reunion with the Anglican Church, it would surely help to a more Christian temper, and to the charity which thinketh no evil of those who differ on matters ecclesiastical, but are fellow Christians all the same.

The "impartial" manner in which preferments are made to positions of influence in the Church of England by the Government may be judged from the following comments in The Record on Canon Robinson's appointment to Westminster:—

> The High Church party in London do not disguise their satisfaction at having captured the Westminster stall. They are now in absolute possession of Westminster, as they are virtually of St. Paul's. Truly Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury have served their party well. As for the Evangelicals, they must be content to be the hewers of wood and drawers of water in the Church; they must fight for the Establishment and finance the Bishops' Diocesan Societies.

This policy of gradually capturing the whole position on behalf of Ritualism in the Church is steadily going on all over the country. There seems to be but one remedy, the disestablishment of a society that is thus being exploited in the interests of a party, one of whose avowed objects is to undo the Protestant Reformation and bring about a rapprochement with Rome.

The story of the recent debates on the Ritualistic crisis in the English Church gives small prospect of anything being done by those in authority in the direction of checking the evil. The remark of the Archbishop of Canterbury that "there are not many Romanisers in the Church of England" is an extraordinary symptom of the blindness of those who should know the facts, and who have the power in their hands wherewith to control them. The remedy, it is clear, must, as ever in ecclesiastical matters, come from the people. Things will not improve till a still deeper note has been struck into the conscience of the community, and that conscience has uttered itself in an unmistakable manner in the hearing of the people's representatives. A party vote in the Commons and a futile and one-sided debate in the Lords are not likely to put an end to the most important controversy that has arisen since Puritan times.

The evil effects of "denominational teaching" in day schools on the children themselves is a question often overlooked by the people who advocate such a system, and therefore the testimony of Rev. Bernard Reynolds, Diocesan Inspector of Church Schools in London, should have a wide publicity. He goes so far as to say:—

> "It is a bad thing for our children to know that an incessant quarrel is going on about their religious education; it promotes Sectarianism amongst them, and a Sectarian child is an atrocity. It is to be feared that we have not looked upon education enough from the child's point of view, we have looked at it as a matter concerning the success or failure of certain religious bodies."

The question is an important one. What kind of generation is the present religious rivalry and confusion in education likely to produce?

The effects of the sacerdotal conception of religion and of life on national character is seen in the decadence of Spain and Italy, and in the shameful machinations of Jesuitism linked in unholy matrimony with militarism in France to defeat justice in the Dreyfus mystery. What the effects of the same evil system are on individual character may be seen in the following extract from the pen of Lambruschini, a priest of Liberal views who died in 1893, in words embodying the experience of one who had seen it from the inside:—

> They have tried to regulate everything. Men have been considered as perpetual minors, incapable of thinking and acting for themselves. Instead of educating the private conscience, and allowing it to be what it ought to be, they have subjected it to be the control of ecclesiastical authority. "We will be the conscience of all," they have said. In general, to form an opinion about the right or wrong of a thing, people think of what the priest would say. This produces servile subjection on the one side and absolute sovereignty on the other. True religion, love towards God, which is free, confident, strong and tender, and its child, serene, generous love to my neighbour, are gone.

The sudden and tragic death of President Faure on Thursday last week brings home to the whole world the insecurity of human life even amid the pomps and splendours of an earthly court. The event indeed seems to have been hastened if not directly caused by two facts closely related to his exalted position. The first was the immense strain upon the President's constitution involved in the performance of his duties, and secondly the perpetual festivities which he had to attend as host or guest. Like the sudden extinction of a candle-flame, this life at the head of a great nation flickered suddenly and went out in the midst of his days. The Elysée, President Faure's official residence, was decked for a great festival at the moment of his death, presenting a contrast that made a deep impression on those who witnessed it, and may well be attended to by a far wider circle.

The recuperative force inherent in a great nation has seldom been more strikingly exemplified than in the election of the new French President. Within forty-eight hours of the tragic termination of M. Faure's life, his successor, M. Loubet, was firmly seated in the Presidential chair, being elected to that post by a large majority of the combined Senate and Assembly. The slumbering powers of discontent and revolution had no time to organise themselves, and now the machinery of responsible Government is again in full motion. The new President is well spoken of as to character and past record by all who know his career. The fact that he has not taken any pronounced position on the great burning question of the moment in France, will create confidence and strengthen him in pursuing the path of even-handed justice.

A correspondent, writing to a contemporary bewailing the dulness of many pulpits and the lack of brightness and "go" in the sermons, asks, "Cannot the pulpit find a legitimate way of drawing attention to the attractiveness of Christ?" This is a pertinent question that every preacher and religious teacher would do well to ponder, for it is surely the real crux of the situation. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Myself." How to present Christ in all his winsomeness and spiritual power, how to open up the secret of his dying passion and his glorious resurrection, so that men, seeing Him, may, with John, cry "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world"—this is the function of the pulpit. Anything more is needless, impossible; anything less is treachery to the Lord Himself.

Nothing is more peculiarly distinctive of the Gospels than the way in which they make the person of the Redeemer stand out from the background of incident and scenery as the centre and crown of all. The most trivial facts are like windows through which we gaze on some fresh perfection or some glorious appeal. We cease to wonder that wherever Jesus appeared men followed, and loved, and worshipped. The fragrance of his presence is on every page; each verse is an added touch in the divinely drawn portrait. The same thing with a difference is conspicuous in the Epistles. In the Gospels the presence of Christ glorifies life; in the letters of his Apostles it glorifies truth; in all Christ is the unmistakable centre and fountain head of spiritual power and redemption. All preaching should be faithful to this wonderful characteristic of the New Testament.

Canada has gained 10,000 high-minded believing citizens through the persecution meted out in Russia towards those holding evangelical principles. Such is the number of emigrants belonging to the Dukhobortsi who, as stated in a recent issue, have been conveyed across the Atlantic mainly through the help of Quaker sympathy in England and America. A large portion of this army of religious stalwarts have already been welcomed at Montreal, and the rest are to follow. Twelve townships, six miles square, in a beautiful and fertile country, have been apportioned to them. These men are typical modern representatives of the Pilgrim Fathers, "who went out not knowing whither they went" at the bidding of their conscience. They will enrich our dependency with the right stuff to continue the tradition of earnest religious faith which led to the first effective beginning of a great nation on the other shores of the Atlantic.

The South American Republics are not supposed to stand in the vanguard of civilisation, but one of the smallest can teach the proudest country on earth at least one splendid lesson. Costa Rica boasts a standing army of 228 soldiers, while the number of teachers employed in the day schools amounts to 763. It is no wonder that in such a state "there has been no revolution for thirty-five years," and that the President can leave the country for diplomatic purposes without fear of disturbances during his absence as head of the Government. Would that the powerful potentates of Europe would learn so to trust in God and in each other, that they could afford to spend the millions now squandered on forts and guns and soldiers, on education instead!

What We are to Preach.—3.

By Rev. JAMES CULROSS, D.D.

(Concluded.)

BASED on the facts relating to Christ's death and resurrection, there is to be a certain announcement or preaching—preach "repentance and remission of sins." These words, carrying in them at once an awful accusation and a most gracious promise, show how fully the Gospel understands us. They touch the most real, and the deepest needs of man universally. They harmonise exactly with the function of the glorified Jesus, whom God hath exalted with his right hand to give repentance unto Israel and forgiveness of sins. After the statement of the facts these two words or their equivalents invariably come in, and in this order, forming

THE VERY ALPHABET OF THE GOSPEL.

To preach repentance requires a holy and gracious skill, with deep humility and tenderness of heart. Instead of preaching in an abstract or doctrinal way, it is well to preach from one's own experience as a penitent. Repentance is an inward change wrought in one's heart by the Spirit of God. It is the turning of the heart, not from one sin to another less disreputable, but from sin to God. It implies grief for and hatred of one's former course. The evidence of the inward change is a change in the outward conduct. There is an honest purpose in the heart to abandon the former evil ways, and to do the will of God. He only who has undergone the change can preach it; and his own experience will be his best guide. In such a preacher's lips "repentance" will be no harsh, unfeeling word, but a word that will touch and melt hearts, and bring men to their knees. There is, no doubt, pain in the word, but there is also grace in it and hope and unspeakable joy.

The other word, to go along with the first, is "forgiveness," containing

GOD'S STRONG ARGUMENT FOR REPENTANCE.

The two words are to be spoken in the same breath. "Be it known unto you that through Jesus Christ is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins." That is the word with which the Christian preacher is to face any audience. He is to proclaim forgiveness; free and full forgiveness of the guilty past, immediate forgiveness, with no dark period of suspense or doubtful and fearful waiting, forgiveness righteous and complete, so that the scarlet shall be as white as snow and the crimson like wool; righteous forgiveness, for if God cannot forgive in righteousness He cannot forgive at all. These are the two great words which the Lord gave to the disciples, and which He bade them "preach," with human lips, as men who knew and felt what they were speaking about, not selecting their audiences, but telling out their message to all who would listen—facing them, looking into their eyes, answering their questions, meeting their difficulties. Preach to "all nations," existing and prospective—the message is for earth to its utmost borders, and for time till its close. As widely as the curse extends, so widely let the message of mercy go. What confidence is here afforded of of the need for the message, and of its universal and everlasting fitness and sufficiency—Preach "in my Name," not resting on argument, philosophy, or any kind of human authority, but delivering a message directly from Me, and trusting in Me to give testimony to the word of grace. If men demand your authority, simply answer, Jesus Christ bade us preach so, and will prove the message in his own way. Preach, beginning at Jerusalem, which God chose as the centre from which grace should radiate; at Jerusalem, where the Gospel facts transpired, and where they could be contradicted if contradiction were possible; at Jerusalem, the scene of hate, where sin abounded, where it displayed its utmost intensity and horror, where wicked hands shed the blood of the Son of God. Let the preaching begin there, with no fear of confutation, with no trembling for personal consequences, with no remembrance of superlative guilt, save the magnanimous remembering of love.

Historic Revivals.

THE AMERICAN REVIVAL OF 1857-8.

IN the Christian Endeavour World, published in America, there appeared a little over a year ago a sketch of "America's Greatest Revival," by Dr. J. L. Hill, of Salem, Mass. We subjoin a portion of the first paper on the subject:—

When the Saviour shall call together his chosen in the judgment of the great day, and the throngs shall come up before Him who were gathered into the everlasting Kingdom by the revival of 1857, their numbers will undoubtedly exceed those converted in any other equal period in all the earlier history of the work of the Spirit. Four hundred thousand souls in America alone, during a single winter, found refuge in Christ. It was called familiarly the Great Revival. No man living or dead had ever seen anything like it, reaching so many people scattered over such a length and breadth of territory, appearing in so many denominations of Christians, and influencing and penetrating so many hearts. The whole land received the spiritual rain. Not less than 150 meetings for prayer were held daily in New York and Brooklyn, while in 200 towns in New York State alone the Spirit seemed like a gentle wind to fill almost imperceptibly at the same time. In over 2,000 cities and villages, by actual count, in the United States, the flood of feeling which was gathering with the force of a mighty torrent seemed to swell.

In some localities in the Middle and Eastern States the people seemed to rise by cities and communities to seek the Lord. In Philadelphia, where the meetings were solemn beyond description, there was one of those general uprisings of the human soul to the consciousness of religious want, and ten thousand converts, a myriad, pressed into the Kingdom, 3,000 of them belonging to one denomination. It was in this city that those memorable sermons were preached by Dudley A. Tyng in Jaynes Hall, before audiences of over 5,000 persons, that resulted in more conversions than in any other instance except one. Here, too, were the largest meetings that at that time had ever been assembled for the simple purpose of prayer, 5,000 persons meeting daily, and making the place a Bochim.

In Providence such a time of religious interest had never before been known. More persons of both sexes were engaged in religious inquiry than at any former period in the history of the State. The number of requests for prayer, on the table, was so great that the leader only looked at them with wonder, and did not attempt to read them.

Never in the history of Lowell had the waters of life flowed so freely. At Manchester the silent, mysterious influence seemed to come almost visibly down upon the hearts of men, like the overshadowing of a cloud. In New Bedford, a city of 24,000 people, twelve daily prayer meetings were sustained with unabated interest for three months. Christianity seemed to reach its true summit level in 147 towns in Massachusetts, where simultaneous revivals, the greatest in their respective histories, were in progress.

Yale, like most of the other colleges, was blessed in a manner never before known, and the work in Phillips Academy was altogether unexampled. Some of our educational centres were so stirred that very few students were left who had not turned towards the gate at the head of the way. At Canandaigua 240 academy students united with the churches of the town.

Waiters in hotels held prayer meetings at ten o'clock at night among the tables that they had served, being forbidden by their calling to meet earlier thus together. The work among firemen in different cities became some way a distinctive feature among the operations of the divine Spirit. On the doors of stores and of the largest commercial houses in Newark would be found a placard, "Will open at the close of the prayer meeting."

If the Revival was more marked in some parts of the country than in others, it cannot be said of any large portion of the land that it was exempt. The fervour of became intense, and spread everywhere, penetrating every nook and corner of the great republic. At Dubuque the numbers converted were beyond all precedent, and in Virginia, in a circuit of several counties, only one church existed that did not ask and receive an outpouring of the Spirit upon the dry fleece.

The extent and pervasiveness of this unusual work, which seemed, like a mighty tide, insensibly but powerfully to keep rising higher and higher, reaching all classes of persons, is still further demonstrable. The members of the legislature of the State of New York commenced meeting for prayer at half-past eight o'clock in the morning at the rooms of the Court of Appeals which stood opposite the Senate Chamber. When in the fifth daily meeting the voice of supplication and praise was heard at the Capitol in Albany, the number present filled two rooms. At Washington, where five daily prayer meetings were held, senators and representatives met to arrrange for the formation of a Congressional Union prayer meeting.

Little did that solitary man, Jeremiah Calvin Lanphier know—kneeling alone on the floor of a room where he himself had been moved to appoint a meeting for prayer—that the day was breaking that should be gilded by the rays of a brighter sun than had ever shone on the moral and religious world before.

Trials.

"Patient in tribulation" (Rom. xxii. 12).
"I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation" (2 Cor. vii. 4).

Silence, Lord, my heart's complaining,
Though the way be rough;
Let me know the Arm sustaining,
Strong enough.

Love like Thine—such lovingkindness—
Though I doubted long,
Shone at last through years of blindness,
Woke my song.

Shouldst Thou lead through tribulation,
Or where shadows fall,
Still remains this consolation,
Love has all.

Thought and will and heart's affection
Now to Thee I bring;
Taught to see the blest connection,
Father—King.

Preparation for Service.

By Mr. D. L. MOODY.

THERE is an impression that Christian workers may enter God's work at any time and in any place without the need of preparation. In one sense this may be true, for God can use, and does use, any one who is willing to surrender his life and do or be whatsoever He wills. But it is a great mistake, and one that is causing great harm to the Church, to think that zeal is the only requisite for service.

A Christian worker, whether called to the regular ministry of the Church, or assigned to service as a missionary or lay preacher, needs careful and thorough training. To be sure some men have been used of God who have had no training, but ten have failed where one has been successful, and no one better appreciates the value of a thorough training for Christian service than he who has felt its lack, and has had to learn by hard experience what might have been gained by study.

There is no question but the ministry demands a thorough training. A theological course should be the severest professional course of study there is. If medical men require thorough training, both in theory and in practice, to enable them to deal with the physical evils of mankind, how infinitely more important it is that those to whose care are entrusted the spiritual needs of men, should be THOROUGHLY EQUIPPED FOR THEIR WORK.

Regarding the existing methods of theological schools I am not competent to speak, but it is clear that any course of study that fails to prepare a minister for working with men to bring them to Christ, is fundamentally deficient.

The same is no less true of any missionary or lay worker. An evangelist who thinks he can be used of God without acquainting himself with God's Word will soon be laid aside. And any man who is called of God to proclaim God's message, either in the homeland or abroad, and who continually studies God's Word and lives in obedience to his will, as it is increasingly revealed, will never be barren or unfruitful in his work. It is a great law of God that you must either go forward in Christian experience or you must backslide; you must gain or lose. There is no standing still; the balance is on one side or the other.

What is the needed preparation for Christian service? First and foremost, a will that is yielded absolutely without reserve to God. Any preparation without this is worthless. I have known men who have had a wonderful knowledge of God's Word, and have been thoroughly educated, but absolutely on account of some selfish spirit, or ambition for popularity.

Next to a willing spirit comes the need of a knowledge of God's Word. It is not enough to live on past experiences. They may interest you, but they become stale manna to your hearers. It is the Bible that reveals God's truths, and in its study the soul finds strength, both for defence against evil and in striving to save others. It is the knowledge of the Bible that makes a Christian a real power, and there is no other knowledge that can be compared with it. See how the men who have been used of God to do a permanent work have wielded "the Sword of the Spirit!" Just see how the hymns of Christendom that contain Scripture truths live and influence men generation after generation!

Some years ago an article appeared in The Christian urging young men to study the Bible in preparation for Christian work. A young mechanic in the East End of London read the article, and was at once impressed with it. He decided to devote his life to Christian work, and at once began to lay up money to gain a better education, and fit himself for an evangelist. He came to America and attended the Mount Hermon School at Northfield, where he devoted a large portion of his time to Bible study in addition to his regular academic work. On leaving the school he became useful at once as an evangelist, and about eight years ago settled as a pastor in a large city in the west. During these years I have seen nothing of him, but recently I have had the pleasure of working in the city where he lives. Here I learned that the young mechanic has become of the city, and his influence is felt throughout the entire section of the country.

What God has done with that young working man from the East of London, He is anxious to do with thousands of others. I think it must please Him to see his servants honour his Word, for I always notice that He uses them. By all means let a young man seek the best education he can, and let him gain all the knowledge possible for use in God's service, but let it be over and above the study of God's Word. With the Bible as the foundation, and all else as superstructure, the right proportions will be retained, but with the order inverted any preparation will be found to be essentially wanting.

A course of Bible study under experienced teachers, such as that offered by the Bible Institute in Chicago, or by the Bible Institute in Glasgow, has proved of great value to many prospective missionaries and lay workers. The courses of study are specially adapted by their very practical nature to the needs of lay workers, and there is no reason why thousands of young men and women should not avail themselves of these and similar institutions, to become valuable co-workers with ministers and effective missionaries to the uttermost parts of the world.

Fundamental Truths.

DOUBTLESS the best way to meet errors of doctrine in the Church of Christ is to restate and reassert the fundamental verities of the faith. The only difficulty is in getting the right audience. A large company, numbering probably over 2,000, met in Exeter Hall on Tuesday evening last week for the third of the gatherings convened on that day by the Evangelical Alliance. Judging by the evident enthusiasm and unanimity of the meeting, the speakers addressed solely those already converted to a belief in the Reformed doctrines that are now being called in question. Whether the utterances on the platform will ever reach the Ritualisers who are rending the Church of England in twain we cannot surmise; we only wish they could.

It is not easy at this time of day to say anything new, or even fresh, about the great underlying principles of Christianity as revealed in Scripture. But it may be admitted that the speakers in Exeter Hall last week reiterated for the hundredth time the Bible teaching on their allotted themes, in a way that showed conclusively how far away from the line of Scripture teaching are the pretensions and assumptions of our modern "priests," so called, who shelter themselves under the banner of the Protestant Church of England.

The chairman of the evening, Sir Douglas Fox, remarked that the Evangelical Alliance is not a body given to controversy or strife, but they deemed it necessary at this crisis to emphasise the great foundation doctrines on which Protestantism is built. He read a letter that had been received from Lord Polwarth, much to the same effect as his own remarks.

The following resolution was submitted to the assembly by Prebendary Webb-Peploe:—

This meeting of members of various churches, realising that many people are being led away from the simplicity of the Gospel by prevalent sacerdotal and superstitious errors, calls upon all evangelical Christians to unite in defence of the great doctrines reaffirmed at the Reformation.

In supporting it, the Prebendary said that on the present occasion they met not as citizens or as "Churchmen," but simply as Christians, set for the defence of the faith. Referring to the radical difference between the Evangelical Alliance basis and the sacerdotal theory, he said that ever since man departed from God he has been seeking to discover some

SATISFYING CENTRE OF AUTHORITY.

In these days of enlightenment we cannot bow down to idols of wood or stone, and so many seek to persuade themselves that the fountain of authority is to be found in a church. It is from this idea that the sacerdotal system springs. The outcome of this may be found in the blasphemous saying of a Romish priest: "I am greater than God, for God cannot create Himself, but I can create God every day, and place Him on the altar and hold Him there so long as I will." Men do not see that God is now to be seen and realised by us in the face of Jesus Christ, and herein lies the root of the mischief. If they saw and believed what the Bible reveals about Jesus Christ, they could no longer lean upon any system of ceremony or rite. We are being taught now that the symbols of the old dispensation—sacrifices, priests, altars, incense, vestments, and other methods of approach to God by external means—are the patterns by which we are to regulate our worship to-day. We absolutely deny that any type or shadow can ever take the place of the blessed realities of the one perfect sacrifice offered by Jesus Christ, who said on the cross, "It is finished."

The resolution was formally seconded by Dr. Richard Glover, whose address was appropriately a setting forth of the New Testament teaching on priesthood. The ground had been rather cut from under his feet by the preceding speaker, but his points were all well put and driven home. He said the spirit of the New Testament did not require a priestly order. The only priesthoods known to the New Testament is that of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is incommunicable, and that of the whole body of believers. Some passages relied on by the Roman Catholics as a ground for their pretensions were cited and expounded in the light of the context, giving no sort of foundation for sacerdotal claims. The intrusion of the so-called priest between the individual soul and God on the grounds of dishonour to God and danger to morality and human liberty. We must pray, above all, for such a real revival of true religion as shall enthrone Christ in every heart.

MUST BE RESISTED AT ALL COSTS,

The last address was by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan on "The Message of the Rent Veil to the Present Times." The burden of his clearly expressed deliverance was that when Christ had accomplished our redemption, and the veil of the Temple was rent from top to bottom, all barriers to the access of the soul into the very holiest place were removed. Symbolism was for ever done away with. This rending of the veil does not mean the degradation of the priest or the defilement of the holy place, but it means that all the outside places are consecrated to the furthest extreme, and all the great company of believers in Christ are constituted a priesthood, while the priesthood as a caste is for ever done away with. Mr. Morgan counselled his younger hearers to give themselves to the quiet study of the Word on these subjects, as a preservative against the false doctrine that emanates from sacerdotal teachers.

The collections taken at the meetings were devoted solely to the relief of Armenian distress.

Thoughts for Parents.

CONVERSATION.

"Be thou an example . . . in conversation."
(1 Tim. iv. 12.)

FEW parents realise the formative power of conversation on the young mind. How different would be the table talk in homes if we could realise the influence of words and opinions on our boys and girls! Let meal times be opportunities for getting at the minds of your children. The culture of the judgment, of right views of life, of allowance for the faults of others, may go on at table; or on the contrary, evil speaking gossip and quarrelling may here find a fine field.

Parents, display your tact in leading your children's conversation. Do not lecture or show that you are talking to improve their minds; they resent this. Store up from day to day topics of conversation. Do not allow free criticism of the food provided. Let your children know that idle as well as profane words are seeds which will bear bitter fruit.

"The first ingredient of good talk is truth; the next, good sense; the third, good humour; the fourth, wit." Frances S. Hallowes.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, Feb. 26. Numbers ix.

FRIENDS sometimes urge us to change our sphere, and march in this direction or the other, and the speciousness of their arguments impresses us. At other times it seems as though the scarcity of our means or the pressure of our foes compels us to make a move. There are yet other times when a wild dread betakes us that we shall never be able to maintain the difficult position in which we find ourselves; and we consider whether it would not be wise to step down into a more sheltered and secure hiding-place. But, in the meanwhile, God's Providence gives no sign; we are not conscious of any definite impression of his will: we feel that the cloud does not move. Then, if it does not, I beseech you, remain as you are. God will be responsible for the consequences of your obedience. Where the cloud broods the manna falls.

If, on the other hand, the door has been recently closing, and you feel that you have no more room in those parts; if a deep conviction has been wrought in you lately, that you have done all that was required of you in this place, and that you are being called to another—then be sure that God is leading you forth. But do not go before Him, as you must not fall behind Him. Let Him direct your course and turn your face. "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding."

MONDAY, Feb. 27. Numbers x.

For a whole year Israel had sojourned under Sinai. In Egypt they were an undisciplined crowd, they had now become a marshalled host, and their movements were ordered with military precision.

In the history of the Church there are moments when the trumpet sounds the advance. It was such a time, for instance, when, at the close of the last century, Carey started for India, calling on his fellow-disciples to fulfil the Master's last injunction. It was such a time when the Evangelical Alliance was formed, some fifty years ago, and issued its first summons to Unity.

At such times, we may issue a cordial invitation to those who sympathise with us, but are not as yet united in our ranks, to join us. When the Church is waking up, she lays aside her exclusiveness, and cries, as Moses did to Hobab, "Come with us, and we will do you good." Sure that only good awaits her, she has no hesitation in promising a share in it to all who will range themselves under her banner, and, with her, follow the guiding cloud.

And how much the Church may benefit by such accessions to her ranks. "Thou mayest be to us instead of eyes." Hobab's mode of life made him familiar with suitable halting-places in the desert, where shade and water might be found, as well as with spots where danger from robber or wild beast might lurk. Such a guide would be invaluable. So, too, does the Church of God need the aid and foresight of men with business faculty, with intellectual acumen, and many other natural qualities, devoted, alas! too often to the exclusive use of the world. Well may she promise in return, "What goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee." The benefit is reciprocal.

TUESDAY, Feb. 28. Numbers xi.

Moses' outcry is not to be wondered at. He seems to have been thoroughly overstrained with the immense demands made upon him. His labours must have been very great in the organisation of the people, and the codification of the laws and statutes by which they were henceforth to be governed. And now that they besieged him with complaints at the Divine commissariat, it seemed as though the last straw was imposed on the crushing burden he was bearing, and he sank beneath it.

God knew the soul of his faithful servant too well to find fault. The remedy was instantly provided in the appointment of the seventy elders who were associated with the great law-giver.

It may be that these words will be read by Christian workers who are filled with similar discouragement and foreboding. Let such be assured of God's infinite and tender sympathy. Let them cast their burden on Him, and look to Him for relief. He may show them how to depute some of their work to others; and then endue their fellow-workers with his Holy Spirit.

WEDNESDAY, March 1. Numbers xii.

"Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against them that work unrighteousness. . Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him. . Cease from anger, and forsake wrath; fret not thyself, it tendeth only to evil-doing. . The arms of the wicked shall be broken, but the Lord upholdeth the righteous."

What a graphic commentary on those words is furnished by this little episode in the life of Moses. He must have been very meek, or his brother and sister had not dared to assail him; and his meekness was the more apparent when he took their insult without remark. It is one of the hardest lessons not to revile when we are reviled, not to threaten when we are insulted; especially if, as was the case with Moses, we are in a position to make our power felt. But when we thus take the law into our own hands, we forfeit the sure and efficient vindication of our God. What we think we can do, and therefore put our hands to, God will leave us to carry out with more or less success, generally with less. Happy are they who carry their cause to the Court of King's Bench, and seek its protection. They shall be vindicated!

What a character was this! "Faithful in all my house." Yet, probably, it is within our reach. What blessed intimacy with God! "not in dark speeches, but mouth to mouth." Yet this also may be ours in Jesus. And what delightful and prevalent intercession! May the Spirit of Jesus help us thus to pray for those who despitefully use us!

THURSDAY, March 2. Numbers xiii.

By comparing the opening verses with Deut. i., it appears that the suggestion about the spies emanated from the people, and that the plan was graciously acquiesced in by God. But let us be warned by the result. It is always a mistake to spy out the land into which we are being led, for we are almost sure to see the difficulties apart from the Divine help and blessing. These only become apparent when our need is pressing. How often we send out our forebodings to spy out the future, with the inevitable result that they bring back an evil report!

The ten spies did not detract from the beauty of the land or the desirableness of its products. Nay, they brought the specimens. But they had alarming stories to tell of fenced cities, and giants, and the strong nations that inhabited the border lands. For every look at the foe, take ten at God. Look away from the winds and waves which are contrary, to the face of Christ. Remember that if He leads and you follow, He makes Himself responsible for results. No soul can perish in the path of devout obedience.

FRIDAY, March 3. Numbers xiv.

The Remonstrance of Faith. With heroic courage, Caleb and Joshua sought to stem the faithless complaints of Israel. They did not minimise the strength or formidable numbers of the foe, but magnified the mighty power which was pledged to fulfil the covenant made centuries before with Abraham. "Their defence is removed from them, and the Lord is with us; fear them not."

The Intercession of Love. There are three arguments in this marvellous mediation. First, that the name and reputation of Jehovah should suffer no damage; next, that God was bound to be consistent with the proclamation He had made as to his character; thirdly, that as He had forgiven, so He should continue to forgive. Methinks I can hear the voice of a greater than Moses, pleading for us also before the throne of God. Let us pray thus for ourselves and others.

The Sentence of Divine Wrath. Moses' prayer was heard and answered, and the nation, as such, was spared; but the generation which had so grossly disbelieved and murmured must fail of the land of promise. You may be delivered from Egypt, but yet you may miss Canaan. You may sing God's praise on the shores of the Red Sea, but murmur on the frontier of the land, and be turned back to perish in the wilderness.

On the one side, victory; on the other, defeat. Here, rest beneath vine and fig-tree; there, forty years of wandering. This way to satisfaction; that to incessant discontent. What will you choose? You may thwart God's highest purposes by your disbelief, and be doomed to come short of his promise; or you may go in to possess the land—not by might, nor by power, but as the gift of God to your receptive and appropriating faith.

SATURDAY, March 4. Numbers xv.

What a tender strain is here. Between the terrible chapters of the outbreak at Kadesh-barnea and that which tells the story of Korah, here is a sweet flute-like interlude. It reminds us that God will not always chide, nor keep his anger for ever.

Tenderness in the Inclusion of the Stranger. It might be some pilgrim who sought hospitality, or a purchased slave; but he was to be graciously included in the burnt-offerings and sacrifices. There was to be one law and ordinance for all. And herein was a prevision of the time, then distant, when there should be no more the stranger and the foreigner, because all holy souls would be fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God.

Tenderness for Unwitting Sins. It might be that the whole congregation, or the individual, would be betrayed into some breach of the divine law, and not discover the offence till long after it was committed. Thus in a subsequent age, the Apostle tells us that he verily thought he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. And Israel in rejecting the Lord knew not what they did. For all such sin there is forgiveness; but where there is presumptuous and high-handed, wilful sin, as in the case of the Sabbath-breaker, there is severity. Yet this severity is the other side of love, since nothing is more necessary for the well-being of a community than the maintenance of law.

Tenderness in the Suggestion of the Memorial Fringe. We have something better in the ministry of the Holy Spirit, whose prerogative it is to bring all things to our remembrance, and keep us in touch with Jesus. O Spirit, be his remembrancer within us!

Rome and the Scriptures.

A Contrast.—2.

By MAJOR G. MACKINLAY.

LET us now consider some of the practices of the Romish Church. We begin by taking the custom of turning to the east, and the position of the chancel at the east end of a church or cathedral. We have little to guide us on these points in the New Testament, except the attitude and direction of the wise men, who came from the east (Matt. ii. 1) to seek the infant Saviour. As they came from the east they must have made their search with their faces towards the west.

If we look in the Old Testament we find it mentioned (Ezekiel viii. 16) as an abomination, that men were "with their faces toward the east, and they worshipped the sun toward the east." The worship of the true God is never associated in Scripture with "faces toward the east." Some may say that the eastward position is assumed because Jerusalem is, roughly speaking, in the east. If this is the case, how much better to employ the term "Jerusalem position" instead of "Eastward position," which bears such an unfortunate resemblance to the words "faces toward the east." But in India and in other Asiatic countries the eastward position is also assumed, although from there Jerusalem lies toward the west. So careful was Jehovah to avoid the eastward position for the Jews (as it was doubtless associated in their minds with the forbidden sun worship), that the most holy part of the Tabernacle in the wilderness was positively ordered to be at the west end, the only entrance being on the eastern side (Ex. xxvii. 13-16); and in agreement with this the western side is elsewhere spoken of as "behind the Tabernacle" (Num. iii. 23). Nowadays we speak of the western fronts of our cathedrals, and the eastern side is the back of a so-called properly oriented church or cathedral — exactly the opposite of what Jehovah ordered for his people. Is it not almost certain that the orientation of churches is which it was not thought politic or convenient to sweep away when nominal Christianity was adopted many centuries ago by the nations of Europe?

It may be said that these are trivial subjects; but minor points have importance in the Scriptures, and their neglect shows us more than appears on the surface, when their meaning is carefully studied.

We pass on now, however, to subjects which are confessedly of more prominence. It is often said by Roman Catholics that as Mary, the Lord's mother, was a woman, she has a more tender heart than her Son, and that she must, therefore, first be approached in order to influence the Lord Jesus in a merciful manner. But in the Scriptures we are told, "There is one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. ii. 5). When the Lord was upon earth, He was once told that his mother and his brethren sought for Him (Matt. xii. 47, Mark iii. 32, Luke viii. 20); but instead of attending at once to what she and they wished to say, He told his hearers that, "Whosoever will do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother" (Matt. xii. 50). Thus he made the earthly tie of small account compared with the spiritual one. He spoke also to the same effect to a woman who said "Blessed is the womb that bare Thee, and the paps which Thou has sucked; but He said, Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the Word of God, and keep it." (Luke xi. 27, 28).

We cannot find any instance in the New Testament of Mary interceding for others, even when she was on earth: the nearest approach to it is when she said to Him at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, "They have no wine" (John ii. 3). His reply was almost a rebuke: "Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come." Her words after this to the servants are worthy of all attention: "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Mary wished them to listen to His voice and to obey Him, without any intervention on her part.

The dying thief on the cross prayed directly to the Lord Jesus: "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into thy kingdom" (Luke xxiii. 42); although he had previously reviled Him (Matt, xxvii. 44); and although Mary, the mother of the Lord, was standing by the cross (John xix. 25), no thought that the heart of Mary was more tender than that of the Saviour induced the dying thief to ask her first.

The Roman Catholics assert in their English catechism, 1894, No. II., page 17, that "All mankind have contracted the guilt and stain of original sin except the blessed Virgin, who, through the merits of her Divine Son, was conceived without the least guilt or stain of original sin." Yet Mary herself uttered the words, "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (Luke i. 47). If she had no sin, she could not need a Saviour.

Mary is mentioned with others in the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles as continuing in prayer and supplication; but from that time onward her name even is not mentioned in the rest of the Acts or in the Epistles.

Doubtless Mary was "highly favoured" (Luke i. 28), but she could not be an intermediary between God and man. The honour given to her was great; but how careful is Scripture to place her in her right position of subservience to the Lord Jesus. Even when He was an infant we read the order, "the young Child" first, with "Mary, his mother," in the second place (Matt. ii. 11); and again, the same order is used in Matt. ii. 13, 14, 20, 21, where the expression is, "the young Child and his mother." The attitude of the religion of the world is reflected, however, in the titles of numbers of pictures in the galleries of Europe, which bear the inscriptions, "The Madonna and Child," or the "Virgin and Child," in which Mary is put in the first place, instead of in the second, as in the Scriptures.

Protestant Outlook.

MEETINGS protesting against the Ritualist aggression are reported from all quarters. Wales has been specially clear in utterance, large gatherings having been held in several centres.

The Protestant memorial presented to Her Majesty last week is a remarkable document. It was adopted at the Church House at a meeting of 1,500 people. Among the signatories are thirty-one peers, fifty members of Parliament, 2,000 Justices of the Peace, and 1,300 clergy. The signatures are limited to Churchmen in representative positions. The memorial can hardly remain a dead letter.

A Rome correspondent learns that Cardinal Rampolla, the Papal Secretary of State, has expressed the opinion that should the British Parliament pass legislation against Ritualism, it will inevitably result in the accession to the Roman Catholic Church of large numbers of Ritualists. The Cardinal thinks that the flowing tide in England is towards Ritualism, and that repressive legislation can only hasten the movement towards Roman Catholicism.

The vicar of the Church of the Annunciation, Brighton, has been cited to appear, with the churchwardens of the parish, before Dr. Tristram, Q.C., vicar-general and chancellor of the diocese of Chichester, to show cause why he should not remove certain ornaments alleged to be illegal, and placed in the church without a faculty. The citation was more than once affixed to the church doors, but torn down by sympathisers with the vicar, and at length it was torn to pieces in presence of an excited crowd.

At an English Church Union meeting at Torquay an endeavour was made by representatives of the "moderate" section to dissociate the Union from "doctrines inconsistent with the Church of England, such as direct invocation of the saints, reservation of the Sacrament, sprinkling of water, and the creeping to the Cross on Good Friday." A resolution designed to reassure the public of the loyalty of the E.C.U. to the Prayer Book and its obedience to the episcopal voice, was defeated, receiving, in fact, very few votes.

Lord Hugh Cecil, speaking at Greenwich, remarked that as much trouble turns upon the interpretation of the Prayer Book, points in dispute should be submitted to competent authorities. Being Episcopalians, why should they not abide by the decisions of the Bishops? Good men ought not to be hounded out of the Church—too much had been done in that direction already, in the case, for example, of the Wesleyan Methodists, whom all true Churchmen would desire back. In conclusion, Lord Hugh said that "the duty of the clergy was to save souls, and not to observe rubrics." An evening paper suggested that this sentence would read better if "observe" were replaced by "transgress." The duty of the clergy is to save souls and also to observe rubrics.

As showing the attitude of Rome towards the Gospel in Ireland, we make the following extract from a private letter:—

The Roman Catholic newsagents, who have for some time past been supplying me with The Christian, have sent word that they should discontinue doing so. I thought, at the time, that Dr. Robertson's articles on Romanism might account for their decision; but the following extract from Archbishop Walsh's Lenten Pastoral, read in all the chapels on Feb. 12, affords a better clue:—

"The attention of Catholic vendors of books, newspapers and other publications should be called by the clergy to the awful responsibility that is incurred by those who lend themselves to the diabolical work of undermining the morals of our people through the dissemination amongst them of debasing and seductive publications, such as still continue to be sold in not a few places in this City and diocese."

The words "diabolical," "debasing," "infamous traffic," are stock phrases used for the denunciation of Christian work carried on by Protestants in Ireland.

The Holdfast Union is an association of sturdy Evangelicals, clerical and lay. Members undertake to maintain the following features in ritual and worship:—

No cross or other image on the communion table. No eastward (sacrificing) position in consecrating. Periodical evening communions. A full-length surplice and black preaching gown for the minister. Scarf, if used, to be distinct from the stole—condemned at the Reformation. No "Hymns Ancient or Modern," or other Romanising collection. An unsurpliced choir (mixed or otherwise); and no singing or monotoning of prescribed prayers.

Full particulars, with forms for signature, may be had from Rev. E. H. F. Cosens, Holy Trinity Vicarage, Tewkesbury.

The Bishop of Bristol, though a High Churchman, is determined to keep ritual within bounds. He has secured the general assent of his clergy, though in some cases unwillingly, to his wishes affecting various matters. Romish cards and manuals are to be removed from the Holy Table, and no words beyond those of the Prayer Book are to be used by the officiant. The bishop points out that "reservation" of the elements is forbidden by the formularies; and requests that the mixing of water with the Communion wine shall not be ceremonially performed. On vestments and incense, Dr. Browne speaks with some hesitation; but he advises that the use of incense shall cease. He also condemns compulsory confession as a preliminary to the reception of the Holy Communion.

A correspondent of the Daily News recently drew some striking pictures of "the way Ritualism works" in Brighton, and gave an alarming account of the insidious means by which the children are indoctrinated with Roman Catholic ideas in some of the State-aided Voluntary Schools. Their education, which is partly paid for by the Protestants of the country, includes attendance at Mass. Here is a description of the way they are instructed to adore the "elements" in the Communion Service:—

When the bell rings, as the priest says "This is my Body," children bow their heads and say by themselves, "Hail! Most sacred flesh of Jesus." When the bell rings again, and the priest says "This is my Blood," children bow their heads and say, "Hail! Most sacred Blood of Jesus."

The comments of the writer are well worth reprinting:—

This is foundation work. These clerical gentlemen of the Ritualistic school in Brighton have on their books over 2,000 children. They are expected to get well into their wondering little heads this idea of a miraculous transformation under the hands of the great man up there in the gorgeous vestments and among the lights and glittering candlesticks, and then all the rest follows quite easy and naturally. With this radical idea firmly planted in their minds, the influence of the priest is likely to be permanent.

It is no wonder that the Ritualists only want to be "left alone in peace." But to do so would be to hand over into their power a vast proportion of the rising generation of Englishmen.

Other Lands.

The Heart of Brazil.

ABOUT a year ago I found myself in Lisbon, Portugal, lacking in visible resources and wondering where the necessary supplies were to come from for the beginning of our mission. To-day I am able to testify that throughout the year neither myself nor my devoted co-workers, Dr. and Mrs. Graham, have lacked a single good or necessary thing.

A year ago, had I shared the anxiety of our friends, I should have died of very fear, in view of the reported unwholesomeness of the climate, and the pictured dangers attending the exploration of an unknown tropical region. To-day I look back upon a seven months' journey in the interior by boat, on horseback, and afoot. In all that time has no serious mishap befallen any of us, nor have I been sick a single day.

A year ago the future was a blank, and the question of "how to proceed" was a serious problem. The feasibility of each of several projected routes to the interior was negatived by those to whom I applied for advice. To-day I am again at the coast, having safely reached our objective point and studied the situation. I find not only that the way to the Indians is clear, but that work has been thrust upon us for which we were not looking. Doors have been opened where we least expected them. This is the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes.

In a previous letter I reported my journey to Manaos, and gave some impressions of the importance of the Amazon valley as a centre for missionary work. On my return to Para last May I was joined by Dr. and Mrs. Graham, of Stirling, Scotland. We started for Goyaz on June 5. Space does not permit my giving any description of the interesting and exciting journey through the innumerable rapids and falls of the Tocantins River. On the way we freely distributed gospels and tracts, which were everywhere eagerly received. Unfortunately those able to read are but a very small fraction of the population. In the northern half of the State of Goyaz there is but one town possessing a school.

From a medical point of view the condition is even worse. The entire State of Goyaz, two and a half times the size of Great Britain and Ireland, can boast but one single medical graduate, an American located at the capital. The spiritual condition is better imagined than given. Of the physical and material aspects of the country I must forbear to speak, mentioning only that anyone who should attempt to traverse the country, expecting to buy provisions on the way, stands for the people are too lazy to cultivate, and too improvident to save anything beyond their most absolute personal needs.

In exactly two months' time our boats landed at Carolina, a town of some 3,000 people, situate on the east-bank of the Tocantins, not far from where the Manuel Alvez River forms the dividing line between the states of Goyaz and Maranham. It is a point of strategical importance, by reason of its location and extensive commerce. It is the only place on the river having regular postal facilities, and presents some features of refinement and education not found elsewhere on the river. This is due to a number of Maranham merchants who have settled in Carolina.

It was to one of these families that, perfect strangers though we were, some unseen guiding hand led us the very first day of our landing. The principal merchant of the place extended to us the hospitality of his house, and having ascertained the object of our coming to Brazil, he prevailed upon the Grahams to become his guests during my absence on the upper river, where I wished to visit the Indian villages.

Dr. Graham has since found abundant occupation in Carolina, treating on an average forty persons per day, and thereby winning many friends, and breaking down a good deal of opposition and suspicion, which always meet a Protestant missionary in a new Brazilian field. Being already over five months in Carolina, Dr. Graham is still enjoying the hospitality of our first host, who persistently refuses to let the doctor set up a household of his own.

While at Para I had several conferences with the Governor of that State in relation to the problem of Indian civilisation. The Governor entered very heartily into the discussion, and drew up a message to the Legislature on the subject, recommending the foundation of Indian training schools. I am glad to say that this proposition has SINCE BECOME A LAW.

I went to Porto Nacional to meet the Lieutenant-Governor of Goyaz. Here, too, I met a most favourable reception, remaining three days as the guest of the Governor. The Government has lost all faith in the methods of the Roman Catholic friars, and stands ready to aid us if we are able to produce better results. Lieutenant-Governor Lemos urged me strongly to attend the next meeting of their Assembly, and promised his help in passing a law similar to the one adopted by the Para Legislature.

At Pedro Alfonso I unexpectedly met Mr. William A. Cook, of the Alliance Mission of New York. I invited him to join me in visiting the Indian villages, an opportunity of which he gladly availed himself. He proved quite valuable to me by reason of his better acquaintance with the corrupted jargon spoken by the illiterate Brazilians in these parts. After visiting the villages on the Rio do Somno, where we saw much shiftlessness, squalor and vice, we made a horseback journey to the Caraoh Indians, occupying three large and well-organized villages about 100 miles in the interior. I was so favorably impressed with these people, that I greatly desired to ESTABLISH A MISSION AMONG THEM.

I am hoping that we may speedily find the right people, a married couple, to undertake the work.

In the meantime another open door was shown to us. It had for some time been evident to me that mission work in the interior of Brazil cannot be successfully done in isolated spots. A central station is needed, and Carolina is without a doubt the best situated if not the only suitable place. Conferring with our oldest and most influential friend at Carolina about the best means to adopt in order to further our work, he said: "Start a school among us, and you will gain the best part of our people." Acting on the suggestion I arranged for a conference with ten of the leading business men. They all enthusiastically endorsed the plan, and assured me that we need fear no opposition from Roman Catholic fanatics, such as has lately been reported from other Brazilian fields.

I am at San Luiz de Maranham once more, enjoying the benefits of civilisation. Having my heart filled with praise, I am anxious to return at as early a date as I can, after securing necessary supplies and the proper teachers for the proposed school. I believe the latter can shortly be made self-sustaining, but to set it afoot and to secure competent teachers will require about £300. The honorary treasurer of our work is Mr. William R. Ronald, 24, Mulgrave Street, Liverpool.

Tibet.—Miss Annie R. Taylor, of Yatong, is well but weary. She is kept busy. During the first half of December she took Rs. 400. The Chinese Amban and retinue are good customers. But some of them prefer to help themselves, and a sharp lookout has to be kept. Our sister distributes large numbers of copies of the Gospels, and preaches Jesus to all comers. Some of the Chinese appear interested, and tell her they have heard of Jesus in China. They are interested in a double sense, and seek in this way to make friends in hopes of getting things cheaper. It is certainly remarkable that the opening of Yatong as a trading station for Europeans, has thus far only resulted in the missionary trader getting a footing there.—News and Notes, Persecution in Russia.

A ST. PETERSBURG newspaper has given a sad account of the continued persecution of the Stundists. In a distant village a number of Stundists and others seem to have "let their light shine," with the result that they were haled before the judicial authorities on a charge of proselytising. It was alleged that some sixty villagers had come under their influence. The persons accused were:—(1) A farm servant, who was looked upon as the leader of the entire movement; he had opened a hall for meetings of a "sectarian" character; (2) an elder of a Baptist Church; (3) an elder among the Stundists; (4) another member of the same community.

As affording proof of the charges, four parcels of forbidden books were produced, evidently intended to lead others to the Stundist way of thinking. The hearing of the charges extended over an entire day, and in the end all the accused were pronounced guilty. Three of them were sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and one to banishment to Transcaucasia. A solicitor who voluntarily took up their cases worked hard, but all in vain; indeed, in consequence of his kind interest in the defenceless, he has been laid hold of by the persecuting law, and awaits judgment. The friend who stood security for the poor brethren also finds himself burdened with a debt of 800 roubles. Seven other men have been imprisoned at Orel since May last, and will probably remain in that condition for some time. The law court at Charkow ordered them to be banished!

It would be easy to multiply stories of this sad character. Never desponding, the poor nonconforming Christians of Russia go on their way. They say the word of the Lord must be fulfilled, "If they have persecuted Me, they will persecute you also." One result of these cruelties is the impoverishment of Christian families, from the midst of whom an appeal recently came in these words: "We are in a state of all but famine. It is impossible to buy wheat; in fact, there is none to be got. Wood also is three times the usual price; so that, if God keeps us alive, we have hard times before us. We ask you to extend your hands in mercy to us, as you know of our bitter experiences, some of us having been in this condition seven or eight years."

There was a plan some years ago of a home being found for the poor Stundists as a colony under more reasonable rule. Let us pray that a way of escape may soon be open to those who are at present suffering many deprivations and afflictions for the sake of Christ.

Evangelical Institute, Pisa.

ON January 21, Miss Carruthers received an official visit from the Prefetto of Pisa at the Female Institute. He informed her that he was commissioned by the Italian Government to convey to her the expression of their esteem and of the consideration in which they held herself and her work on behalf of popular education, which, he was pleased to say, is "unique in Italy."

The Prefetto afterwards accompanied Miss Carruthers to the large hall of the Institute, in which all the various classes were ranged, the pupils present numbering about 150. The Prefetto made a graceful little speech, telling the teachers and pupils the object of his visit, referring to the friendly relations always subsisting between England and Italy, and praising the excellent discipline of the classes before him.

This public testimony on the part of the Italian Government, and the large number of pupils now attending all the schools under Miss Carruthers' care, both in town and country, are most cheering proofs of the way in which God has abundantly answered the prayers offered on behalf of this work at a time when the clerical party strained every effort to oppose it.

Lapland.—We have received from the mission committee that carries on Gospel work among Laplanders, an appeal for the help of our readers in repairing and enlarging a mission hut at Arvidsjaur. Communications may be addressed to Rev. M. T. Berlin, Arvidsjaur, Lapland, Sweden.

School for Bible Study.

THERE were large attendances at the meetings of the School for Bible Study last week. Owing to the strain of the work, Professor White has been compelled to relinquish some of his engagements; and it is particularly hoped that those who have been attending the gatherings at Hampstead, Eccleston Hall, and Aldersgate Street, will continue the course in one of the several large halls still retained.

At the meeting at King's Hall, Holborn, on Tuesday, Dr. White opened by pointing out that in both Old and New Testaments the question is raised, "How shall a man be just before God?" In the Epistle to the Romans we are taken into the forum, and enabled to consider the legal aspects of the question. In the Epistle to the Hebrews we are taken into the Temple, and brought face to face with the priestly aspects. In connection with the Hebrews, we ought specially to study the Book of Leviticus. Observe the process of thought in that Old Testament book. The first sixteen chapters deal with the question, "How may man approach God?" the section closing with a great chapter on atonement; the remainder of the book, chapter xvii. to the end, deals with the question, "How may man continue in communion with God?" These facts should be borne in mind.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

Many are taking deep interest in the question, "What would Jesus do?" In this study we ask, What has Jesus done, and what is Jesus doing? The Epistle to the Romans has afforded answers to these important questions: "Jesus Christ that died . . at the right hand of God . . maketh intercession for us." The same Epistle speaks of another Intercessor: "The Spirit . . maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. viii. 26, 27, 33, 34). The Gospel of John contributes important teaching on this subject, in the form of words by our Lord on Another Paraclete—Comforter, Advocate, Helper. The Paraclete taught the defendant how to plead, and also stood up to plead for him. "We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous." Also we have an Advocate within us—the Holy Spirit—who teaches us God's will, and enables us to pray according to the will of God.

This doctrine of intercession is much needed by the Church to-day, in order that believers may know the meaning of the present power of the Eternal God in their lives by the Holy Spirit and through Christ Jesus our Lord. Intercession is for us, with us, and in us. The Gospel knows no intercessor but Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit realising Christ's work in the believer. We need not be more than two removes from God—that is, occupying the third place—with the Father. But some have put the Virgin Mary, or saints, or other men (priests) between. Of this the Gospel knows nothing.

While intercession from without brings us into a blessed relation to God, it does not change our character; Jesus Christ by his Holy Spirit does that, enabling us to intercede for ourselves in association with Him. Christ lives eternally to pray, and our prayers blend with his. His words to the Father were: "Thou in Me; I in them."

Examining the Epistle to the Hebrews, Professor White quoted Heb. ii. 3, viii. 13, x. 32, xiii. 7, as showing that it must have been penned in the second generation of the Christian era, near the time of the destruction of the Temple, or close upon 70 A.D. Obviously, also, the Epistle was written to a company of Christian Jews, most likely living in Jerusalem, who were tempted to relapse into Judaism—first, on account of persecution (x. 33, xii. 4, 5); secondly, apparently, through delay in Christ's return, which they expected to take place soon (ix. 28, x. 35-39); and thirdly, because of the splendour of the Jewish ritual—to which in days of straitness and sorrow they were tempted to return. The object of the Epistle was to prevent the Hebrew Christians from lapsing into Judaism. The method of appeal is the one least calculated to wound those addressed. Above all, the superiority of the high priesthood of Jesus Christ, even the perfection of it, is dealt with, the Law being given by an administration of angels, the New Covenant being promulgated by the Son of God.

Examining the chapters, Professor White indicated

THE FOLLOWING FEATURES:—

Ch. i. Son of God, appointed Ruler over all, contrasted with angels; the angels being ministering spirits to carry out his will.
Ch. ii. The Seed of Abraham compared with angels. The Son of God made like unto his brethren, a little lower than the angels.
Ch. iii. Christ compared with Moses, and said to be greater.
Ch. iv. Jesus Christ and the rest He brings, being greater than Joshua and his deliverance.
Ch. v., vi., and vii. Christ compared with Aaron; He is High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. (Parenthesis from chapter v. 1 to chapter vi. 20, designed to stimulate spiritual progress.) Chapter vii. concludes with a summary of the preceding contents.
Ch. viii. "Of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum," or the chief point. "We have such a High Priest" is a crucial declaration. In this chapter and two following (ix. and x.) the writer reviews in another way what he has already written. These three are the "Tabernacle" chapters.
Ch. xi., xii., and xiii. are devoted to exhortation. There is an exhorting purpose throughout the Epistle, but here exhortation is the main object.

In human experience it has been deemed unsafe to combine religious and political power in one man; but Christ is at one and the same time

PROPHET, PRIEST, AND KING.

His is an unchangeable priesthood; He abideth faithful, and He has all power in heaven and earth. In the first four chapters of the Epistle we have a description of the Nature and Character of the High Priesthood of Christ; in the next three, the "Order"—after Melchizedek; in viii., ix., x. (to v. 18) his Ministry. The philosophy of the book is marvellous; it cannot have come from the unassisted mind of man. The priesthood of Christ is shown to be associated with fidelity, mercy, sympathy. In ch. ix. and x., more than elsewhere, it is said that He offered Himself once for all; there can be no repetition of the sacrifice. The efficiency of the New Covenant is shown by ch. viii. 10-13, whence it appears that Christian life consists, not so much in the keeping of rules, as in a loving service of God.

It is noteworthy that the writer of the Epistle never depreciates the old religion, but emphasises the superiority of the new. The is that we have an efficient, potent Saviour in Jesus Christ. John's Gospel tells us of Christ in the past; the Epistle to the Hebrews of the present living and exalted Christ; and the book of the Revelation of the coming of Christ the King. We must live under a sense of this fulness of Christ. We must not be content with a past Christ. Some contemplate Him as a babe in his mother's arms; others as a dead man nailed to a cross. Jesus was a babe, and He once hung on the cross; but these experiences belong to the past. He has been exalted to the right hand of God, a Prince and a Saviour. We have a Great High Priest who is "able to save completely them that draw near unto God through Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them."

At Mildmay, on Thursday, attention was directed to the relation of Nineveh to Israel, by a study of the writings of two prophets dealing especially with that great empire. At the outset it was pointed out that, although the Bible is a Jewish book, yet it deals with Israel's relations to the ancient world at large. This brings in the nations of the earth, and when the fate of Nineveh is considered, the books of are at once suggested. The former prophet lived in the early period of Assyrian ascendancy, the latter in the declining days. Jonah denounced judgment against Nineveh; but on repenting of their sins the people were spared. The reformation was only temporary, however; Nineveh became a scourge to Israel, and her doom was sealed.

An examination of the history of Israel supports the view that the book of Jonah records facts. God sent the prophet with a message to the Ninevites, but he did not wish to go. God's desire was to bring the people to repentance; the prophet would have preferred their destruction, as they were not only heathen but oppressors of Israel. When at length he was compelled to deliver his message, he was angry at the repentance of the people and the display of God's mercy. The moral of the story is against the Jewish people, with their prejudices and narrowness; therefore it is inconceivable that the incident was "made up." For a hundred and fifty years God maintained his patience with the Ninevites, and when Nahum wrote, the situation had changed and judgment was irrevocably announced. Our Lord, in allusion to his own resurrection, spoke of "the sign of Jonah," who was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish. The preaching of a man who had undergone such an experience might well be effective in Nineveh, for the prophet would stand forth as one delivered by his God, Jehovah, from the power of the Fish-god, whom the people of the city worshipped.

THE PROPHECY OF NAHUM

falls into a three-fold outline: Chap. i., judgment declared; ii., judgment described; iii., judgment concluded. All the prophets looked forward to the deliverance of Israel, and the impending destruction of Nineveh would be welcome as affecting the fate of a nation inimical to the Kingdom of God. Hence the prophecy of Nahum was more to the mind of the Israelite than was that of Jonah.

Dr. White read the brief book through in a translation slightly paraphrastic in character. The audience followed with evident interest. It was impossible not to observe the wisdom of the opening passage, dealing with the character of God, his mercy and severity, his jealousy and power. Passing on, the Elkoshite depicts the conflict between the Ninevites and the Lord of Hosts. He mentions the victories of Jehovah in other contests, and closes by foretelling the utter downfall and humiliation of the city and its inhabitants as a judgment for unrepented sin.

Other nations have in a like manner reaped the wages of sin; and if those who cannot do more would only face the facts of history with the conviction that there is "a power making for righteousness," they would be in a position to learn much of God and his ways, and at last come to a knowledge of Him as revealed in Jesus Christ.

Texts in Cars and Omnibuses.

AN unpretentious and quiet mission effort has been sustained for some fifteen years past in the placing of Scripture texts in conspicuous places inside London tram-cars and omnibuses. These texts are in the form of glacier transparencies, and a number have been placed in tram-cars on different London routes. Little has been accomplished as yet with omnibuses. There are over 2,000 cars and 'buses plying in London still unsupplied with these silent but powerful messengers of God to the human heart.

It is stated that a better class of transparencies than those hitherto used will be necessary, so as to secure a longer term of usefulness for them. It will be seen, therefore, that there is much scope for the generous co-operation of the Christian public in this endeavour to arrest the attention of travellers, and direct their thoughts to the life eternal. A new worker, Miss G. L. Baily, has provisionally undertaken the secretarial work of the Car and Omnibus Text Mission, and it is hoped that her services may be retained. The treasurer of the mission is Mr. L. Newbery, 1, King Edward Street, London, E.C.

The Morton Bequest.—The following notice has been received from the Moravian Mission Board in Berthelsdorf regarding the Morton bequest:—"The trustees of the Morton bequest have paid £16,406 5s. as the first instalment for our missions. By the provisions of the will, this is only available for the forming of new out-stations in missions selected by the trustees, and for paying additional workers at such stations. On the basis of proposals requested from us, the trustees have decided that the above-named sum shall commence the following enterprises:—Port Elizabeth, South Africa; Cape Gracias a Dios, Nicaragua; new church in Paramaribo, Surinam; Rigolet, Labrador. These will be commenced as soon as possible in each case. This bequest is not available for the large deficiency on the general fund, or for the maintenance of existing work. The financial crisis of the missions is not relieved in anywise by this gift."

A Y.M.C.A. Organiser.

M. CHARLES FERMAUD.

DURING upwards of twenty years the name of Charles Fermaud has been intimately associated with Y.M.C.A. work on the Continent of Europe, and though Switzerland has been the home and centre of his exertions, the wide world has been the actual sphere of his influence. As general secretary of the Central International Committee, with offices in Geneva, he conducts operations which practically federate the associations in many lands, with the praiseworthy object of advancing a movement which from the first has been greatly blessed of God.

M. Fermaud was born in Geneva in 1855, and reared in a Christian atmosphere. His father was an elder of the church which he attended. Charles was the eldest of a family of nine, and being only fifteen when his father died, he found himself, while yet young, occupying a responsible position in the home. His education was well cared for, and after taking his B.A. degree he travelled for a year in Germany, and a similar period in England, learning the languages thoroughly, and profiting by extended studies. Returning to Geneva, he entered a bank, finding occupation at once congenial and promising, from a worldly point of view.

This brings us to 1875, when Geneva was already a favoured continental centre as regards Y.M.C.A. work. In company with a friend, young Fermaud attended an evening meeting of the Association, and a very favourable impression was made by the visit. The warmth of the friendship which prevailed, and the sympathy which bound the members together, pleased M. Fermaud greatly. Moreover, his heart was touched by the harmony of thought and action exhibited by the members, and the cordial reception extended to him, an outsider at the time. He noted also with pleasure that besides such young men as he was accustomed to meet in daily life, there was a small group animated by a Christian spirit, manly and sincere, who were united in the conflict against sin in all its forms and manifestations.

These things appealed to the heart and imagination of the young man, who at once determined to "go again." Repeated visits resulted in the creation of friendships and relations quite after his own heart; and many who were then to the fore in Association matters in Geneva have since sustained positions of honour and responsibility in the larger world of religious, social, and political duty. The warmth of the Association fostered spiritual progress, and at length he fully realised that he had become a new creation in Christ Jesus, "born again"—"saved to serve."

Such hours of leisure as M. Fermaud could command were now put in at the Y.M.C.A., and in due course the earnest working member was appointed on the committee and made president of the Geneva Association. Meanwhile, kind friends had encouraged him in endeavours on the truly catholic lines of the Association, especially his mother and sisters, also his much-beloved grandfather, the well-known pastor, Charles Cordes-Hentsch, whose life was cheerfully given up to the service of the Kingdom of God.

While M. Fermaud was thus engaged, as it were "in the thick of the battle," the call came to prepare for the eighth World's Convention of the Y.M.C.A. which the Association at Geneva had invited to meet in that city in August, 1878. In recognition of his great sacrifices and unwearied exertions in behalf of this important gathering, M. Fermaud had the honour of being unanimously elected official president of the Convention. His knowledge of several languages enabled him to fill the post in a way that would not otherwise have been possible, and the proceedings were a success in every sense of the word. One of the decisions of the Convention was epoch-making in its bearing upon the future of the esteemed president—it was resolved to form a Central International Committee for the entire world. The same committee as had arranged the Convention was charged with the organisation of this movement.

Foundations having been firmly laid, it was of the utmost importance that this undertaking should be well officered, and quite naturally M. Fermaud was asked to take the secretaryship. As he had risen to the position of head cashier in a large banking house, this meant the renunciation of what was considered a brilliant future. Not long, however, did the dilemma distress his mind; three months later he unhesitatingly accepted the call to devote his life to Christian work, and with the close of the year 1878 entered upon his new office. He gave up much; but he assuredly took in hand a singularly influential piece of work from a Christian and social point of view.

Since then M. Fermaud has devoted himself unremittingly and without stint to the great Y.M.C.A. movement. He has learned fresh languages in order to be able to perform a wider service by means of correspondence and in addressing public meetings. In addition to labour of a more routine character, he has visited the United States, and studied operations on the forward lines which there find favour and issue in steady and substantial progress. During recent years he has given much attention to the bureau of the Central organisation, in which all the international records and important documents have been filed for reference. Despite the many difficulties attending its work, the Central International Committee has gained universal sympathy; and at the World's Conference held at Basle in July last, 800 delegates were in attendance.

When M. Fermaud, twenty years ago, undertook the work of secretary, he was the first and only salaried Y.M.C.A. secretary on the European continent; now there are about a hundred Continental secretaries doing work of great value. In 1878 no association in Europe would have dreamt of possessing its own buildings, but now over a hundred associations have their own houses, which sometimes, as in the case of Geneva, are among the most beautiful structures in the towns where they are situate.

Like all Swiss citizens, M. Fermaud has been called upon to fulfil military duties, and serve two or three weeks in each year under the flag of the federal army. Thanks to personal ability in the service, he has risen to the rank of a major in the general staff. This military position has often been of good service to him in accomplishing work in different countries; it has opened doors that otherwise would have been shut.

Sincere and earnest men, capable as well as warm-hearted, are ever wanted in the service of God; and we cannot wish a better thing for the Y.M.C.A. than that it should have many organisers and counsellors as intelligent and devoted as the subject of this brief sketch.

Seeking Great Things.

THERE are souls among us to-day whose lives, if we could but see them, would cause the popular names so often upon our lips to fall from them much less frequently. The God-filled men and women, hidden away in obscure and quiet places of the earth, in the teeming life of cities, as much as in the rural life of villages, are the strength and glory of a nation's life. They are the healthy sap, protecting and invigorating life. For the most part, perhaps, they are well content with their humble and unassuming positions, but among the younger hearts, at any rate, there is often a fierce struggle, in whatsoever state they be therein to be content.

Take an instance. Here is a young man handicapped by a low position in life. Look at him to-night pacing his room, thinking—what? "Here I am in this wrestle with life; day by day I have the most ordinary, commonplace duties to do. There are very few pleasures I can afford; and yet if only I had the opportunity—if only I had more scope—I know I could do something in the world! I could make my mark; I could be a benefit to my race! Instead of that, I am tied down—circumvented in every way from doing anything!" He sat down, with a pathetic yearning on the face. Oh, that we could sit down quietly sometimes and let the Spirit of God play upon our hearts!

Then better thoughts came to him. Who had put him in this place of obscurity and apparent disablement? God! Then it was God's will for him to be at present in a dark place? Yes, God's will. Blessed is he that doeth the will of God. Oh, that blessed voice speaking tenderly to his heart! "This is not the only life; there is one beyond where there are no hindrances, but full and ample scope for all the powers of the soul." What were his heart's thoughts now? "Give what Thou commandest, then command what Thou wilt. I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for Thou alone makest me to dwell in safety." Yes, safety not only of the body, but of mind and heart. That young soul tasted of perfect peace in the boundless ocean of God's love, God's will, and God's might. And so may we all!

"E'en the hour that darkest seemeth,
Will his changeless goodness prove;
From the gloom his brightness streameth,
God is wisdom, God is love."

Home Missions.

Homes of Hope.

FRONTING the green patch of a London square, where a few solitary trees seem to foregather as kindred exiles in a foreign land of bricks and mortar, stand the Homes of Hope. They are not labelled, nor in any way made to differ in outward appearance from other and ordinary dwellings, but even a rapid inspection of the bright, cheerful, and spotless interiors reveals a very satisfactory view of one of the most useful philanthropic works in the metropolis.

The benevolent operations of the Homes, observes Mr. Hornibrook, the kindly secretary, are primarily directed towards saving the more respectable and hopeful class of young women, who, through distressing and untoward circumstances, are found among the fallen ones of our great city. Fallen, doubtless they are, but from the fact that in numerous instances the young women and girls specially alluded to belong to respectable families, they are naturally more anxious to and to regain a satisfactory standing in socicty. Such young women form an entirely different class from those who have, for any length of time, pursued a career of open shame. The capacious premises accommodate between fifty and sixty inmates at a time, a considerable portion being reserved for maternity cases—perhaps the most terribly sad of all that command the aid of rescue workers. These cases constitute a solemn record that, in spite of all that legal action has done to hinder, the grim tragedy of woman's love and man's infamy is still played day by day, and the roll of betrayed ones is ever swelling.

At the same time, the villainous men concerned in these cases are not easily allowed to go financially free. True, they hide, disguise themselves, assume different names, or but in many cases they are brought to book. A great deal of labour and expense is necessarily involved, but by the aid of police court process and business-like magistrates, much is accomplished.

The oversight given to the nurse children is highly interesting. Each little one has to be brought in once a week for medical and other inspection, so that the mothers have the satisfaction of knowing that all is well.

The success of the homely lines on which the work is conducted, and the sound training given to prepare the inmates for domestic service, doubtless accounts for the demand for servants from these Homes. Many applications are perforce refused, for "we cannot recommend any until we can

SPEAK WITH CONFIDENCE.

Otherwise they would do harm in their situations and mar our reputation."

Any question as to the lasting character of the work is sufficiently answered by the letters, breathing gratitude and affection, which are frequently received. A well-dressed woman walked into Mr. Hornibrook's office the other day, being interested in a young girl who was in difficulty, and revealed the interesting fact that she had herself been an inmate eighteen years previously. The secretary, walking through a market place, paused to make a purchase and the seller whispered, "Do you remember me? I'm So and So." In many different ways the good fruit is abundantly manifested, but one of the most interesting communications in this connection was a sheet of paper inscribed with the one word and enclosing a couple of bank notes.

Such tokens of gratitude are not frequent, for the average servant girl can scarcely be said to enjoy a large income. Nevertheless, she does what she can. The British public ought to do the rest. A pathetic interest attaches to the venerable and industrious secretary, after thirty-eight years of toil, wondering whence the money is coming to pay the baker's bill! The need for help is urgent. Communications for Mr. Hornibrook should be addressed 4, 5, and 6, Regent Square, Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

Preventive Work in London.

PITEOUS indeed are the life stories of many of the young women and girls in the National Vigilance Association's Preventive Home at Hackney, yet had it not been for the shelter afforded by the Home in the time of extremity, those stories had been more dreadful still.

A chief part of the Association's work, that in which Mrs. Josephine Butler and other esteemed toilers have taken so keen an interest, lies in grappling with those who, making their headquarters in London or some continental city, are continually endeavouring to ensnare girls of attractive appearance, and establish an international white slave trade. Hence, in many cases, girls are saved "just in time" from a future the horror of which can scarcely be too darkly pictured. They find refuge in the Preventive Home.

Many girls, too, have been received from abodes of shame, or from homes of squalor and degradation, where families herd together in defiance of the commonest decency. Others come from workhouses, saved from developing into confirmed paupers, to be trained for domestic service, while some have been rendered homeless by acts of rashness or frivolity. On subsequently realising the horror of stranding, friendless and penniless, on the streets, they have been glad to enter the wide-open door.

In a quiet, unassuming way, a sound work has been in progress for some years. Rescued from positions of imminent danger and actual distress, the inmates, a number of whom are motherless and quite young, have been provided with employment and directed into paths of purity and usefulness. The bright faces of the girls in the Home are a powerful testimony to the cheery and helpful influences of this haven of hope, and it is satisfactory to know that many young women in life look to the institution as the place where they were not only benefited morally and socially, but where they also learned to know the love and power of the Saviour.

Every effort is made, especially by means of a laundry, to render the home self-supporting, but there is just now a special need. The premises urgently require complete renovation, and it is felt that friends of the purity cause only need to be made acquainted with the facts, and they will readily provide the necessary financial aid.

Mrs. Annie E. Harding, whose name is known in connection with rescue work in Piccadilly, has undertaken the practical oversight, and will be glad to hear from ministers and friends interested, who would be willing to arrange for chapel or drawing-room meetings. Communications on the subject, and also gifts of cast-off clothing and orders for laundry work, may be addressed to 1, Urswick Road, Hackney, N.E.

Work Among Theatrical Employées.

AT the invitation of Mr. William Forbes, a large number of ladies connected with the theatrical profession gathered to tea on Wednesday last week in the Lecture Hall of Bloomsbury Chapel.

Subsequently, a pleasant unconventional meeting was held, necessarily brief on account of the nature of the guests' employment calling them away early, but characterised by a cheery and appreciative spirit. Mr. Forbes' daughters sang the Gospel, and Sister Margaret, of the mission in connection with Bloomsbury, and other friends gave earnest addresses.

During the proceedings allusion was made to the fact that Mr. Forbes has been conducting social and evangelistic work amongst members of the dancing and chorus departments of the dramatic profession for twenty-one years, and in celebration of the anniversary a lady from one of the theatres read some graceful verses of her own composition.

Mr. Forbes, in a few kindly words, expressed his satisfaction at being able to bring before his hearers the great message of God's love and a free salvation. He alluded to the difficult and trying circumstances under which many of them laboured, but besought them, in spite of all, to "seek the Lord while He may be found." At the close there was a distribution, on behalf of the Bible Flower Mission, of prettily-made pincushions, each accompanied by a verse of Scripture; while Sister Margaret also gave away illuminated texts.

Mr. Forbes proposes to continue the series of meetings; and friends willing to assist may address him at 71, Tollington Road, N.

London Temperance Council.

THE fourth anniversary festival of this federation of 290 temperance societies was held on Monday night in the Queen's Hall, the Archbishop of Canterbury presiding.

Mr. C. PINHORN presented the annual report, from which it appeared that divisional councils had been formed in forty Parliamentary divisions of the metropolis.

The ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY remarked that the gathering was an indication that they were determined to seek the results that followed great united efforts. They were not to be troubled by divisions of opinion as to what step should be taken first; they would insist on what step was most likely to succeed at each successive moment. Whatever his own opinion might be as to the most expedient step, he was ready to take the course that would obtain the most general adhesion. Sunday closing was an admirable beginning for a great movement forward, and he was ready to do all he could to push it in the Legislature without delay. By united effort he believed that they could very soon make it impossible for the Legislature to turn a deaf ear to this demand; and he believed there were other legislative measures that could be successfully promoted. At the same time he would not have any legislative measures so occupy their minds that they would think the ordinary work of every temperance organisation any less necessary. Every individual should use personal influence to make men generally understand how important this question was to the country and still more to Christianity.

VISCOUNT MORPETH moved a resolution calling on temperance societies and individual citizens to give the Council every possible support, in view of the urgent need for greater concentrated effort to overcome the enormous influence of the drink traffic. This was seconded by Lady Elizabeth Biddulph, supported by Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, and carried. Dr. Newman Hall moved a resolution calling on the Government to give facilities for the passing of a Sunday Closing law, in view of the injustice inflicted on public-house employés by Sunday opening, and of the fact that the Sunday sale of intoxicating liquors tended to destroy the sanctity of the day of rest, and degrade the character of the people. Mr. A. F. Hills seconded the resolution, which was adopted.

"Wealthland and Woeland."

GLASGOW AND ITS SPIRITUAL NEEDS.

THE "masses" of Glasgow, as of all our great cities, are ever a problem difficult of solution, but though sometimes cast down, the workers among them are not in despair. With the all-powerful influences of the Gospel on their side, they are able continually to thank God and take courage.

For a quarter of a century the spiritual condition of those who habitually neglect the house of God has been the special concern of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association. Founded as the outcome of the labours of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in that city during 1874, it celebrated its semi-jubilee on Monday last by an all-day convention, at which to survey the work in its past and present aspects. Nor was its future overlooked; a continually moving force such as this cannot rest with the results hitherto achieved; the Spirit of God within and behind, urges it forward to still greater things than those already seen.

In spite of its cheering record the retrospect is not without a tinge of sadness, as we recall the devoted men who have upheld the work in days that are gone—Dr. Somerville, James Scott, Alexander Allan, and others are names to which many tender memories gratefully cling; but their works remain while they themselves rest from their labours; they are "remembered by what they have done."

The morning session, over which Lord Overtoun presided, was devoted to a cursory view of the inception and development of the association. With becoming recognition of the Divine blessing that has marked the work, the Chairman emphasised the fact that it is not an organisation outside the churches, but pre-eminently within their bounds. All its directors are communicants and office-bearers, and it is a qualification required of all workers that they be members of some branch of the Church of Christ and in attendance at the Lord's house at least once every Sabbath day. This secures and effort is inaugurated and carried out which under other circumstances would be impossible. The Chairman referred to the labours of Dr. Somerville and Mr. McNeill in various parts of the globe, as well as to the going forth of missionaries, as showing the catholic activities and far-reaching spiritual results of which the Association is justly thankful and proud. But in face of all success and encouragement, he said, we need God as much as ever—to ask his guidance and to hear his call.

Treating, as the first speaker, "The twenty-five years' work of the Association," Mr. J. R. Miller (who pathetically referred to himself as "one of those who survive") detailed the circumstances under which Messrs. Moody and Sankey were approached to hold their mission in Glasgow in 1874. The invitation came from a joint committee, chiefly of ministers, who had heard of the work of God in Newcastle and Edinburgh at the hands of the Evangelists. Cordially given, it was with equal cordiality accepted. It causes a smile to-day to hear of the doubts felt by that committee as to how far the popular Gospel hymns, the solo-singing (and, worse still, the American organ!) would be tolerated. But the capitulation of Edinburgh before these innovations removed the last misgiving, and by the time the mission began, a voluntary choir had already equipped itself to lead the service of song, an arduous task, which up to that time had devolved upon Mr. Sankey alone. Then began to rise that wondrous wave of blessing upon which so much of the spiritual effort in the city to-day floated into existence, sustained by the then established "noon prayer meeting" which Mr. Moody declared in every place to be

"THE BACKBONE OF HIS WORK."

But great as was the need then, it is even greater to-day. "We are rapidly becoming a most ungodly nation," said the speaker, as he referred to the increasing neglect of religious observance so sadly obvious amongst us. Now as then there is among Christians a felt need of revival, and he pleaded with the audience to set apart a portion of one evening each week for definite prayer that the Lord's hand may again be seen in power "beginning with ourselves."

The consolidation of effort after the special mission had closed, was next dealt with by Mr. J. W. Arthur, who enumerated some of the directions in which the zeal of the converts found outlet—young men in Y.M.C.A., young women in Y.W.C.A., and all in general evangelistic work. Wisely electing primarily to strengthen the hands of existing agencies, they still found open doors of service. Tent work on Glasgow Green originated the present Tent Hall; out of a small effort to gather in the outcast, arose the Sunday Free Breakfast; and so on, until in 1876 the "United Committee" expanded into the present "United Evangelistic Association," with Mr. Alexander Allan as its first president, and Mr. James Scott its first secretary—both since called home to their reward.

From the first, "loyalty to the old Book and its truths concerning sin and salvation" has been the foundation-stone on which all the superstructure rests; and subsequent missions held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey (1882), Rev. E. P. Hammond, Dr. Pentecost, Major Whittle, Rev. John McNeill, &c., have each and all contributed their share to the strengthening and expansion of this aggressive movement to win the masses for Christ. Later developments were the Mizpah Band (now with eight branches for the rescue of men cursed with the deadly drink habit), Jewish work, and the Bible Training Institute, now containing sixty-one men and fifteen women studying the Word of God and

METHODS OF PRACTICAL SERVICE.

Preparation, Amelioration, and Evangelisation are three of the headings under which the purposes of the Association are classified. Under the second come varied agencies for the physical benefit of those in need, among whom the children figure largely. This last aspect of the work fell to the lot of Mr. Alex. Mackeith to deal with, and very touchingly he pleaded their cause. In 1871 evangelistic services were held with much encouragement, until it was found that children of the "better class" began to crowd out the poorest, for whom the meetings were specially designed. Recourse was had to the expedient of supplying each child with a cup of soup, which answered the double purpose of attracting the poor and discouraging those who were better off. Mr. Mackeith's experience is itself an encouragement, for he has found quite an eagerness on the part of the young to hear the message of the Gospel. Of course, it is presented in an attractive way—being freely used.

BLACKBOARD, LANTERN, AND OBJECT LESSONS

Out of these gatherings arose a further necessity—that of visiting the little ones in their so-called "homes"—miserable dens of squalor and immorality, many of them—and of this added movement Mr. Quarrier's Homes are an outcome. More difficult is the task of influencing young people just grown out of childhood. The incipient desire for freedom, the impatience of all restraint, the desire to "see life," militate strongly against more holy influences; but if this work has seemed less productive than some, it has at any rate served to stimulate the helpers to more strenuous and prayerful endeavour to reach the children before they attain to the more dangerous age.

The "Amelioration" department embraces Sabbath Free Breakfast, Children's Dinner, Children's Day Refuges and Homes, Days and "Fortnights" of Fresh Air to women and children—all of which have a direct spiritual purpose underlying them. A pleasing feature of all this is the kindly recognition the work of the Association receives from the magistrates and officials of the Corporation; and very justly so, for as one speaker put it, "the conversion of a man solves many social problems in his case. Mr. James Nicol, the City Chamberlain, sketched "the last twenty-five years' growth of the city," showing an increase during that period from a population of 615,000 to 882,000. He detailed various improvements in the way of open spaces, better dwellings, &c., and spoke most sympathetically of the labours of those who endeavour to reach the souls of men.

Following him came Ex-Bailie Chisholm with a very stirring address upon "The Needs of the City," which he portrayed in vivid colours. We hope to give some of his remarks more fully in a succeeding issue.

The Afternoon Session

had two subjects to consider, (1) "Present-Day Hindrances to the Gospel, and How to Overcome them;" and (2) "How to Grapple with the City's Need." Rev. David Macintyre (Finnieston F.C.) opened the first, suggesting moral laxity and religious indifference as the causes to which various other ills were traceable. As to overcoming them, he maintained with great force and firmness that faith can conquer all obstacles. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye should say to this mountain, Be thou removed."

Next followed two short speeches from Revs. R. Campbell and C. Robson which may be summarised thus:—Hindrances from within the Church—(1) Ourselves: a low level of Christian life; (2) the state of uncertainty engendered through the Higher Criticism; (3) preaching that is not the Gospel, that does not set forth Jesus Christ as Saviour nor the claims of God upon men. How few preach as if they realised they were preaching to perishing men! From without—drink and Sabbath profanation; the degradation in which some of the people live, rendering it so hard for them to cut themselves off from evil habits and associations; the abnormal love of pleasure and undue absorption in sport. Mr. Campbell urged more method in evangelisation, to avoid overlapping, laying down three principles: (a) Let no section of the city remain unreached. (b) Let no two denominations occupy the same district. (c) Bring the living souls in the churches to those that are without. Visit the homes, as well as preach at street corners. Many children know nothing of home life. It is as if they said, "Day schools, night schools, Sunday schools we know, but

HOME SCHOOLS, WHAT ARE THEY?"

A reasonable and needed appeal came from Mr. Robson, that people should give ministers more time for prayer and meditation of the Word of God instead of calling them hither and thither, and imposing upon them numerous little duties which ought to be done by themselves or other people. He urged, further, that the Church is suffering from the results of its discouragement of the conversion of children; and that working-men made a complaint, only too well founded, that the churches did not welcome or provide for them.

The second subject, "How to grapple with the city's need," was opened by Dr. Marshall Lang, who claimed equal consideration for all classes "whether residing in terrace or slum,

IN WEALTHLAND OR WOELAND."

He was thankful for everything done to better the social condition of the poor, bearing in mind that whatever is not against Christ is for Him. But the true centre of all regenerating, helping, saving effort is the Gospel of Christ. All work minus that, is like an engine minus motive power. As a woman once said to a preacher of social reform, "Your rope's not long enough to reach the likes o' we!" The speaker strenuously denied the taunt that Christians care only for the souls and neglect the bodies of men, the varied agencies of this Association being sufficient refutation of so false a statement.

Rev. Dr. Wells argued the necessity of Christians knowing at first hand the needs. "The fuel to feed home mission zeal is facts." Next, ascertain the causes. He believed that all the physical evils from which the poor suffer arise from a low moral condition, the moral being similarly traceable to the spiritual. He welcomed all alleviation, but even they fall short of the remedy, which is found in the Gospel. He dwelt, too, on the appropriateness of the word, "grappling"—the contact of man with man, which is just what is needed.

Rev. E. Last made some good points. As of old, disciples are apt to say, "Send them away." No, said Christ, bring to Me the provisions you have. So must workers bring their talents and methods to Him for blessing, else will their use be greatly lessened. Again, when the Syrophenician woman came, they said "Send her away!" Once more, the Master said, "No, bring her to Me." So, too, let us bring sinners individually to Him, that He may do what we cannot do in their salvation. The speaker lamented the and the falling away of so many young men from all interest in religious life; concluding a forcible address with the plea: "We want not only leaders but followers, men who will keep rank; and who, while coming in contact with men, will not lose their hold upon God."

This led up very suitably to a characteristic address from Rev. John McNeill. We read of a promise God made to Israel in these terms: "The fear of you and the dread of you shall fall on all the countries round about." Where is that gone? he asked. How far short does that come in the experience of many ministers and workers! We are too apologetic. God says: "Lift up your voice with strength; be not afraid," while many of us allow ourselves to be gagged and muzzled by the enemy, and ask "to be kindly allowed to make a few tentative suggestions!" This should not be our attitude. Rather let us speak up, speak out, speak on for God and for his Christ; remembering the injunction to Isaiah, "Say to the cities (the cities) of Judah, Behold your God." Let your God loom large in your confidence and your work. It will be a great blessing when people get a clearer view of God. "The nations shall become as a drop in a bucket." That cuts down national, international and denominational pride. "They shall be counted as the small dust of the balance." We have to do with One who can do without us, "who taketh up the isles as a very little thing."

Mr. McNeill proceeded to draw some eminently practical lessons in his own inimitable way from the taking of Jericho, as illustrating the necessity of human strength coming to an end of itself to let God work. The men of Israel felt their weakness and then their faith and valour rose. As preachers and workers, we should be more desperate men, showing the world we are in deadly earnest in "grappling and thrappling" with the forces of sin around us.

In the evening a crowded meeting in St. Andrew's Hall was addressed by Lord Overtoun, Rev. George Gladstone, and Rev. John McNeill; we hope to give a report in our next issue.

Edinburgh Students.

THERE is at present a real spiritual movement among the students of Edinburgh University. Throughout the session there has been a growing spirit of prayer among the Christian men, and several have been led to Christ. Last Sunday week a wonderful meeting was held, at which Mr. John R. Mott was the speaker. An audience of 2,000, of which 1,800 must have been students, gathered in the McEwan Hall. This hall was presented to the University quite recently, and this was the first religious meeting held within its walls. Principal Sir William Muir presided, and many professors and lecturers accompanied him to the platform.

Mr. Mott spoke on student temptations, and the impression made was profound. Over 350 men remained to an after-meeting, and at least forty, by standing up, signified their intention to accept Christ as Saviour and Lord. During the succeeding twenty-four hours Mr. Mott had over forty personal interviews with men who went voluntarily to see him.

This movement has created a great stir throughout the University, and prayer is earnestly asked that from this beginning it may go on from strength to strength.

Scottish "Monthly Visitor" Tract Society.

THE sixty-sixth annual meeting of this Society was held in the Y.M.C.A. Rooms, Edinburgh, on Feb. 14. There was a very large attendance. Mr. Robert Wilson, who presided, urged on distributors the value of prayer and the duty of availing themselves of every opportunity of speaking to people about salvation.

Mr. R. Henderson Smith, Secretary, stated that 5,040,403 tracts had been issued during the year, being an aggregate increase over 1897 of 136,008. The "Monthly Visitor" is finding favour among the Societies of Christian Endeavour.

Rev. W. G. Donaldson, Leith, Rev. R. L. Jeffray and Rev. T. S. Dickson, Edinburgh, spoke. Mr. Donaldson expressed his conviction that non-churchgoing was quite as common among the upper classes as among the artisan and poorer classes.

Oxford Letter.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AS you stated last week, over four-hundred men were present at Canon Christopher's Missionary Breakfast on Saturday week. The annual meeting was held on Monday evening, when the President of Trinity was in the chair, and Rev. H. E. Fox and Rev. H. D. Williamson, for 14 years missionary to the Gonds, were the speakers. The gatherings were marked by a deep solemnity and a high spiritual tone.

The Free Churches are in the midst of a general mission, having engaged the Town Hall for ten days. Rev. Thos. Cook conducts the meetings. We record with thankfulness the evident tokens of God's hand with his servant. Besides the usual meeting every evening, Mr. Cook has special gatherings in the afternoon for Christians. There are not wanting signs of a revival in Oxford.

It is sometimes said that the fundamentals of the Gospel cannot be made interesting. We wish such objectors could have heard Mr. Fox's sermon in St. Aldate's on Sunday evening. Taking as his text the words "The Gospel . . . which is the power of God," he expounded, in a simple but striking manner, the salient points of that Gospel, unfolding the doctrine of justification by faith in a manner at once interesting and searching.

Letters to the Editor.

The Bishops and the Bible.

SIR,—Many doubtless like myself in reading their morning paper, which contained the speeches of the Primate and the bishops in the House of Lords on the Church question, felt regret that the Word of God was not once mentioned as the rule of faith. I do not wish to rob the Prayer Book of any of the reverence it deserves, but I do feel that at the present time it is so important that in all things connected with religion the Bible should have the pre-eminence.

The Articles of the National Church should commend themselves to Christians generally, but if we are successfully to "contend for the faith once delivered to the saints," we must fight with the "sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God."—Yours truly,

J. H. Kelleway.

Fairleigh, St. Albans.

"Are We Right?"

Sir,—The "Serious Missionary Question" propounded by Mr. Horsburgh, is one which must at one time or another have claimed the attention of most missionaries, and of a large majority of those engaged in the administration of foreign missions. Seeing that this has been brought forward by one who has done such splendid service to the cause of the evangelisation of the world as Mr. Horsburgh, there is special reason for our consideration of it at the present time.

I venture, therefore, to contribute a few comments upon the subject of this article, as one who has had some experience of the difficulties raised, both as a missionary and as a member of committee of one of our great missionary societies.

Let me say, in the first place, that we are not satisfied with things as they are. We deplore beyond expression the reproduction of denominational differences in the mission field; but before attempting to deal with this, we have a preliminary difficulty—viz., our denominational differences at home.

But some answer must be given to this question, and for the sake of the readers of The Christian, who cannot all be familiar with the inner working of our great missionary societies, it may be stated that this serious question is continually being faced.

The term, "the comity of missions," so well known in certain circles, defines the policy of the Evangelical Missionary Societies. By this principle it is sought that each denomination should work in a separate sphere. Thus we have in West Africa the Wesleyans on the Gold Coast, the Church Missionary Society on the Niger, the Baptists on the Congo; a tacit agreement existing between the different missionary bodies not to compete with one another, whilst at the same time, where it is possible, conferences are held between members of different missions.

Nor has this been arranged only by different missionary societies, but so practical a missionary as Mr. Hudson Taylor finds it the best plan to put together missionaries of similar religious convictions to work in separate districts. Unfortunately this principle cannot always be carried out, and some of the more recently formed missionary movements entirely ignore it. Should we not direct our aim towards the better carrying out of this plan? We shall not get uniformity in this world, but we may have unity. Let us seek for this.

The question of the growth and development of a native church is one of the most serious that can occupy those engaged in the work of Christian missions. It is continually being considered by the committee of the Church Missionary Society, and doubtless by other mission boards. Any suggestions of a practical nature towards the better understanding of this problem will always be welcome.—Yours, &c.,

Charles F. Harford-Battersby.

Dr. Barnardo's Homes dealt with no fewer than 13,126 children last year; of these 2,406 were new cases. It is becoming a matter of increasing concern how to feed this "great army."

About Books.

For purposes of presentation, The Master's Blesseds, by Dr. J. R. Miller, is an ideal book. (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) The mere externals indicate this, but the contents are as choice as the get-up is chaste. As the title suggests, this volume is a study of the Beatitudes, singularly devotional in tone.

Books of suggested topics and outlines for teachers and preachers are legion. A really admirable compilation in this line is Thoughts on the Word for Christian Workers, by H. Epworth Thompson. (2s. 6d. Marshall Brothers.) Here are points for many addresses, and several useful series dealing with significant words and phrases. Workers who consult this book will not be disappointed.

Rabbi Saunderson, by Ian Maclaren. (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton). Here we have another delightful peep into the famous region of Drumtochty. The principal character is an ecclesiastic of the older school, and round him are grouped other "Kailyard" worthies, including some with whom Dr. Watson's previous books have made us familiar. The illustrations by A. S. Boyd are worthy of the text.

The sermons of Rev. J. Gregory Mantle are always thoughtful and stimulating; and According to the Pattern, in which he deals with Christians ideals, is in every way good and helpful. (2s. 6d. Marshall Brothers.) Twelve in number, these discourses deal with subjects vital to life and godliness; and being rich in illustrative material they will be welcomed by ministers and others in search of suggestive teaching.

God-given Names is the title of a booklet containing poems by E. R. V., reprinted from "Trusting and Toiling," on six Scripture names—Jesus (Matt. i. 21), Israel (Isa. xliii. 1) the Land (Isa. lxii. 4, 5), the City (Ezek. xlviii. 35), the Gates (Rev. xxi. 12), and the Name that shall remain (Isa. lxvi. 22). For Scriptural substance and spiritual tone these poems are gems. (1s. Mildmay Mission to the Jews' Bookroom, Philpot Street, E.)

Anything from the pen of Rev. Thomas Champness is assured of a hearty reception by Christians sharing his warm evangelistic spirit. Broken Bread from an Evangelist's Wallet (1s. 6d.) is a book of readings, varied in length, but always substantial and good. There is not a dull page in the book; and it is hardly surprising that it should, in a very short time, have passed into its second edition. Those who preach and teach will find much that is helpful in this volume.

Professor Zahn, of Erlangen, is a theologian who deservedly commands the highest confidence. Though not writing in a controversial spirit, he has made an important contribution to a great problem in The Apostles' Creed: A Sketch of its History and an Examination of its Contents, translated by C. S. Burn and A. E. Burn, B.D., rector of Kynnersley, and examining chaplain to the Bishop of Lichfield. The historical notes on the symbol are comprehensive and thoughtful, while the examination of the articles in particular is conducted with great care and profound insight. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

Messrs. Cassell are doing a great service to general culture by issuing many of their best publications at unprecedentedly cheap prices. Many will learn with pleasure that the justly renowned New Popular Educator is among the works now being brought out again at what may fairly be regarded as "everybody's money." The first volume of the re-issue is before us (8s. 6d.). We have no need to do more than say that it fully justifies the claims of the work to be "a complete encyclopædia of elementary and advanced education." English subjects are combined with the arts and sciences, also with lessons in shorthand and several languages. Many illustrations and some excellent plates and maps are thrown in. Eight volumes, issued fortnightly, complete this singularly useful work.

A very useful handbook, on a subject having many charms for townsfolk as well as country residents, is Wonders of the Bird World (6s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.), by R. Bowdler Sharpe, LL.D., F.L.S., of the British Museum. Handsomely produced in every way, illustrated by A. T. Elwes, and provided with a good index, this volume gives the gist of the distinguished author's lectures on the curiosities of bird life, delivered in many parts of the United Kingdom during recent years. The pages are full of wonderful things about our feathered friends, the authorities for many marvellous statements being duly indicated. Dr. Bowdler Sharpe combines scientific precision with perspicuity of style; and for young people and others interested in the bird world, this will prove a desirable presentation volume.

When Professor Orr, of Edinburgh, speaks on Church History, we do well to listen. His new book, entitled Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton) is of great interest. Dr. Orr holds that Christianity was more widely prevalent in the first centuries than has been commonly allowed; and we have no doubt he is right in this contention. In a word, he says: "There has been an undue timidity in recognising the powerful hold which Christianity had taken numerically on society by the end of the third century." Historians have been too ready to insinuate exaggeration in regard to Scripture allusions and early writings, sacred and profane. Dr. Orr examines the material once more, alongside the testimony of the Catacombs, and his volume is a valuable contribution to ecclesiastical history.

Linguistic Manuals. The "Rapid" series of books on modern languages, issued by Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons, have very desirable qualities: they are carefully prepared, handy in form, and cheap in price. Recent publications in this class are—An annotated edition of Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1s. 6d.); a translation into French, with notes, of the first book of one of the "Avon" manuals, with the title Economie Domestique (6d.), and French Business Letters—a practical handbook of commercial correspondence. (6d.) New German handbooks are:—German Business Interviews, with correspondence, invoices, &c. (1s. 6d.); Schiller's Der Neffe als Onkel, edited with notes by F. Hundel; Allerlei, a collection of German "tit-bits;" and Examinations in German, and How to Pass Them, being actual papers, with full solutions (these three all 6d. each). Phonographers will find special interest in German Shorthand, an adaptation of Pitman's system to the German language, with rules and explanations in both languages. (1s. 6d.)

Archæological research has already done much to dissipate the speculations of the higher critics. To reconstruct Israelitish history has proved a larger undertaking than the critics expected, and discoveries of recent years have shown that the enterprise was based on misconceptions. One of these misconceptions was a false notion of the relation of other nations to the chosen people; and this is the subject of Professor Sayce's new book, Early Israel and the Surrounding Nations. (6s. Service & Paton.) The history of the Hebrews has a place in the history of the peoples of the East, of Egypt and Babylon, as well as the smaller nations, whose tale is now being told by cylinders and tablets, bricks and papyri recovered from the dust of ages. The points of contact are well indicated by Professor Sayce, from whom we gratefully receive facts, although not prepared off-hand to adopt all his inferences. A specially useful section of the book is the Appendices, thirteen in number, giving translations of some of the most valuable results of research in the form of creation epics, chronological lists, and other documents—Egyptian, Phœnician, Assyrian, and Babylonian.

The Keswick Bible Dictionary (1s. Marshall Bros.) is a neat and strongly bound re-issue.

One of the latest candidates among magazines for popular favour is Womanhood (6d. F. L. Ballin, 5, Agar Street, W.C.) As its title implies, it is intended for the fair sex.

Some very attractive wall-texts, in colours, suitable for the home, and schools, and mission halls have been issued by Mr. Andrew Stevenson, 9, North Bank Street, Mound, Edinburgh.

An address given recently by Mr. J. T. Budd on laundry work as an occupation for gentlewomen is issued by Messrs. Partridge & Co. under the title of Useful Work for Gentle Hands. (1d.)

A pamphlet likely to prove of service to workers who are brought into contact with secularists, is Free Thought and the Gospel, by J. K. Henshelwood, of Melbourne, Victoria. (3d. Partridge & Co.)

Types of the Way is a booklet setting forth Scripture truth in brevity, in a manner calculated to strike thoughful people. Christian workers will find the pages suggestive for Bible-readings and addresses. (Elliot Stock.)

An instructive pamphlet, by G. E. F. M., has been issued with the title Medical Missions. It is not so much for those who have made missions a study, as for such as are beginning their investigations. (6d. Weston-super-Mare: Davies Brothers, 14, High Street.)

Miss Brown has prepared the third series of Texts for Children. The words are shown by dots, which may be gone over with a kindergarten pricker, and worked in with wool or lustrine silk. (1s. 2d. per packet, post free. Miss J. Brown, Trelawney Road, Falmouth.)

The Pearl of the Antilles, by Rev. Geo. Lester (2d. C. H. Kelly), is a delightful description of the island of Cuba, its people, and their present condition and prospects. There are many fine illustrations, and the booklet ought to be welcomed wherever it goes. It will increase practical interest in a fair but hitherto sadly misgoverned corner of our globe.

In the new issue of The Charities' Register (4s. Longmans & Co.), one of the most useful of annual compilations in connection with social and philanthropic institutions, the varied particulars have been revised and condensed throughout. The valuable introduction, by Mr. C. S. Loch, constitutes in itself a cyclopædia of information on the poor law and cognate subjects.

In The Word and the Churches, adapted from the writings of faithful brethren in Christ through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth, John Warry, of Oxton, argues that water baptism is not incumbent in the present dispensation, and he concludes the same as to the observance of the Lord's Supper. Some idea of his general position may be gathered from his words: "I do approve of parents bringing their offspring before the congregation, and enrolling them into membership of the visible Church with application and thanksgiving." (Edward Howell, Church Street, Liverpool.)

March 5.

"Christ freeing from Sin."—John viii. 12, 31-36.

Golden Text.—"If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."—John viii. 36.

The Pillar of Fire (12).

CHRIST was standing near the two huge candelabra—seventy-five feet high—in the Women's Court of the Temple when He spoke these words. They were placed there in commemoration of the pillar of fire which guided the wandering Israelites through the desert (Exodus xiii. 21). During the feast of Tabernacles these candelabra were illuminated and festal dances performed around them.

Jesus made use of every circumstance which came in his way to enforce Divine Truth.

The Light of the World (12).

How the influence of Christ is similar to the Pillar of Fire.

Wilderness—The world; Enemies—Sin. Waywardness and return of Israel compared to ours. The destination of Israel—Heaven—Christ leads Home. The need for guidance in an unknown way. That which gave Light to Israel was as a wall of darkness to the pursuing Egyptians.

Christ guides us by (1) his Teaching, (2) his Example, (3) his Loving Forgiveness, (4) his Present Help ("Lo, I am with you alway").

The School of Jesus (31).

A disciple is a scholar. Jesus says: "If you obey my teaching, then you are truly my disciples." Teacher may draw many useful and easily remembered lessons from this. Speak of—Christ as Teacher.—He knew his subject. Apt to teach, He taught knowledge, also inspired his scholars to obey. Many have taught; no one but Christ could give strength to live up to the teaching.

Condition of Discipleship.—"If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me."

Scholars must learn of Jesus, who lived in communion with the great Fountain Head. Scholars must obey. Commands are not arbitrary. Every one for our good.

Text Books.—(1) Bible. (2) The experience of daily life. Jesus has a new lesson in every event of our life.

School Time.—The span of our life. Never too late to learn. Youngest or oldest still disciples.

Final Examination.—The time when Jesus shall come as Judge. The standard of the examination will be Christ Himself. We shall be measured by the perfect man. But it will also be modified by the way we started in the school, our inherited disposition, kind of parents and home we had, &c.

Freedom by the Truth (32).

The Truth makes us free. Take fear as an Illustration.—Man walking along a road at night in bondage of fear because he sees a phantom in the hedge. He finds out that it is a tree stump, and his fear vanishes.

Truth about Man.—His high destiny. Meant to be a son of God.

Truth about God.—God is love, mighty to save.

The teacher might use this respecting anything else which binds men, and show that knowledge of the truth liberates from the thraldom. Not the knowledge of the head, but of the life and experience. This is life eternal.

The Slavery of Sin (34).

Not he who commits one sin, but he who is continually living in sin. He becomes the slave of sin.

Teacher might illustrate this by the sin of drunkenness. The caustic craving becomes so strong that the victim is an abject tool of his passions. "When he would do good, evil is present." He bears the galling fetters of a guilty conscience wherever he goes.

Contrast of Slave and Son (35).

The sequence is as follows:—

(33). Abraham's seed, never in bondage.

(34). He who sins is the bondman of sin.

(35). The bondman (Hagar and Ishmael), although Abraham's seed after the flesh, were cast out; while Isaac, who was son in spirit and promise, was still in the home.

(36). It is the spiritual sonship which makes you free, not the mere physical sonship which Ishmael possessed in common with Isaac.

We are all sons of God in the sense of having been created by Him; but they only are free who are his sons spiritually.

Young People.

Hooligans, and Other Boys.

MANY are the wonderful sights of London town, but among those which are especially attractive in the eyes of Christian boys and girls are Mr. Fegan's Homes for Destitute Lads.

The kindly secretary of the institutions, on being interviewed, smilingly agrees to supply a little information about them for the benefit of our younger readers. He leads the way through a corridor hung with portraits of old boys who are now sun-burnt toilers in the fertile fields of Canada. We ascend to the capacious kitchen at the top of this huge block of buildings in Southwark Street. There is a rush of steam, with a grateful odour that suggests the approach of dinner time. The blithe little assistant caterer sniffs the air with satisfaction. In the great copper half-a-dozen joints are cooking with a sort of satisfied simmer, which might be translated, "Aren't we stewing nicely, and won't we and the cabbages make a first-class

DINNER FOR HUNGRY BOYS?"

The head cook, a sturdy and smiling party, hints at jam tarts and rice puddings browning in those large ovens. He turns a wheel, swings open a door, and exhibits the delicacies with honest pride. In the next room a lively brigade lays the knives and forks and salt-cellars, all the house work being done by the boys, and amid a rousing clatter of crockery we descend to the dormitories on the next floor.

"Dear me," we murmur, "what a number of beds!" There are rows after rows, trim and well kept. A flash of February sunlight strikes a cheery glow from the steel-woven mattrasses and neatly-folded rugs, and the clatter of pails and swish of water call our attention to the smart squad who, by the aid of soap and brushes, are studying the useful science of Scrubology. They handle their tools dexterously, but the best thing about them is their rollicking readiness to work. They are taught, we think, that it is a noble thing to do with thoroughness whatever our hands find to do. "We get them," whispers our guide, "in all sorts of ways that would need a book to describe.

We pass the big bath, where a particularly small but sharp young man of ten is polishing the particularly large tap with tremendous vigour, and enter the industrial section. Amid the whirr and rattle of printing presses, where beautiful magazines and artistic posters are being turned out, the secretary points to specimens of the work, with pardonable pride. There are for the chief hands, who are "grown ups" were once boys in the homes. Now they are helping others to rise. Here many lads are apprenticed. Across the road in large, separate premises, other batches are learning to set type, while yet more, equally business-like, are pondering the mysteries of boot-making or wielding the hammer or speeding the plane in constructing chairs and tables.

There is such a spirit of anxiety to turn out good articles, that we ask the secretary the reason, and he bashfully answers that he supposes it is because those in charge of this beautiful work toil as unto God. They regard the poor little destitute chap, hungry and tired on the sorrowful streets of London, as one of Jesus' very own, though grimy, lambs.

But here is the school. It is for the smaller boys who are not yet advanced enough for trades, and are yet too big for Mr. Fegan's "Little Wanderers' Home" at Greenwich or Boys' Orphanage at Ramsgate. It is comfortable and well fitted, and the lads are so brightly taught that multiplication is no longer vexation, and the rule of three ceases to puzzle. On the walls hang lists of names lovingly of those former inmates who, having prospered in life, have sent back the whole cost of their keep and training.

"Oh, yes, the boys behave well," says the secretary. "Decidedly so. We give them little privileges by way of encouragement, and promotion from squad to squad brings pocket-money to the extent of a weekly half-penny or penny, which may be spent on the Wednesday or Saturday half holiday." It is very nice, too, to find, amid teaching and training, how readily they learn of the suffering Christ who came to save the young as well as the old. Morning and evening the boys kneel for private prayer; morning and evening the Bible is read, a hymn sung, and the blessing of God sought in united prayer. Four days in the week Bible teaching is given to all, and there are Scripture lessons in school. On Sundays there are services morning and evening, and a for the Christian lads meets during leisure time one evening in the week. Besides this, the boys themselves conduct a service for their little comrades. Many are the branches of the work. Just round the corner, amid the great wharves and factories on the banks of the Thames, is a large and beautifully kept Institute where poor factory girls can get a good cheap meal, and make themselves at home in a comfortable "drawing" room. There is work for poor mothers, free medical advice and help from good doctors, and nursing by ladies who give their lives for the suffering and starving. Next door, a large extension is being made for gathering in those wild young people called "Hooligans."

Thousands of boys have passed through Mr. Fegan's hands during the past twenty-five years. Many have been restored to their parents, others placed in service, whence they have risen to responsible positions; others, again, have gone down to the sea in ships, or as we have seen have been taught useful trades. Of the 1,500 drafted out into happy openings in life across the sea, some are already dwelling in homesteads of their own, obtained as the result of

HARD WORK AND THRIFT.

Many are earnest workers for Christ. Not very long since, a missionary who had brought a boy to the home said, "Don't you know me, Mr. Fegan? I'm so-and-so who used to be in the Home." Was not that cheering? It came about, you see, because the work of saving poor boys is done in the name and strength of the Lord. Let us all, in that Name and that strength, stand cheerfully to whatever work for others may be given to us to do, and humble though it may be, it shall not be wanting in blessing, for "the great God who loveth us, He made and loveth all."

Acts x. to xxii.

Of whom was it said:

1. "He was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost?"
2. "Art not thou that Egyptian?"
3. "He spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord."
4. "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him."
5. "These that have turned the world upside down."
6. "Whose heart the Lord opened."
7. "Wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?"
8. "It is his angel."

Give chapter and verse, and state the circumstances under which they were spoken in a few words.

Personal.

I wish to thank all my "nephews and nieces" for their pleasant letters of thanks for the prizes, certificates, &c., which they have received. It is very gratifying to know how much the rewards have been appreciated, and I regret I am unable to answer them personally, but, owing to the number, that is impossible.

GERTRUDE BATH.—The name of the well is given in the heading to the chapter.

ISA AND DORA BELL.—You must write out the answers as well as give the references.

DOROTHY BERRY AND E. MABEL GOLDING.—I will index your names.

NORA READ.—Thank you very much for your letter and photo.

FLORA SHADBOLT.—I hope you are much better now. I was very sorry to hear you had been so ill.

ISA BOWEN, LIZZIE AND NELLIE BROWN, DOROTHY CHARLES.—I am very pleased to welcome you among my numerous "nephews and nieces."

BESSIE SYMES.—Thank you very much for your kind letter and postal order, which you will find acknowledged in the "Donation List."

FLORRY COMBES.—You will be in Division II for the next competition.

MAY C. MILLS.—You were in the list as Mary Mills.

BESSIE CHEALE.—You forgot to sign your name last week.

HERBERT BRADDON.—I am sorry your certificate was damaged in the post, and am sending you another.

ETHEL BARCLAY.—Thank you very much for the flowers.

The Canteen has been abolished in the United States army. It is now illegal for any officer or private person to sell intoxicants on any premises used for military purposes by the United States. The army is thus placed on a par with the United States Navy, where liquor selling has been for some time forbidden.

The Times says that Viscount Peel's draft report will probably be endorsed by a majority of the Licensing Commission. It is tentatively stated that a scheme of compensation, in the shape of long notice, for the withdrawal of licences will be recommended. A minority report will be issued by the members representing the liquor interest.

At a recent temperance meeting at Guildford, Alderman Phillips said: "I was passing by a public-house the other day and I heard a disturbance. Going nearer to the place I saw that the potman was turning a poor woman into the street; and for what reason? The woman was crying out to the publican, 'Give me back my husband; don't serve him with beer!"

The Bishop of Chichester recently remarked that what temperance reformers suffered from more than the attack of their enemies—and they had against them the weight of £117,000,000 invested in the trade, and all the selfishness, the carelessness, and the sensuality of the human heart—was the apathy of Christian men and women. The difficulty was that if a man dared to speak the naked truth, the truth was so tremendous that to the ears of those people who were not prepared for it it had the sound of positive exaggeration.

Y.M.C.A.

IT was reported at the annual meeting of the Birkenhead Association that there are now on the roll 598 members and associates.

The Earl of Aberdeen has consented to be one of the speakers at the anniversary meeting of the London Central Association, which is provisionally fixed for April 19.

The annual public meeting of the Eastbourne Association was held in the Town Hall, on Feb. 15. The report showed that very satisfactory progress had been made during the year.

Mr. Frank Anderson, College Secretary, Bombay, is leaving in April, for the period covered by the next hot season, to put the claims of the work before leading friends at different centres throughout Great Britain.

New rooms, well suited to an enlarged and growing work, were opened on February 15 by the Dartford Y.M.C.A. A large number of friends assembled at 2.30 p.m., and an hour later the opening ceremony was performed.

During the past year, 110 new members have joined the Ipswich Y.M.C.A., but one hundred were lost within the same period, a large number of whom, however, left the town with introductions to other Associations.

In the twentieth annual report of the City of Winnipeg Association is given an illustration of a handsome new building which it is proposed to erect to accommodate the work of that institution. The aggregate membership is 489.

The office of General Secretary of the New York Association, vacant by the death of the late Mr. R. R. McBurney, has been filled by the election of Mr. Henry M. Orne, who had been associate-secretary with Mr. McBurney for about ten years.

The Bayswater Association will hold its annual reunion in the Paddington Baths' Hall, on Monday, March 13, at 8 p.m., when the speakers will be Revs. W. Y. Fullerton, J. G. Train, F. S. Webster, and Dinsdale T. Young.

In connection with the newly-formed Lancaster Association, special young men's meetings were conducted from Feb. 9 to 12 by Mr. A. K. Yapp, travelling secretary for Lancashire. The Association has acquired suitable premises in the centre of the town.

The thirty-ninth annual meeting of the Camden Town Association was held on Thursday evening, February 16. The report showed that much progress had been made during the past year, eighty-two new members and associates having been enrolled; an interesting work is being carried on for lads with a present membership of sixty.

The Committee of the Sunderland Y.M.C.A., has adopted a novel plan for bringing before the men of the town the advantages of the Institution. They will throw open the rooms free of charge for a month to all young men who are non-members. The gymnasium and games room will be open, and there will be concerts, lectures, etc., during the "open-door" campaign.

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on a mission to be held early in March at Gilford Hall, Sandymount.

For blessing on a special mission being held at the Methodist New Connexion Chapel, Sheriff Hill, Gateshead.

For a series of Gospel meetings in the village of Whitletts, Ayrshire, under the auspices of Ayrshire Christian Union.

For blessing on a special eight days' Gospel Mission in Hurstpierpoint Mission Hall, March 5-12.

For blessing on eight days' mission to be held in St. Saviour's Mission Hall, Mary Street, Dundas Hill, Glasgow, commencing March 5.

For blessing on a fortnight's mission by Mr. Roland Edwards at Bexhill-on-Sea.

On behalf of a ten days' mission to be conducted by Rev. J. P. Cushing in St. Andrew's Parish, Dublin, March 4-13.

For blessing on mission services at Donoughmore, Castlefin, Co. Donegal, conducted by Mr. Wm. Cowden, Belfast.

Praise.

For prayer answered on behalf of tract distribution in Edinburgh.

Japanese Seamen.—Miss McLean, who works among these visitors to our shores, has moved her Christian Institute from Coolfin Road, Custom House, to Dock Road, Tilbury Dock, Essex, where she will be in closer touch with those whom she seeks to benefit. In consequence of the moving she has not at present free access to all her papers, and she desires through our columns to express her warmest thanks to the many kind friends who have sent to her gifts of book bags. About 600 of these have been distributed, with appropriate contents, to Japanese seamen within the past month. Another batch of some 200 men-o'-war's men have arrived this week. Some of these will take charge of a torpedo destroyer built at Chiswick, and others will proceed to Glasgow to man a warship constructed there. Miss McLean will thankfully receive contributions of book bags for these men and for others that may follow.

Evangelistic.

A Week's Gospel Campaign.

A REMARKABLE series of services has been held during the past week in Peckham, Dulwich, and district, under the auspices of the South London Christian Union. The committee of this recently formed but very vigorous association of workers arranged with the principal ministers to hold special services during the week in the various churches. A time of wonderful interest and blessing has been experienced on each occasion. As a rule, the pastor of the church has been requested to give the first address. Many have been deeply touched by the earnest messages delivered by Revs. H. J. Knight, H. J. Haffer, H. Mann, Allen D. Jeffery, Frank Smith, and others.

The president (Mr. Alfred Holness) and other members also took part each evening, and God was pleased to give marked evidence of blessing in the conversion of sinners. The meetings on Friday and Saturday will long be remembered; believers as well as the unconverted were manifestly impressed.

The members of the S.L.C.U. earnestly desire that this movement may spread to other parts of the metropolis. Any information will be gladly given by the hon. sec. of the Union, Mr. W. Hardwick, 12, Nigel Road, Peckham Rye, S.E.

Rev. E. P. Hammond has been evangelising at Omaha, Nebraska.

Mr. Henry Thorne's ten days' mission at Hendon, in connection with the Free Church Council, has been a time of much blessing. The meetings were well attended; Christians were stimulated, and many professed conversion.

Mr. Geo. Brain, after ten years' evangelistic work in Rock Ferry, has decided to resign the superintendency of Rock Ferry Mission, in order to devote himself fully to conducting mission services. Churches or missions desirous of securing his services for next winter should communicate with him at 146, Bedford Road, Rock Ferry, Cheshire.

A fortnight's evangelistic mission by Mr. W. D. Dunn has been held at the Baptist Church, St. Andrews. The results have been a stimulus in every branch of our church work, while not a few have testified to the reception of a new life. Mr. McAusland's singing has led to the meetings some who would not otherwise have gone; it has been a source of attraction and a medium of blessing to many.

W. P. Simpson, Pastor.

Rev. C. H. G. McGregor, of London, has been conducting a week's special mission in the Barclay Free Church, Edinburgh. From the first there was an evident desire for blessing, and the Lord has met the longing of not a few hearts. Mr. McGregor's addresses have been very searching. It is cheering to hear of conversions to God and decisions for Christ, in a number of cases among young people. The preacher conducted daily Bible readings for believers.

A time of much blessing is reported in connection with mission services conducted by Mr. Arthur Klein in the Grand Theatre and other buildings at Byker, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Many who were convicted of sin pressed forward to the penitent form. Some hundreds professed conversion, amongst the number being the whole of a group of young ladies from the post-office. Many Christians have been quickened. The special noonday meetings with Bible talks for believers were largely attended.

For four weeks Dr. Munhall conducted the "Business Men's Noon Meeting" in the Bromfield Street M. E. Church, Boston, U.S. The large vestry of the church was crowded before the first week was out, and before the second week was gone the audience room of the church was filled. The last two weeks the auditorium and galleries were filled at nearly every service. Dr. Munhall also supplied the Clarendon Street Baptist Church during January, and held nightly meetings at another church.

There are a large number of men employed on the Great Eastern Railway at Chelmsford, and the local branch of the Railway Mission is under the direction of Miss Ridley, who takes great interest in their welfare. On Feb. 11 Mr. John Hawkins, Railway Mission evangelist, commenced a series of mission services at the Townfield Hall, and these have been well attended throughout, more especially the afternoon Bible readings, which were very instructive, and drew together large congregations of the wives of the men. A number of conversions are recorded.

Obituary.

Rev. C. S. Robinson.

NEW YORK has lost one of its best-known pastors in the death of Dr. Charles S. Robinson. For some years he was in Paris organising the American chapel into a church, and left its pastorate only when the city was besieged by the German army. Since his return to the States he has been connected with different churches, but he has been most widely known through his services to the cause of church music. Probably no hymnologist of the country has had so great a success or has rendered such service to praise in church worship. For some time (says the New York Independent of February 9) Dr. Robinson had been poorly; death had been expected almost daily.

Rev. Talbot Greaves.

We learn with much regret that Rev. Talbot Greaves, who was thrown from his horse on Saturday, sustaining dreadful injuries to his spine, died at Clifton on Monday morning. The deceased gentleman, who was a prominent member of the Evangelical party, was formerly vicar of Clifton, and removed in 1892 to Holy Trinity, Torquay, where he purchased the advowson of three churches and also built a new one. Mr. Greaves will be remembered as an exceedingly earnest and uncompromising defender of the Protestant faith. His relatives will have the sincere sympathy of our readers in their sore bereavement.

Mr. Thomas Webb.

Mr. Thomas Webb, of Westham, Weymouth, was called suddenly to his rest while absent from home engaged in a mission in the neighbourhood of Liverpool. For some years Mr. Webb laboured in the Gospel in Bath and Box. In 1887 he removed to Weymouth, dividing his time and service between Weymouth and the neighbouring town of Dorchester, often visiting Salisbury, the Isle of Wight, and many other places, where much blessing attended his preaching. For some years past he has been in failing health, and though forbidden by his medical adviser to preach, he felt that the time was short, and even when absent for rest he could not give up his beloved work. He was in his sixty-sixth year. He leaves a widow and two daughters, one of whom, Mrs. MacArthy, is a missionary in China.

Dr. James Wood.

By the death of Dr. James Wood, Southport, the Wesleyan Methodist Church loses one of its best known and respected laymen. The deceased gentleman was educated at Wesley College, Sheffield, and graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he received his degree of LL.D. Entering the Southport Town Council more than twenty years ago, he was in 1882 elected mayor, and re-elected in 1883. Ten years later Dr. Wood was elected to the mayoralty for a third term, and again re-elected on its expiration for a fourth year. Still more recently he was presented with the freedom of the borough. Dr. Wood was a thoroughgoing Methodist of the old school, and by ancestry, early environment, and lifelong associations was closely identified with the Wesleyan church. Largely owing to his earnest support, the Southport Convention has become a permanent and increasingly useful institution. In 1886 he married a daughter of the Rev. Charles Garrett, whom he leaves a widow with a family of six children. He was one of the most vigorous advocates of temperance among Methodist laymen.

Dr. W. T. Crabbe.

By the death of Dr. Crabbe, of the Medical Mission, a familiar figure disappears from Birmingham, and the poor of the city lose a devoted friend. For twenty-two years and more he acted as medical superintendent of the Birmingham Medical Mission, with the history of which, it may be said, his life was bound up. After a distinguished university career, he practised for a time at Lasswade, a fashionable suburb of Edinburgh, but eventually made up his mind to devote himself entirely to medical mission work. He engaged in this first at Aberdeen, then at Edinburgh, and after repeated invitations came to Birmingham in 1876 to become the medical superintendent of the Birmingham Medical Mission. Dr. Crabbe worked so successfully that soon it became necessary to provide further accommodation, and in February, 1879, the present buildings in Floodgate-street were opened. Since then a branch has been established at Ellis-street, Holloway Head.

During his career as a medical missionary Dr. Crabbe registered over half a million attendances of patients. He threw his whole energy into the cause of the suffering and destitute poor, who never sought in vain for either help or sympathy. Several medical missionaries now doing splendid service in various parts of the world owe their medical training to the deceased gentleman. Signs of failing health became apparent in the summer of 1896, and Dr. Crabbe took a six months' holiday, during which he visited Palestine and Egypt, and returned to his post greatly benefited. He continued in active work until a couple of months ago, when he was taken suddenly ill. A successful operation prolonged life for a time, but the patient gradually sank, and passed peacefully away on February 13.

In a second notice of the deceased, the Daily Gazette of Birmingham says:—

"It was the expressed desire of Dr. Crabbe that when he came to die his body should rest, during the brief interval between death and burial, in the Mission Hall, Floodgate-street. The dead man's wish has been faithfully observed, and hour after hour the poor, among whom Dr. Crabbe ministered so long and so lovingly, passed by his coffin to take a last leave of their kindly old friend. Over ten thousand people—the poorest of the poor for the most part—have paid this testimony of affection. The daily services have been inexpressibly touching."

The interment at Witton Cemetery on Saturday last was attended by an immense concourse of spectators and friends.

The Invalid's Prayer Union seeks to unite suffering ones in prayer and loving sympathy for one another. To promote this object, a monthly series of subjects for prayer and a series of short Scripture readings for each Sunday in the year are arranged. The hon. secretary is Miss C. A. Peddie, Deaconess House, Mildmay Park, London, N.

The Christian.

Notes & Comments

THE Ten Weeks' Bible School in London has more than run the first half of its course; and it is a great joy to learn of blessing having attended it in the various centres. Each week we have described typical gatherings, and given our readers some account of the lessons. Professor White has been careful all along to combine the practical with the expository; and while his method has proved of service to many a student, his appeals to head and heart, whether addressed to Christian people or to "them that are without," have borne fruit in all directions. Many are praying that more abundant blessing may be given as the season of study nears its end.

It has been very gratifying to see a growing number of ministers present in recent weeks. Some workers have so far profited by the Professor's method as to undertake similar demonstrations in their own localities. Repetition of facts along lines of inductive investigation have, in a general way, been found a distinct help; and we have heard of young people to whom the method has proved so helpful that they have gladly devoted their only "free" evening in the week to attendance at the School. All along testimony has been borne to the fruitfulness of Professor White's work.

This Bible School is not an intellectual gymnasium, but a spiritual undertaking. Professor White has not, as we understand his ministry, put his hand to this great work with the object of satisfying a personal ambition or meeting a popular fancy. His aim is to promote Scripture study, in order that the Word may "have free course, and be glorified,"—that "the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" may become the saving possession of many who are now seeking after God, and that a deeper regard for the Lord's revealed will may be implanted in the souls of Christian people and show itself in their lives.

It would be well for parents to ponder some of the words recently spoken on gambling by Rev. Allen Whitworth at St. Paul's, Kensington.

When one saw the excitement caused by the fall of the dice, the dealing of cards, and the variations of the Share-Market, one realised the folly of parents encouraging the games of chance which were played in a thousand nurseries. The demon of gambling intoxicated the gambler, and its tendency was to make a few men richer and the mass poorer.

Child life is so readily influenced, either for good or evil, that it is impossible to be too careful in the selection of suitable games for the children of Christian homes. There is a danger here which we are sure requires to be guarded against, if our children are to be kept in the path of life.

Disused churchyards in the heart of London have long been put to wise and kindly uses, by allowing the people to sit and walk in them. Rev. S. J. Stone, of All Hallows on the Wall, is showing how to make on week days a good use of disused churches, and churches are generally very little used from Sunday to Sunday. He has opened his church from 6.30 to 8.30, and for the women and girls who come by cheap trains to London too early to get admission to their places of business there is light and warmth and rest for them; they can read, or sew, or knit—but not eat—and a tableful of books is provided for them. Some fifty or sixty come regularly, and stragglers also come in. A service lasting ten minutes is occasionally held. Some similar uses of churches and chapels and mission halls may be possible in a great many other places.

It is a great pity that our representatives abroad should pay so little regard to the feelings of a large proportion of their countrymen in reference to the Lord's Day. We seem to miss greatly the Christian loyalty with which men like Havelock, Outram, Colin Campbell, and others respected the religious customs of the country to which they belonged, even when in foreign lands. For example:—

To-day (Feb. 12) the Duke of Connaught laid the foundation-stone of the first of the two huge dams which are being constructed across the Nile. . . . The day was selected for the ceremony as a special compliment to Egyptian feeling, as being the first day of the Bairam festival. . . . In the afternoon the ducal party visited the bazaars of Assouan.—Daily Paper.

The timely and drastic measure dealing with money-lenders, which Lord James, of Hereford, introduced into the Upper House is an urgent necessity. The grasping greed of money by men of no principle has wrought an immense amount of misery among people temporarily needing financial help. The Bill does not touch legitimate business on reasonable terms, but it seeks to make impossible the avarice which preys upon weakness and credulity. There is neither honour nor morality in the manner in which much of this business has been carried on. Sound principle is the only basis of any commercial transactions; and the teachings of the Gospel of Christ make this clear enough.

The almost total failure of the "block" system of model dwellings both to defeat the evil of over-crowding and to attract the self-respecting artisan, is one of the most striking features of the last few years. As a matter of fact the population of these huge tenements slowly but inevitably tends to the lowest level. Family life is almost impossible; the craving for fresh air, for even the tiniest plot of garden which a man can call his own, and for a sight of the country, drive away the better class of workmen further afield, where these benefits can be had. The right remedy is in easier facilities of transit, and a development of the village suburb in which cheap and well-built cottages would be provided, with safeguards against the extortions of rapacious landlords and rack-renters. This is the only way by which the "greatest social problem of our day" (as Mr. Balfour confessed it to be, a week or two ago in Parliament), can be solved in the interests of the working classes themselves.

The Cottage Home measure now before Parliament is a new attempt to provide for the old age of the industrious poor without the stigma of pauperism. One difficulty at once fronts those anxious to see some such remedy come into operation. Who are the deserving? But this does not prevent strenuous efforts being made to carry the bill through. There are thousands who, from various causes quite beyond their control, have not been able to make any provision for life's eventide. Misfortune and sickness have crippled them times and again, until it seems as if nothing could prevent their drifting into comparative destitution. God's poor are they, for whom the nation, professedly Christian, should do its best. Many who are needy in old age have contributed to the nation's wealth and prosperity in younger days. Have they not a claim upon the nation's generosity when too feeble to maintain the fight for daily bread?

Wise and kindly treatment of deserving old people is good, but just treatment of helpless children is still better, inasmuch as it is a means of preventing the evil of helpless poverty in after life. It is humiliating to realise that whereas Britain has led the way of Continental nations in regard to the protection of workmen and the improvement of factory life generally, she is to-day behind them all in regard to the protection of children industrially. This is the only country where children of eleven years are permitted to work in factories, and which lets boys of twelve go down into the mines. A prominent German newspaper even accuses us of hindering international reforms by our example. The terrible effects of child-labour on the physical constitution and on morals have been recently well ventilated in the press; and it is to be hoped that reformers will not permit this matter to be shelved any longer in the interests of either employers or parents, and thereby at the expense of the rising generation, who stand to gain. There are few forms of legislation more justifiable than that which aims at the defence of overwrought and helpless childhood.

It has been said that "initiation is not a potent factor in legislative change;" which is true, but an uneasy conscience often is. When there are wrongs to be righted, the first thing to be done is to create a feeling of uneasiness, and thus force men and women to bestir themselves and find out a way of righting them. No one can give us exactly the plan of reform wanted for the present condition of London; but if all decent citizens can be made miserable over the present abominations, they will find out something effectual. If all Christians could be made sufficiently miserable over the fruits of the drink traffic, we should soon get some legislation to abate the evil—Sunday closing would come with a rush and grocers' licences would soon be swept away.

"A Correspondent" contributed to the Daily News, a few days ago, a remarkable article on the power of the schoolmaster in France. The stability of the Republic was traced to the teaching in the day schools, and to his influence in every town and village.

We must mix with all sorts and conditions of people in the provinces to realise the force of Republican conviction, the immense, the deep-seated power of the schoolmaster. For the village pedagogue is no uninstructed braggart, above all things he is absolutely independent of the priest, and in his person opposes a most formidable obstacle to sacer-dotalism. The attitude of curé and maître d'école, if not of open antagonism, remains necessarily one of mistrust and dislike.

That may be all very well as a political power and a negation of the Church of Rome, but it has not proved a conspicuous success, so far as we know, in greatly elevating the moral tone of the nation, or in persuading it to keep an open mind for other teaching than that of the priest. It is righteousness alone that can in any abiding sense "exalt a nation," not the schoolmaster.

In the French paper, Le Pretre Converti, an ex-priest shows how his faith was altogether destroyed by the Confessional. He started with implicit faith in the Church and in the validity of his own priesthood:—

Alas! the Confessional was soon cruelly to disabuse me. The first avowals I had to listen to raised in my mind such a storm that their memory haunts me still. The words of Claude Frollo, himself a priest, used to recur to my mind, "A man like me who becomes a priest becomes a demon too." Yes, I saw that the priest in the Confessional box becomes to others a positive tempter, for himself. . . . Alas! I have had to confess both laymen and priests, who to my certain knowledge concealed their greatest sins, either by making a play on words, or by mental reservations, or else by simply lying fairly and squarely. This last experience at last opened my eyes to the fact that auricular confession is a school of hypocrisy, and that Michelet was right when he wrote "The Catholic priesthood is based on two immoralities, the Confessional and priestly celibacy." From that day all was up. I had had faith because I believed in the Church. I no longer believed in the Church, therefore I no longer believed what she taught. The Eucharist, Christ, Providence—the existence even of God—auricular confession has destroyed everything.

This extract fully coincides with the widespread tendency noticeable in Catholic countries, that once the kind of faith demanded by that church is disturbed it tends to land the disillusioned in blank atheism.

It seems to be generally admitted that one thing which the coming Conference on the Czar's rescript may successfully attempt is the humanising of practices of warfare. Our conduct in exhuming the body of the Mahdi, burning it, casting the ashes into the Nile, and giving Major Gordon the head, is proof that war produces some ghastly results which need a good deal of changing, and one of them might well be that there shall be no war upon the bodies of the dead. We are shocked when we hear of savage tribes mutilating the dead, and we should not justify them by copying them. But this is just one of the dangers to which our wars with barbarous peoples expose us, that we should learn their way and sinks to their level. We may surely hope that the horror which has been expressed over the outrage on the Nile will prevent any repetition of similar things.

It would be a grim satire on the pacific intentions of the Pope if his evident desire to be represented on the International Peace Congress should after all wreck the movement. The Italian Government has stated its refusal to join in the conference if he is invited, and the Dutch Government, which is to issue the invitations, is in the dilemma that it must either offend the Pope or destroy the representative character of the conference. It remains to be seen whether the Pope's love of peace is greater or less than his amour propre and determination at all costs to exalt his church above earthly governments and states.

The Church Times indignantly denies that churchmen will ever again permit Lord Penzance and the Privy Council to make church law. They will sooner consent to Disestablishment, Disendowment, and any kind of loss than they will surrender the rights of the Church. This means the right of "priests" to do as they like. It calls upon the bishops to take a bold and reasonable course, to conciliate High Churchmen, and "not the Dissenters of the Albert Hall."

The next observation of our contemporary is that, as the approval of the Pope of the Bishops' resolve to put down Ritualism, disposes of the statement of Cardinal Vaughan and the Dissenters that the Ritualists are doing the work of Rome, and should show the bishops the true inwardness of the present agitation. That is to say, the Pope is at the bottom of the agitation, and the Ritualists are the real defence against him! Persons who believe so must have very short memories not to recall all the coquetting with Rome that has gone on for years by the Ritualists. When a servant is seen in friendly converse with a housebreaker it does stimulate confidence in him.

There are some Nonconformists who would not do anything to stay the Ritualistic movement, because they believe the stronger and the more objectionable it becomes the earlier will disestablishment and disendowment come, and the more thorough it will be. We strongly deprecate such a policy. When the opponents of State regulation of vice were carrying on their campaign they were frequently face to face with the specious temptation to do nothing against the system in detail, but allow it to wax worse and worse, so that it might perish under the execrations of the people, to which temptation they never once yielded. Had they done so the system would be with us now. Only by doing the good that is possible to us can we ultimately do the good that we would.

It is painful to learn that Henri Durrant, the founder of the Red Cross Society, sits in a small room in a little two-storied hospital in Heiden, Switzerland, almost, if not quite, forgotten by the world he did his best to serve. Once wealthy, he spent all his money on the great humitarian works in which he was interested. A few remember him, e.g., the Czarina has given him a yearly pension; nevertheless he is weighed down by a heavy debt, and now and then has been in dire straits. Some assistance may come to him from Sweden from the Nobel prize, given to the person who has done the most to promote peace; in any case, he ought not to be allowed to languish in want and distress.

Missionary Loan Exhibition.

THE arrangements for the Missionary Loan Exhibition, to be held in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, from March 5 to 14, are almost completed. 5,000 missionary curios will be gathered together, and it is expected that over 100 missionaries from all parts of the world will be present during the ten days the exhibition is open. Fifteen committees have been formed in connection with the undertaking, and these have been meeting weekly for several months. An interest has been awakened in connection with foreign missionary work such as we have not had in our city for some time.

On the two Sabbath days three meetings will be held in the Grand Hall, and on the week days four meetings each day. Arrangements have been made with the School Board of Glasgow to let the scholars free at an early hour on certain days so as to enable them to visit the exhibition. It is expected that much stimulus will be given to foreign missionary work from the object lesson that will be presented to the great community in and around Glasgow.

A Suggestive Study.

A SEVEN-FOLD PROMISE (Exodus vi. 6-8).

WE are told by President Garfield that his mother used to take her Bible at night, when her children were asleep, and pick out promises which she then presented to God in prayer, asking Him to fulfil them to her and to her children. These promises she called her "bank cheques." Here is a magnificent seven-linked chain of promise made to the Israelites as God was about to lead them out of the bondage of Egypt into the freedom of the promised land. It is made to us, too, as He leads us out of the bondage of sin and earthliness into the freedom of his spiritual kingdom. May we not use it in prayer as "a bank-cheque," trustfully asking its fulfilment?

1. Burdens.—"I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians." Overwork, oppression, slavery—Israel's burdens; poverty, weak health, daily worries, evil tendencies in ourselves and our children, bondage to sense, fear of death, dark thoughts of God—ours. Bring those burdens to God. David found Him a burden-bearer: "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He shall sustain thee." Jesus says, "Take my yoke upon you"—yoke, a collar to bind two oxen together, that two may easily do the work too heavy for one. Thus Jesus shares our load; hence his "burden is light."

2. Bondage.—"I will rid you out of their bondage." The Israelites were slaves. We, too, are slaves to habit, to tempers, to the fashion of the day, to Satan the tempter. Jesus is the Deliverer; trust Him, believe that He can free us; then earnestly serve Him, and we shall find freedom. "Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out." "My servants shall sing for joy of heart."

3. Redeem.—"I will redeem you." Redemption of slaves, common in Israel. This no mere promise to us, but fact: We are redeemed "with the precious blood of Christ." Let us claim this redemption. We are Christ's by right of purchase; dishonest if we serve any other. Lord, "take myself, and I will be ever, only, all for Thee!"

4. A People.—"I will take you unto Me for a people."—Israel, the chosen nation, that in her all ends of the earth might be blessed. Religion no selfish thing: "For their sakes I sanctify Myself." Called of God, chosen of God, that we may be witnesses of his love, that we may bless others.

5. A God.—"I will be to you a God." A tender, personal relationship here. God, our help in ages past." A call to confidence. His name is Counsellor. Let us lean trustfully on Him, seek his counsel, his strength. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

6. Know.—"Ye shall know that I am the Lord your God." "This is eternal life to know Thee." Jesus, the revelation of God our Father. Learn of Him, walk with Him day by day. Friendship, communion with Him, the ideal of life.

> "Evermore beside him on his way,
> The unseen Christ shall move,
> That he may lean upon his arm and say,
> Dost Thou, dear Lord, approve?"

7. The Land.—"I will bring you in unto the land." "Strangers and pilgrims, they seek a country" has been the characteristic of God's people in all times. While preparing for a world to come, the Christian is the best possible citizen of the world that now is. Fear not the last step of the way, Death, "a hushed and solemn tryste" with the soul's true Lover; "a covered way that leadeth unto light." Heaven, the heart's true home, where our treasure is. We know "how one angel smiles there;" some know how many smile there—those loved and gone before. Jesus is there and we shall see Him and be like Him.

But heaven, the place, means that heaven, the state, is within us, "The kingdom of heaven is within you." May Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, and transform us in character into his image.

The Necessity of a Mediator.

"There is one God and one Mediator between God and men—the Man Christ Jesus." (1 Tim. ii. 5.)

ONE of the common occupations of boys in the summer time is to collect the rays of light around them and focus them, by means of a burning glass, into one fiery spot. The concentrated light can burn its way into substances over which diffused light would have no power.

The ambition of a teacher is to achieve in the moral sphere a result similar to that which boys with a burning glass achieve in the physical sphere. He desires to focus his doctrine into burning sentences which will pierce both mind and heart.

In the familiar words which appear at the head of this article, the Apostle has focussed in a few words the whole work of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. All the details of our Lord's work are but the unravelling of this compressed truth.

Being the central and focal truth of the Christian faith, there is nothing more important than a right understanding of it and a right relation of soul towards it. It is no mere speculative matter, but a vital one which affects life from its centre outwards.

Yet by many of our contemporaries its truth is denied. We are told that God can be approached directly, and that a mediator is therefore unnecessary. God is our Father. Why then, it is asked, should there be any ceremony between a child and its parent?

THE REASON WHY.

I. St. Paul uses two chief terms, "God" and "men." Let us consider these. What does the Bible teach us about God? A rapid résumé must suffice here. It reveals to us a God who "is Spirit," possessing no shape that mortal eyes may behold; a God who is personal and who can see, hear, feel, love, think, and project mighty purposes; a God who is omnipotent, and who cannot be effectually resisted by his creatures; a God who is omnipresent, Master of all space as He is Master of all forces; a God who is infinite, bounded by no restrictions; a God who is eternal—without commencement or termination; and a God who is One, yet Triune. There is nothing contradictory between the notion of a Triune God and a Divine Unity, since moral unity is a matter entirely outside the mathematical radius. That there are three persons in one God is entirely a matter of revelation, and we have either to accept the truth or reject it—we cannot argue about it, since we know nothing beyond what has been revealed. We can, however, show that the doctrine of a trinity in unity is perfectly reasonable. Reasonable and revealed, it should, therefore, be accepted.

The second term is "men." What does the Bible teach us about man? In résumé, this: that man is a compound of matter and spirit; that he is personal, and is conscious of his individuality; that he is powerful, but far removed from omnipotence, since physical forces continually baffle him; that he is largely the prisoner of space; that he is mortal; and that he is but a fraction of a great whole. Human experience and instinct confirm all that the Bible teaches about man.

Now between God and man, as thus portrayed to us by revelation, there is of necessity a great gulf; the distance is immense.

Is it possible to bridge that gulf?

The Bible is emphatic upon one thing, i.e., that the gulf must be bridged if man is truly to live. Our Lord Himself said that life eternal consisted in knowing the only true God and the Christ whom He had sent.

The Bible also as emphatically announces that the gulf can be bridged. Indeed, it is its one message, that man can know God. But the Bible gives one warning which many men of our time have thought fit to ignore; viz., that the abyss between God and man cannot be crossed from man's side. Men have no means whatever of crossing it. The Bible is clear about this: "Canst thou by searching find out God?" "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" "The world by its wisdom knew not God." History is only the practical commentary upon this truth. In ancient Athens, men aspired after the Divinity, and then confessed their failure by erecting an altar to "The Unknown God." Left to himself man can never find the light, he is

DOOMED TO BE AN AGNOSTIC.

Neither "guesses at truth," nor splendid ideas about God, can grant us what we supremely need, the knowledge of God. If the gulf is to be bridged it must be from God's side. The glorious message of the Gospel is, that it has been so bridged, and that the way is open to all, and that there is but one way.

II. What is that way? How is the chasm bridged? How are these two terms "God" and "men" united?

The unique reply of the Christian faith is, through the mediation of God the Son. "There is one God and one Mediator . . . . the Man Christ Jesus." "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life: no man cometh unto the Father but through Me."

It is at this point that the rebellion of human pride begins. Many men think they can reach God the Father apart from the mediation of the Son. They say: "Look at the story of the prodigal son. This boy degraded himself to the uttermost; and yet, when he repented, the father received him and welcomed him, without any person acting as mediator between them." This is one of the "Unitarian" strongholds—they never cease quoting the parable of the Prodigal Son. But what an unfair thing it is to select one parable only of our Lord's, and make it responsible for the whole truth about human relations to God! Jesus did not tell the whole truth about God and man in that one parable, which itself is but one of a series, each conveying its own particular lesson. And, what is worse, they who eternally quote this parable as teaching direct and unmediated access to God very rarely remind their hearers or readers that the same Jesus who spake that parable also said, "No man cometh unto the Father but through Me." This intellectual on the part of those who profess to believe in the Fatherhood of God discovers itself, upon examination, to be most unreasonable. It mutilates the idea of God as given in the Bible—selecting what pleases it and rejecting what it disapproves.

It minimises the greatness of God by reducing Him to a lower level, and clothing Him with human sentiment. It exaggerates the importance of man by teaching him that he can be on free and easy terms with the dread Supreme. And its futility is demonstrated in the fact that where this teaching prevails an intellectual vanity is generated which has for its accompaniments a cold and formal worship, a negation of the Gospel, and sterility in all missionary enterprise.

Lewisham, S.E.

(To be Concluded.)

"But God Said ——."

BY REV. H. ELVET LEWIS, HARECOURT CHAPEL.

"BUT God said ——," so we read, as we come to the close of the Parable of the Rich Fool. How silently, how awfully it comes in! "Eat, drink, and be merry," were the man's final words to his soul; "but God said ——."

God had said something before. It was He who had made the ground of the rich man bring forth plentifully. But the man in his vanity speaks of "my fruits and my goods," as if he had commanded the rain, and ruled the sun, and made the harvest. Like every selfish man, he was a practical atheist. And he had made himself deaf to God's voice. Waving fields had uttered God's name to him, but he refused to listen. Standing sheaves had rebuked his shallowness, but he had succeeded in silencing all the voices of God's goodness. But now God said ——, and there was no escape from the words.

The man had said much to himself. He had spoken to his soul. But evidently there was not much familiar intercourse between them, for he used language that would not be intelligible to the soul. "Thou hast much goods laid up!" But a soul cannot live in barns. Its bread, no land on earth can produce. "Take thine ease"—when it was shivering on the steep, tremendous brink! "Eat, drink"—when its table was bare. "Be merry"—such mirth as may be had in the gateways of death and hell. But let us be careful how we condemn his folly; our talks with our soul may be just as empty, just as tragic.

"But God said——" Last of all, and most decisive of all. God speaks when all other voices are forcibly silenced. There is no keeping his sayings out of our life. The most gracious sayings are his, and the most solemn warnings and the final word of judgment. Man must either be helped or haunted of God for ever. One word of God scattered all the man's goods, and swept away the "many years" like a fallen leaf. When God finally speaks, the real soul listens. It was not too late for that man's soul to hear and understand. Did it?

Let us be thankful to Jesus Christ for this: He has helped each of us to find our soul. Little children, publicans, sinners, outcasts—He has helped them all to find their own soul. But when we find it, let us speak to it wisely. For some day, to our soul, also, God will say——. What shall He say? That depends on what we say now. God's last word will be the doom of our folly, or the hallowing of our wisdom. Let us talk respectfully to our soul.

Thoughts for Parents.

MANNERS.

Be courteous.—(1 Peter iii. 8.)

"MANNERS makyth manne." Good manners are more attractive than the beauty of face. Parents, ever remember your example: if you drop your manners to them, can you expect the children to do otherwise? The atmosphere of courtesy must be created by father and mother, who will require tact, constant vigilance, and patience to that end.

Do not fail to train the young in home courtesies—the placing of a chair, opening of a door, the attentive eye and ear at table; services such as these nourish love.

Avoid disagreeable topics, jokes upon personal and mental infirmities; be careful of the feelings of relatives. Why do people push and scramble for the best places? Why do they snatch and bang doors, interrupt and contradict? Because self is first with them. Teach the young ones never to lose a chance of giving pleasure to others. Good manners have been defined as an "unselfish regard for the feelings of others." FRANCES S. HALLOWES.

 A correspondent calls attention to Dr. Andrew Murray's book, "The Children for Christ." (2s. 6d. Nisbet.) She says: "The worth of the book can hardly be over-estimated as a spiritual study of a subject of paramount importance to all Christian parents."

Persuasive Preaching.

By Rev. J. H. CARTWRIGHT, Sheffield.

THE Methodist preachers of Sheffield were recently discussing the important question: "Why are not more persons converted under our ministry?" A young minister of the Primitive Methodists, Rev. J. Bradbury, in a suggestive paper, emphasised the supreme importance in preaching of persuasive and definite appeals for decision. Rev. Dr. Crothers took up the point of persuasiveness in preaching, and with great force, dwelt upon its necessity as an element of success. There is grave reason to believe that he was right in suggesting that the preachers of to-day do not always keep before them the thought that they ought to seek to secure an immediate response to the Gospel message.

The old preachers of the Evangelical Revival declared a free, full, and present salvation. As Dr. Crothers said, all the Evangelical churches agree as to the freeness—the universal application—of the salvation of Christ. There is a growing consensus of teaching as to the fulness of salvation. But is there the distinct emphasis to-day there ought to be on the glorious truth of the present salvation of Christ?

It is the solemn and blessed recognition of this truth on the part of the preacher that will give a powerful persuasiveness in preaching. The vivid and the unwavering conviction that Christ is here and now ready to pardon every penitent sinner, ought to lend impressiveness and power to the appeal for immediate decision. The preacher does not deal with theories and principles capable only of application to his hearers at some distant date. The sinner is in present peril from which he needs a present deliverance. And the evangel the preacher is commanded to proclaim is, that Christ now waits to save. "The King's business requireth haste." The heavenly Guest is on the threshold. "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." And who are we to parley with the King of Heaven? It must ever be the preacher's chiefest joy to plead for a ready response to the call of Christ.

A sermon has been defined as a persuasive oration. And no deliverance from the pulpit, however eloquent or pleasing, is worthy of the name of sermon which makes no appeal for obedience to the truth which is set forth. And the obedience must be rendered forthwith. No resolution is good which postpones right-doing for a single hour; and the hearty acceptance of the message of Jesus ought to be but the counterpart of its announcement.

Some few years ago Mr. Gladstone gave an account of a conversation with Dr. Döllinger on the subject of preaching, in which the latter said that if ever the English Church was to do its work for the nation it must change its methods in this vital particular, and instead of the clergy must aim straight at the hearts of the people. That warning is still needed by Churchmen and Nonconformists alike. The cold, correct essay—

Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null, must give place to the warm and direct appeal of a preacher whose soul is aflame with Divine enthusiasm, and filled with the Holy Ghost.

Is it possible to over-estimate the importance of insisting upon an immediate response to the Gospel message? With what loving persuasion should the messen ger of the Cross address himself to this urgent need! The beautiful account which the Baroness Langenau, of Vienna, gives of her own conversion is instructive on this point:—"For years and years I had been told that Jesus was the Saviour of the world, that He was always willing to save, but here"—that was in the obscure Methodist mission chapel in the Austrian capital—"I was told for the first time that He will not save us without our own consent; that He invites and entreats, but we must decide; that our will must be put on his side; that He will not take possession of our hearts unless we are willing to receive Him. 'Be willing now, now, now,' was

THE BURDEN OF ALL THE SERMONS

I heard there. At last my eyes were opened, I surrendered my will, I trusted and was saved."

No man can urge with overwhelming force this plea for instant and immediate submission to Christ, save he who vividly realises the constant presence and the power of the Holy Ghost. When to the persuasive eloquence of human lips there is added the tender pleading of the Heavenly Advocate, then the sinner trembles, his heart is melted; and his will subdued ultimately, and in the highest sense. Persuasiveness in preaching is one of the fruits of the enduement with power—the Baptism of the Holy Ghost.

"The Man with a Message."

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

TO the trees new life was coming. Fresh vigour pulsed through every twig. The air was touched with the invigorating balm of approaching spring.

All this gave no cheer to the old man as he walked into Hyde Park gate leaning on his stick.

Charlton had seen the going of seventy summers. They had taken from him those he loved; had robbed him of his health and money. Hope and desire had taken flight. A lonely, comfortless being, with cold and aching heart, he wandered on, lost in thoughts that did not give him peace.

On one of the seats he rested. Placing his stick before him, he put both hands on the top, and laid his chin upon his hands. As thought went through his weary mind, his face became contorted and sad. A picture of desolation, he sat alone.

Behind him there came a man, holding in his hands a letter, so intently reading that he stumbled against the corner of the seat. The old man sighed and started up to see a tall dark-haired person beside him.

"I beg your pardon, friend, you were dreaming. I was reading a message," said the stranger.

"It is to be hoped your message is better than my dream then," was the grumbled answer.

"In that, you ought to be the best judge, since you are aged. May I read it out and hear your opinion?" Lifting the sheet of letter paper nearer to his eyes, the unknown man read; "If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things"? (Romans viii. 31, 32.)

"I know nothing about that," said Charlton, "I only know

LIFE IS ONE BIG DISAPPOINTMENT.

One is pursuing something that eludes the grasp all through. The end comes before any good is accomplished. Hope cheats, all things leave one, and despair settles in." Again the chin was laid on the trembling hands upon the stick.

"God grant you may wake out of such a terrible dream as that, old friend. May He give you the good He gave me out of this truth. I had wandered into doubts and fears. This letter came to me with kind advice, but the best part is this from God's Word. I find it all here in these few words: God, Jesus, Atonement, Justification, Assurance. Read it with that thought and see."

Charlton took the paper; his hand shook; his keen eye, in spite of years, peered at the words.

"Oh, yes, it may be so. All very good, no doubt, but out of my line now. I'll bid you good-day; 'tis cool to sit longer."

The old man wandered on. He shivered at the rising breeze, and as the children ran and laughed, he turned to leave the park.

* * * * *

A cheerless room, with a tiny light from a lamp making a shadow on the whitened wall. A sharp outline of a man's face as he lay upon his bed. He had been very still; now he moves, and eagerly fumbles for a book from the table near the bed.

For days his thoughts had been running along new tracks, feeling after some firm ground to stand upon. The book is old; he had a strip of paper placed within it, where he reads by his feeble light:

"If God be for us." "God!" he repeats, and leaning back he thinks. Then raising himself once more he reads:

"Spared not his own Son:" Atonement, "Delivered Him up for us all." "With Him," Jesus, "give us all things, Justification and Assurance." The cold expression changes to a cheerful look. Hope chases despair away. The feeble frame vibrates to the music of redemption. Charlton has wanted this to reach his wretched life, yet knew it not. Now he is old and worn; Nature has received her summons to give up her hold; he has but another week to live; but there, at last he prays, and takes God's unspeakable gift, the Christ who died to save.

"Hannah, come near," he said to his granddaughter who lived with him; "where is he?"

"Whom do you mean, grandfather?" she asked.

The old face brightened again as he answered, "I mean the man with the message."

"You are dreaming; there has been no one here," she said.

"No, my girl, he woke me out of my dream; he brought me a message of hope. Hannah, I wish he had come long ago, and saved me all the years of needless gloom. But you must wander out, as I did. Perhaps he'll come along your way. I'm tired. I cannot tell you now." She watched him close his eyes. He looked so strangely calm, so really satisfied, she

WONDERED WHAT HAD HAPPENED.

The sun was shining when he spoke again. "Get it very quickly, Hannah, while I have power to show you—the old book, there. Hand it to me."

She took the Bible from his shaking hand.

"'Tis all there. Why did I never find it? All there—the balm to heal life's woes, the hope to gladden the heart. Thank God for that man with the message."

Hannah marvelled to see the change. He had been so irritable and sharp. She read the words aloud. "Take it in, my girl, all your life will be altered, and see to it that others hear of it when you grasp the truth."

"Grandfather, you are ill, what shall I get you?"

A long, still look upward. The old pinched face relaxed into peaceful repose as he said, "He freely gives us all things, even peace in death." The tired man lay tranquil in his last sleep, his soul trusting in his Saviour.

Multitudes traverse our world baffled by life's mysteries, worn by life's cares, longing for some solution and relief. In Christ's name we ask, "Where is the man with the message?" Where are those who know the glad tidings of great joy? Are they so engrossed in their own delight that they cannot spare time to tell to sinners round what a Redeemer they have found? Or are they growing cold and forgetting the time is short?

"Speak, lips of mine, and tell abroad
The praises of thy God.
Speak, stammering tongue, in gladdest tone,
Make his high praises known."

Protestant Girls' Aid Society. — This useful organisation, which works in connection with the Rotunda and other Dublin hospitals, assists erring young women, taking charge of their children, and thus enabling them to obtain employment. Much success has attended the effort, the first annual report, which has just been issued, showing that the society was able to aid almost every case which came under its rules during the year. Starting with eight children, which the chaplain had already taken in hand, the society undertook the supervision of thirty additional children, making a total of thirty-eight for the year. The children are put out to Protestant nurses, and paid for wholly or in part by the society. In the majority of cases the girls are able to earn enough to support their children, and indeed they do so most loyally when able. Communications may be addressed to Rev. J. O. Gage Dougherty, chaplain, Rotunda Hospital, Dublin.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, March 5. Numbers xvi.

IT was a very serious revolt, because so many princes associated themselves with the Levites. The root was evidently jealousy. "Wherefore lift ye up yourselves?" they said to Moses and Aaron, "all the congregation are holy." How easily the same thought may intrude into the hearts of Christian fellow-workers, as against those who stand in the forefront as leaders and guides!

It is remarkable that the record of Moses' extraordinary meekness precedes this story (chap. xii. 3). Whenever we receive some conspicuous blessing, it is sure to be tested. All our graces have to pass through the cleansing fires of trial. The more beautiful any trait is, the more eager God is that everything which would corrupt or tarnish it may be removed. It is just because you excel in a certain point of your character that you are specially exercised there. And in the case of Moses, there seems to have been some signs of a ruffled temper—"Moses was very wroth." Take the best men at the best, and there is a flaw. But Jesus is absolutely flawless, "I am meek and lowly in heart."

But notice the beautiful spirit of intercession (v. 22). Of course, we are not meant to believe that the servant was more merciful than the Divine Master, but that the natural course of the Divine justice would have been to destroy all, had it not been for the love of the Divine heart—as expressed, to an extent, in Moses and Aaron, but as regnant supremely in the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world.

MONDAY, March 6. Numbers xvii.

The Epistle to the Hebrews specially mentions Aaron's rod that budded among the contents of the sacred Ark, symbolising the unwithering Priesthood of our Lord.

In one aspect of his life, He was as a root out of a dry ground, without form or comeliness, without beauty that He should be desired. The blasts of suffering through which He passed stripped Him bare. He might have adopted the complaint of the outcast—"Behold, I am a dry tree" (Isaiah lvi. 3). As such He was buried, as such He was regarded by those who hated Him.

But in the dark silence of the grave the Rod of David began to bud and blossom and bear fruit; and in the Resurrection there came forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots bore fruit. Many centuries have passed since then, but there has been no cessation in the green beauty of that tree. Successive generations have sat beneath its shadow, and found its fruit sweet to their taste.

But there is a greater marvel than even the Tabernacle saw. Myriads have been grafted into the Living Branch, and have become the means through which it has yielded fruit to the world. Whenever the individual Christian is tempted to congratulate himself on his usefulness or fruitfulness, he is reminded of his utter dependence and indebtedness. "Thou couldest receive nothing, if it were not given thee from above. From Me is thy fruit found."

TUESDAY, March 7. Numbers xviii.

The arrangements of this chapter were the Divine answers to the sad complaint of the last verses of the previous one; and there is therefore a remarkable parallel to Psalm xc., which was probably composed by Moses about this time. "Behold, we perish, we are undone, we are all undone. Everyone that cometh near unto the Tabernacle of the Lord, dieth." This excessive mortality among the people was apparently due to the attempts of unauthorised persons to minister in the holy place; and thus, by ignorance and disobedience, not conforming to the prescribed ritual, they brought judgment on themselves, and those with whom they were associated. Hence the provisions of this chapter.

The inner service of the Tabernacle was delegated to the priests of the house of Aaron; they were to keep the charge of the sanctuary and of the altar, whilst the Levites waited on them, and did service in other directions. Let it be always borne in mind, that all who have been cleansed and pardoned by the blood of Jesus are constituted priests and kings unto God. We are a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people. It is for us therefore to occupy our priesthood; for everything of the altar that belongs to consecration—the yielding or presenting of our members to God as a reasonable service—all that has to do with the blessed privilege of intercession within the veil, is for our special charge.

In proportion as we do his works, God will care for our maintenance. It is his pleasure Himself to be our inheritance: "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup; Thou maintainest my lot; the lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places, yea I have a goodly heritage. . . ."

WEDNESDAY, March 8. Numbers xix.

The beautiful significance of "the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean" is unsurpassed by any other of the sacrifices which the ancient code prescribed.

In that red heifer we have a living presentation of Jesus. He was without blemish or spot; his gift of Himself was free; He was accounted an unholy thing, and suffered without the gate. The mingling of fresh running water sets forth the perennial value of his sacrifice, and is the typical expression of the truth, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.

We are always contracting defilement. Contact with those who are dead in trespasses and sins; the permission of corrupting and unholy thoughts; the glance of the eye on pictures and paragraphs which minister to the lower parts of our nature—all these defile. "Whatsoever may enter a man from without cannot defile him," Jesus said, "because it goeth not into his heart. For from within, out of the heart of men, evil thoughts proceed—deceit, an evil eye, pride, foolishness, all these evil things proceed from within and defile the man." And our defilement always separates: it separates us from the camp of the Church of God, so that we feel out of harmony and touch with the religious life of others, and we even spread the defilement; it separates us, also, from God, who is of purer eyes than to behold permitted sin in his children.

THURSDAY, March 9. Numbers xx.

In this chapter, three dark threads are woven—failure, disappointment, death.

Failure. It is always saddest when a noble ship strikes a rock or shoal, within sight of land. But it was thus that Moses failed. And he failed in his faith, wherein he had always been so strong. "The Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, Ye believed not in Me." Apparently, he felt that something stronger than speech was needed to bring water from the rock; and he fell back, therefore, on the miracle which stood at the commencement of the wanderings, when he struck the rock. "He smote the rock with his rod twice." It was an act of disobedience and unbelief, and in his case was terribly punished; but the mercy of God to the people was not restrained because of his sin.

Disappointment. It was an ungracious act, on the part of Edom, to forbid the passage of Israel, so nearly akin, and it was never forgotten. The feud was perpetual (see Psa. cxxxvii. 7, Isa. lxiii. 1). Such disappointments, which seemed like turned lessons and waste time, have their opportunities for acquiring patience and meekness (Jas. i. 12).

Death. Aaron died; and Eleazar took his place, to be in turn succeeded by his son. But of Jesus, it is witnessed that He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, and therefore He ever liveth to make intercession. "Who hath been made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless (an indissoluble) life."

FRIDAY, March 10. Numbers xxi.

There are three snatches of ancient poetry in this chapter, which are more apparent in R.V.—v. 14, 15; v. 17, 18; v. 27-30.

The brazen serpent is for ever illuminated by our Saviour's own reference. He knew that inevitable death awaited Him, and said, "so must the Son of Man be lifted up." It is always a wonderful thought which is suggested by the symbol, for in this type the cause of suffering of death becomes the source of healing of life. The serpents bite to death; the brazen serpent becomes salvation to those that regard it. Is there not a deep similarity between this and the law of vaccination, in which disease is prevented by inoculation with the disease? In the streets of Bombay notices are exhibited in English and the vernacular, inviting all who will to come for inoculation.

But, O our Saviour, we see Thee here, who wast bitten to death by venomous and hateful sin; who because the children were partakers of flesh and blood didst Thyself become one in the same, that Thou mightest taste death for every man, and become the Author of Eternal Life to all who believe.

SATURDAY, March 11. Numbers xxii.

We now meet with a name, which the later Scriptures still heap with ignominy. "They went astray, having followed the way of Balaam, the son of Beor, who loved the hire of wrong-doing . . . these are springs without water and mists driven by a storm; for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved" (2 Pet. ii. 17). "Woe unto them! for they went in the way of Cain, and ran riotously in the error of Balaam for hire" (Jude 11).

We may have great insight into God's truth, and yet at last be castaways. Balaam had this. He said himself that "he had the vision of the Almighty." But whilst he was able to warn and instruct others, he crashed on the dark reef of destruction, making shipwreck of his faith. Truth, which is not obeyed, may become our snare and doom. All teachers should beware that they do not rest satisfied with knowing, or even exhorting. "Thou knowest his will, and approvest the things that are excellent, and art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them that are in darkness; thou therefore that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?"

We may know God's will, and yet try to alter or evade it. Balaam had been told simply and plainly that he was not to go; but the larger bribe led him to endeavour to extract permission to accompany Balak's messengers. How often do we attempt to bring God round to our way of thinking by promises and undertakings and ingenious reasonings! He gives us our desire, but sends leanness into our souls, and ultimate disaster.

Glimpses of Romanism.

IV.—The Papal Church in Italy a Political Organisation.

By Rev. ALEX. ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

In a former article I endeavoured to show that the claim of the Papal Church to be regarded as a Christian Church is a false claim, for it is Christian neither in doctrine (offering salvation in sin) nor in practice (deteriorating all it comes into contact with). That description was for the most part negative, but now I wish to give a description that shall be positive. If the Papal Church is not Christian, what is it? I answer, It is a political organisation; I might say a political conspiracy.

Up till September 20, 1870, the Pope was a temporal sovereign, and on the testimony even of his French and Austrian friends, headed by Count Metternich, the worst governing sovereign the world ever saw. The condition of the Papal States was a disgrace to humanity. But on that date the Italian troops, under Victor Emmanuel and Guiseppe Garibaldi, entered Rome, and the Pope, as a temporal sovereign, was dethroned. From that day to this the Papal Church in Italy has existed as a political organisation, working by fair means and foul for the restoration of the temporal power. And though its cause is hopeless, for, as an Italian syndic once said to me, "Every mother in Italy would give her last son's blood to prevent it, and we would turn Italy into a vast slaughter-house before we would give the Pope an inch of Italian soil," the Papacy has never abated one jot or title of its claim, and is working at its hopeless task more diligently than ever.

In proof of this let me refer to the riots that took place in Florence, Milan, and other places last May. These riots, as has been proved in the Italian courts of justice, were brought about by the united action of who became fast friends and allies for this purpose. Amongst ten papers brought into court to prove the guilt of the Church was one in the shape of a post-card, on one side of which was a portrait of the Pope, and on the other words to this effect:—

The Pope is king of kings and lord of lords. He is above all temporal sovereigns. For the maintenance of his position given him by Christ he must be invested with temporal sovereignty, of which he has been sacrilegiously deprived. Though the Pope's temporal sovereignty is not an article of faith, yet it is so closely related to an article of faith that those who do not work for its realisation, render themselves liable to eternal perdition. Let no one imagine he can escape, because millions are opposed to the temporal power, nor because the highest in the land are amongst that number (a reference to King Humbert), for remember there was a Judas amongst the twelve, who went to his own place.

Of this treasonable document some sixty thousand were printed and distributed in Milan alone, chiefly amongst the poor and ignorant, who were thus encouraged to rise in rebellion against their sovereign and government.

On September 20 last, at a public meeting held in Venice, around the statue of Fra Paolo Sarpi, in commemoration of the overthrow of the Pope's temporal sovereignty, a speaker said, "When Sarpi was stabbed by Pope Paul V. the whole Republic rose in indignation against the assassin, and how should we act when there sits in Rome, in the Vatican, not the assassin of an individual, but the assassin of a nation." Publicly, universally, in Italy, the Papal Church is recognised as a political conspiracy, and publicly and universally denounced as such.

But the kingdom of Italy does not rest in simple recognition, and in denouncement of the Church as a political conspiracy, it deals with it as such. Its whole attitude towards it, and all its legislation regarding it, are framed to thwart and render abortive its political intrigues and plottings. There is nothing that can be called persecution of the Church, but at the same time the priest is shut out of every sphere that touches the civil rights of the people. The priest cannot exercise religious terrorism in the pursuit of his political ends, as he can in England and Scotland, and especially in Ireland. He is checkmated in this by what is called the New Penal Code, which was passed some ten years ago. By this Act, "any minister of religion who, in the exercise of his office, in the pulpit, in confession, or in visiting from house to house, talks against the King and Constitution, or disturbs the peace of families, renders himself liable to fine, imprisonment, and dismissal from office."

Now let me give a few illustrations to show

HOW THE ACT WORKS.

At Brescia some few years ago a parish priest denounced from the altar a candidate for Parliament, and threatened to withhold the so-called privileges of the Church from any who should vote for him. At the close of the service the police were informed of this. They then communicated with the priest, and said that he had been reported to them as using language calculated to terrorise the people; but, as they were unwilling to bring the law to bear upon him without warning, they would overlook the offence for this once, but if it were repeated he would have to take the consequences. Next Sunday the priest again used the same language, when he was instantly apprehended, tried by jury, and sentenced to pay a fine of 500 francs (£20), to suffer two months' imprisonment, and to be debarred for five years from exercising the office of the priesthood.

Again, Catholic parents frequently send their children to Protestant schools, in which case a priest sometimes calls upon them and threatens to refuse them absolution till the children are removed. The father, as a rule, tells him to keep his absolution, for he has no need for it, but sometimes the mother is made anxious and family peace is disturbed. The father then calls in the police, when the priest is told that he cannot be allowed to annoy an Italian subject for doing what the law permits. The law permits parents to send their children to Protestant schools, and, unless he gives these parents all the privileges of the Church as they desire them, the new Penal Code will be brought to bear upon him.

Again, priests have ever been famous, or rather infamous, for the exercise of terrorism at the bedsides of the sick and dying, so as to secure their property and money. I heard lately of a priest in Ireland going to visit a dying man, when he took a lawyer with him, and a will was drawn out by which the dying man left all his property to the Church, and a will by which he left it to his relatives was set aside. Well, such a thing could not happen in Italy. The State would instantly cause the Church to disgorge, and the priest would in all probability go to prison. This actually happened in the case of a peasant who died in one of the Riviera villages. He lived alone, and after his death a will was found by which all his money had been left to the Church. But his sons returned from America, took the priest to court, upset the will, secured all their father's money, and the priest went into penal servitude.

There are several other laws in Italy by which the priest is kept in check, but I shall reserve speaking of these till another time. Meantime, I close by saying that Italy has realised what England once realised, but apparently has forgotten, but which she will have to realise again, the utter incompatibility of a free Roman Catholic Church and a free Constitution existing together. One or other must go to the wall. Italy has decided on the enjoyment of a free Constitution, therefore she has passed these Roman Catholic disabilities acts to keep the priests in check.

The strange thing is that a Roman Catholic country has such laws, and that in England they should have been abolished. Therefore it is that England swarms with priests, and therefore is it that they invade every department of public service, always and everywhere working against everything that underlies individual and national liberty, and prosperity, and greatness.

Protestant Outlook.

When matters of ritual have been the subject of legal investigation, the outcome has not always been satisfactory. This is a perplexing element at the present time, as a correspondent points out in the Echo of February 24. Under twelve heads he groups facts and practices on which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have decided variously—now for, now against; at one time "you may," and at another "you may not!"

An esteemed correspondent writes with sorrow:—"There seems to be fewer and fewer really Evangelical 'Churches" of England now; the service is generally more or less ornate, perhaps frequently in the hope of keeping fashionable women and young people from going to downright Ritualistic places."

At a festival in connection with the English Church Union at Brighton last week, Rev. T. O. Marshall, organising secretary, said it was now a case of the Church being governed by the man in the street—by public opinion—but they could not submit to that. Rev. G. Bayfield Roberts, vicar of Elmstone, in the course of an address on the ornaments rubric, said that in the early days of Queen Elizabeth the country swarmed with Kensits and Walshes. High Churchmen wanted it to be remembered that they were the Catholic Church in England; if the assertion of that principle was dependent on bringing the Bishops out of the House of Lords, and bringing about disestablishment and disendowment, then in God's name let the Bishops go out of the House of Lords, and let disestablishment and disendownment come!

Rev. Dr. Hamilton, President of Queen's College, Belfast, by way of explaining his attitude on the Roman Catholic University question, has written "to disabuse the public mind of the idea that the question to be decided was whether Roman Catholic University education was to be endowed by the State or not. This was already done for better or worse. The public were not aware that for the last twenty years, by a secret method devised by Lord Beaconsfield and mainly carried through by him and his Chancellor, Lord Cairns, there was now annually conveyed into the coffers of the Roman Catholic University in Dublin an endowment provided by Parliament almost equal in amount to that which was given to Queen's College, Belfast."

Striking tracts on Romanism in England and America have been published by Mr. A. Le Lievre, sec. of the Protestant Press Agency, 46, Arundel Square, Barnsbury, N. (2s. 10d. per 100, post free). It is held that Romanism as a system is on the decline in both countries. In Ireland, evangelical proselytising is vigorously denounced. We trust this may lead many to read "The True Religion; or, Proselytism Unveiled," by "One of the Victims." (2½d. post free. Dublin: Carson Brothers, 7, Grafton street.) The pages tell of one who was delivered from Romish bondage, and has for some time been engaged in Gospel work. Booklets of special value for their positive teaching on truths distorted by Romanism are: "On the Holy Communion" (4d. net), two sermons, by Dr. Handley Moule; and "Confession" and "Our Great High Priest" (3d. each net), by the same author. These are small but singularly useful publications (Cambridge: A. P. Dixon, 9, Market-street.). Rev. Charles A. Fox has written a choice little book entitled "The Present Priesthood of Our Lord Jesus Christ" (3d. Partridge). The treatment is remarkably comprehensive—sound and rich in spiritual truth.

London City Mission.—For fifty weeks of the year each of the Society's 460 missionaries is at work as a "fisher of men" amid the poisoned atmosphere of London's crowded courts. The other two weeks are devoted to a well-deserved holiday at the seaside homes. During the past year 207 missionaries and 137 wives have been received for the fortnight's rest at Ventnor, and at Folkestone 101 missionaries and eighty-five wives. Help for the Holiday Fund is pleaded for by the secretaries, 3, Bridewell Place, London, E.C.

The Needs of the City.

By Ex-BAILIE CHISHOLM, Glasgow.*

THE phrase, "the needs of the city," might well seem a paradox. Are not our great cities the source of our country's strength? Do not the youth and energy, the courage and enterprise of the whole land stream in daily? When help or assistance in time of need of any kind is desired for country town or fishing village or crofter's clachan, is it not to the city that the appeal is made, and seldom made in vain? Alas! our great cities lead a dual life. They are, it is true, our joy and pride, but they are at the same time our dread and our shame. Vice and crime, misery and degradation co-exist with all that is brightest and best. There are influences at work dragging down to poverty, seducing to vice, and recruiting the ranks of lawlessness and crime.

Now it would be easy to draw such a picture of the combined sin and poverty that prevail, so that, while every line would be true and justified, its general impression, being one-sided, would be false. Take, for example, the grim, haggard, sordid poverty that prevails. If we indulge in our description of this, and forget that the working population of the city have in the savings bank some six or seven millions to their credit, every word might be true and the impression false. And yet the poverty that prevails among us is appalling. There are, even in times of industrial prosperity, hundreds of men and women for whom no door seems to open, and who are every day tempted, in the one case to steal, and in the other to sell their virtue or to starve. From hundreds of homes there rises the slow, sad wail of children for want of food, and child-murders that are never heard of in the courts of justice darken the picture which the recording angel sees.

The old delusion under which Dick Whittington tramped to London town has not yet died out, and from all parts of the country there is a constant stream of men and women to the city, believing that here there is something to do that will raise them above the fear of want; but many of them fall sooner or later into the ranks of despair.

There are tens of thousands of bright and homely dwellings—although one-roomed houses—but alongside of these there is a vast kingdom of slumdom. Much has been done, but only those who can realise how much yet remains to be done. There are few things more pitiable in life than to see beside the lordly mansions of the favoured ones this kingdom of slumdom, regarding which one is almost constrained to say, "All hope abandon ye who enter here." Men and women are herded together here by the hundred, and for them a life of purity is almost impossible. The temptations which seek to lead astray from the paths of rectitude and virtue are more to be dreaded than are the difficulties which beset many to make a good living, and these fall heavily on the young and inexperienced.

I suppose it is sufficient to brand one as a hopeless fanatic when doctors of divinity and professors of theology are vying with each other as to who would say the best word for the theatre, when a solitary individual protests that and as anybody as ever known it, is a source of incalculable danger. It is all very well to write panegyrics on an ideal theatre, but if the gentlemen who indulge in that pastime could give us such a stage as they admire, with all the concomitants which I, as well as they, desiderate, we would then be in a better position to judge. It is easy for paterfamilias to take his wife and children to the theatre; he can choose the night to go and the play to hear; but in a very short time these children—young men now—will go alone, and they will find what their father never discovered—that the approaches to the theatre, as you go in and as you retire, are beset with a crowd of traps which the theatre, through all its history, has never been able to shake off.

I must say a word on special forms of temptation which exist among us. I shall not be deterred by the fear of misrepresentation from naming first our modern public-house. It once occupied the place of supplying a needed physical refreshment, but in the vast majority of cases it simply ministers to a degraded passion, and is a trap to unwary and weak souls. These places live and prosper on the impoverishment and the ruin of the people. The replenishing of their tills means the deplenishing of our workmen's homes, and a rise in their returns is measured by a rise in the police returns of the city. In what may be called the social and material aspects the drink power perhaps never stood higher, but if righteousness and the highest morality are to rule the world, then surely the day of our deliverance is near.

Public solicitation to gambling and to immorality is another

PAINFUL FEATURE OF OUR CITY LIFE.

The frequent exposures of these subjects in our police courts are not to be taken as proving how bad Glasgow is, but rather as an indication of the vigorous efforts which are taken to root these things out. There are continually coming into the city from town and country districts girls whose worst faults may have been restlessness, self-will, or a false independence of spirit; and there are fiends in female shape ever on the prowl to catch those unsuspecting girls, and under pretence of leading them to cheap lodgings, conduct them to houses of shame.

If these are things, or specimens of the things carried on in the city,

HOW ARE THEY TO BE MET?

There is much for the law to do. A pure, sober, and incorruptible police force could do very much. We cannot expect our police force to be above—considering their temptations, it is a great thing if they are up to—the average of the ordinary citizen. But in view of the influence they can and do exert, and the opportunities they possess to promote or frustrate the purity of our administration, it is of supreme importance that the average character of our police force should be kept high. And I rejoice at the existence and success of our Christian Police Association. If our police can do much, our magistrates can do more. When every occupant of the licensing bench—be he city magistrate or justice of the peace—rises to the height of his responsibility, and realises that he stands there to grant or to refuse applications, not because it will give this man an opportunity of making money or that this other man will inevitably lose it, but realising that it is the welfare of the people, then the glad day need not be far off when it will be easy to do right and difficult to do wrong.

But while the police may do much, and the corporation may do more, Christian men and women can do more than both. They have in their hands a weapon which the corporation could not use without defiling. The remedy for the city and the world is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Would it be too high an ideal for this and kindred associations to set before them, not only to preach the Gospel at every street corner, but to cherish the idea of carrying the Gospel directly into every home in the city? The trend of the times points to the necessity for something like this. The people will not come to our churches. They are not attending even our mission halls. But the Lord's command was to go to them; and it shall be that when every man says to his brother man "Know the Lord," that "all shall know Him from the least to the greatest."

* Notes of an address at the recent All-day Conference of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, Feb. 20.

The British and Foreign Sailors' Society has opened at Lowestoft a magnificent Sailors' and Fishermen's Bethel, which will hold over a thousand men. The cost has been over £4,500, £1,000 of which was given as a thankoffering by Mr. A. G. Boyd. The local clergy and ministers took part. It was announced that five new buildings will be added to the Society's stations this year, in home and foreign ports, at a cost of some £15,000. The meeting was one of the most enthusiastic, eventful, and far-reaching ever held in connection with the Society.

"Christ Healing the Blind Man."—John ix. 1-11.

Golden Text.—"He answered and said, Whether He be a sinner or no, I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see."—John ix. 25.

INTRODUCTORY.

OUR Lord's discussion with the Pharisees resulted in their conviction; their anger thereat rose to such a pitch that they attempted to stone Him, and He was obliged to withdraw Himself. Some think the incident in our lesson happened as Jesus was leaving the Temple, but the word used rather favours the idea that He was walking about in the city. Eight miracles are recorded by John; each one is like the text for the revelation of a great truth. The truths and incidents recorded in chaps. vii. to x. are peculiar to John's Gospel.

BLINDNESS.

In the East this is a common affliction, owing to the brightness of the sun, the fine dust in the air, and the sudden changes in temperature. Everywhere blind beggars are met with. It is said that one in 400 are blind in China, one in 100 in Egypt, while at Gaza one-third of the people have lost one or both eyes; yet to be born blind was a rare occurrence. Of our Lord's miracles which are recorded, seven were restoration of sight. (Get the scholars to name them.) One great work of Christianity has been to found "institutions for the blind." (Describe these and the mode of teaching, and so create interest.)

EXPOSITORY.

John ix. 1. It was the Sabbath day (v. 14). Only about six months before the Crucifixion. Jesus was never self-absorbed, but always looking out for opportunities to help others. Verse 2. The Jewish idea taken from the commandment (Ex. xx. 5). It is quite true that all sin brings its own punishment; but equally true that all affliction is not in punishment for sin. (Make this clear by illustrations. Tell of the heathen doctrine of transmigration of souls.) Verse 3. Every trouble which God sends is for some wise end. (Compare Mark ii. 5; John v. 14; Luke xiii. 1-5; John xi. 4.) Verse 4. Jesus was even conscious of his mission, his work was planned for Him by his Heavenly Father; each act must be done at the time appointed. His time for working on earth would soon end (John iv. 34; v. 19, 36; xi. 9; xii. 35; xvii. 4). Illustrate by our daily work. Light and darkness. Verse 5. Question the scholars about this truth, which was taught last week. References, John i. 9, iii. 19, xii. 35; Luke iv. 18, 21; Isa. xxix. 18, xxxv. 5, xlii. 7. (6.) Practical proof of the truth of Christ's words. He is the Light in two ways: by being the Sun and giving light, and by opening men's eyes to see the light. Saliva was believed to have salutary effect on the eyes; no ointment could have cured this man. Point out the kindness in helping this poor man's faith by a sign. (7.) Connect the name of the pool with v. 4. Ask for an Old Testament miracle something like this (2 Kings v. 10). Would he have been cured if he had washed in any other pool? Why? He had great faith, and obedience resulted. Picture the man coming home, and seeing his family for the first time. (8-11.) Discussions arising from the cure. Great change in all whom Jesus cures. The wonderful things we see when Jesus opens the eyes of our mind. Sketch the touching story to the end of the chapter. The tender Saviour.

LESSON TRUTHS.

1. We are all spiritually blind, the consequence of sin.
2. We are blind to our own condition; till we feel our need we do not seek for help, or know God's power and love.
3. Jesus only can open our eyes.
4. The use of means sanctioned by our Lord.
5. Use the means, and depend on God's blessing.
6. Contrast light and darkness; the efficacy of light.
7. The great change in us that is made by conversion; it must be seen if God is to be glorified.
8. The great need of obedience if we would be saved.
9. We obey one whom we perfectly trust and love.

GOLDEN TEXT.

"One thing I know," &c. If our eyes have been opened to see Jesus as our Saviour, we shall know it. Every thing will be changed to us: all earth will be more beautiful.

"Something lives in every line,
Christless eyes have never seen."

School for Bible Study.

THE way in which the gatherings have kept up in connection with the School for Bible Study is most encouraging. More than half the period of Ten Weeks has elapsed, but the interest has shown no signs of flagging. As announced last week, some of the centres have been discontinued, so as in a measure to concentrate the exertions of Professor White; the remaining centres are showing renewed vigour and increased attendance.

To the great satisfaction of the audiences, the high tone of the addresses has been fully maintained. This was to be expected, for, as we have already pointed out, Dr. White's object is not attained by merely feeding the intellect; the principles expounded are urged upon the conscience, and revealed truth is unfolded and enforced so as to glorify Christ and promote godliness of life.

A centre of special interest is that of the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, which meets every Wednesday afternoon. At the meeting last week there was an audience that numbered 2,000 or more, and for an hour the closest attention was given to the study of one of the most difficult passages of the profoundest book ever written by the great Apostle to the Gentiles. It was in full view of the fact that in the Pauline Epistles there are "some things hard to be understood, which the ignorant and unsteadfast wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction," that Dr. White opened up Rom. ix. to xi., in which is discussed and solved. In limine it was pointed out that the passage begins with sorrow and ends with praise; in substance, it sets forth the ways of God with man according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ.

The first chapter of the section deals with the Divine sovereignty, the second with free grace, the third with the results of these truths in soteriological application. It has reasonably been held that one cannot well understand and duly appreciate chapter ix., with its deep mysteries, until one has in a measure passed through the experiences of the preceding chapters of the book. Indicating the relationship between chapters ix. to xi. and the preceding part of the book, Dr. White pointed out that the theme of the Epistle is—the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation (i. 16). How comes it, then, that the Jews are discussed here? The answer is found in the fact that, although the Gospel is the power of God, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek, in the actual experience of the Apostle it appeared that Gentiles had more generally responded to the appeal. As a body of salvation. So, having spoken of results in the case of the Gentiles, the Apostle proceeds by contrast to speak of the absence of such results in the case of the Jews. He must explain why, to outward appearance, the Gospel has come short of being the power of God unto salvation to the Jew.

It is not with the political aspect of the Jewish question that the Apostle deals, but with the spiritual side of things, throwing light only indirectly upon other questions. Four main points are emphasised:—(1) Rejection of the Jews; (2) acceptance of the Gentiles; (3) restoration of the Jews; (4) result: redemption of the world.

Having outlined the process of thought in the chapters, Dr. White remarked: (1) That sovereignty on the part of God does not mean arbitrariness. God acts according to his sovereign will, but that will is holy, just, and good. (2) The freedom of the human will is a fact recognised in the Epistle, and patent to experience. (3) What is said of election must be studied in its contextual setting, and in the light of the purpose for which it is introduced. Sovereignty is contemplated as not inconsistent with or contrary to the freedom of the human will. (4) The reference to Pharaoh does not say that, for purposes of his own, God caused a man to be wicked, but that, taking a wicked man, He put him into a position of authority in order to make him subserve a providential purpose. God does not make men bad, but He takes men as they are, and deals with them according to their nature. (5) God's sovereignty is associated with mercy: He "endured with much long-suffering vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." God did not fit these men; they fitted themselves. God's mercy is seen in his tolerating them, and in fitting them for salvation. (6) There is a freedom which is identical with a moral freedom of doing right, and a freedom which is identical with a moral freedom of doing wrong. The former is true freedom; the latter is practical bondage. (7) God's will is an absolute and eternal norm of righteousness, and all He does is right. (8) The sovereignty of God's choice is contemplated in the light of the fact that all men are unworthy of such choice.

In some further explanatory words Dr. White remarked that every member of the race is disposed to question what the Apostle says regarding

GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY.

That fact shows that the philosophy of these chapters of the Epistle is not from man, but from God. The only way to find rest from the questionings raised by this mysterious problem is to yield one's soul to God, as a created intelligence bowing humbly at his feet. As to election, it had been for the good of the race, in order that many, and not merely a few, might be saved. God has appointed the means as well as the end of salvation, and those who accept Christ do so of their own free will. The election of Abraham brought a nation near to God; the election of the Church brings the entire world into contact with Divine grace. We must recognise the sovereignty of God as well as the freedom of man.

Telling us that Israel was rejected, the Apostle gives the reason—"because they sought righteousness by the works of the law and not by faith;" hence, arbitrary treatment on the part of God is excluded. Paul goes on to tell us that the method followed by the Jews could never be acceptable to God; Jew and Gentile alike must come under one method—righteousness on the ground of who is "the end of the law." The eleventh chapter presents two great truths. First, that the rejection of Israel is not total; "I also am an Israelite; . . there is a remnant according to the election of grace;" acceptance was never total, neither is the rejection. Secondly, Israel is to be restored: "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" The Apostle contemplates the sweep of God's gracious purpose: (1) He sees an election from Israel; (2) an election from the Gentiles; (3) the restoration of Israel; (4) redemption of the Gentiles as a whole in millennial times. Election has not been for favouritism, but for service; and in order that "all families of the earth might be blessed." In some concluding words, Dr. White dwelt upon God's continued purpose with Israel. If in these days Gentile peoples are the great evangelisers, the time is coming when the Jewish nation will take the Gospel throughout the world.

The hall at the Polytechnic, Regent Street, was crowded a good while before the hour of commencement on Friday evening. The subject was from the Old Testament—

THE BOOK OF EXODUS.

In some preliminary remarks, Professor White said that while the Bible tells us a great deal about men, and is the most interesting book which it is possible to study in order to understand human nature, it is not the principal object of the Book to tell us about men, women, and children, but about God. If we wish to know who God is, and what his mind is, we should study the Bible, which tells us that He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—our God.

The Old Testament deals with Palestine and the East; the New Testament with Palestine and the West. To-day the course of movement is from the West to the East again. There is a marvellous philosophy in the movement of things; as the Apostle says, the bounds of the habitations of the nations of men have been arranged with a view to the progress of God's revelation in the world (Acts xvii. 26-27). With Abraham in the first book of the Bible

ISRAELITISH HISTORY BEGINS.

God had hitherto dealt with the race as a whole; now He selected a family in order thereby to bless the world. "I will bless Thee, be Thou a blessing; . . in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Here we see the object of the Divine election.

The book of Beginnings closed with Joseph "in a coffin in Egypt." Israel had come upon dark times, but Joseph believed in God's purpose to deliver his people, and so he "gave commandment concerning his bones." Exodus opens with the story of the increase of the children of Israel, and of the rising of "a new king who knew not Joseph"—the new dynasty which oppressed the Hebrews. As in other studies, Dr. White grouped the contents of the various chapters round outstanding facts or words with the following result:—

EXODUS.

Chap:	Chap.	Chap.
1. Taskmasters.	12. The Passover.	25. } Tabernacle specifications:—"Thou shalt make." 23. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31.

3. The Bush.
4. The Rod.	14. Red Sea.

10. „ Locusts, Darkness.	22. }
11. Firstborn.	24. The Covenant.

Remarking on the story of the book, Dr. White indicated some of "the mistakes of Moses"—as when he slew the Egyptian whom he found abusing his kinsman; and, again when he made excuses against undertaking the mission which God placed in his hand. Having mentioned (on chap. v.) that bricks of the various kinds—with the ordinary proportion of straw, then with little, and at length with none at all—had been found in the region of Pithom, one of the treasure cities built by the Israelites, Dr. White spoke of the plagues, which were a stroke on the part of God at the idolatry of the Egyptians, and intended to show the almighty power of Jehovah. The entire Old Testament is written from the standpoint of men living in the midst of idolatry, against which, from beginning to end, it is a solemn protest. In the plague section, note how much is made of prayer. Wherever power is delegated to man from God you will find a man of prayer. On the some helpful words were spoken. Throughout the record Pharaoh is represented as a free agent, and we read again and again that he hardened his heart and refused to liberate the people. At the same time it is true that God hardened Pharaoh's heart. But how? By being merciful and forbearing with him in his sin! As God removed stroke after stroke, the wicked monarch grew more and more hostile. The Divine treatment brought out the character of Pharaoh, and showed that he was determined not to obey God. Sunshine softens wax, but it hardens clay. God holds man responsible for the use of his will; and if man will not learn the lessons of Divine mercy and judgment and turn to God, he will assuredly experience a hardening of heart.

In conclusion, a lesson was derived from the expression, so frequently found in the closing chapters, "as the Lord commanded Moses," combined with the sublime fact described at the close of the book—"the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." Disciples of Christ should be filled with the Holy Spirit. But how can we become a temple of God? How can the glory of the Lord come on us, and fill us and keep us clean? When Moses had "finished the work," . . . done as the Lord commanded, then "the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." So it is to-day. He giveth his Holy Spirit to "them that obey Him" (Acts v. 32).

 Many of our readers will be glad to hear that the Saturday afternoon course at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. has been resumed.

Calcutta College Y.M.C.A.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

WHILST Dr. White is engaged on his important campaign in London, it may be of interest to tell something of the work out of which he has come, and which his brother, is carrying on with so much blessing and success. It is indeed noteworthy work; and to stay in the midst of it with Mr. and Mrs. Campbell White, as I have done, gives such insight into, and confidence in, its methods, that the assurance grows that herein is one of the surest methods for India's regeneration.

MR. J. CAMPBELL WHITE,

These brothers come of an Ohio family, which has given two sons and three daughters to the service of Christ. One of the daughters is married to Mr. Mott, the memory of whose visits to Great Britain is fragrant to all who have met him or heard him speak.

Mr. Campbell White was born at Wooster, Ohio, in 1870, and as a lad had set his heart on the ministry; but whilst he was pursuing his education, his college was visited by Mr. Forman, in the interest of the Student Volunteer Movement. Beneath his burning words the young student resolved to consecrate his days to the mission field. Those who were directing the course of that marvellous movement became at once aware of the value of the young life which had been brought into sympathy with its principles; he was soon after appointed college secretary of the Y.M.C.A., and then travelling secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement.

After fulfilling these important offices, he went for a year to the Xenia Theological College, in the meanwhile seeking direction for the further development of his life. Just at that time Mr. L. D. Wishard returned from his world-tour to discover the strategic points for the evangelisation of the world. He brought with him an urgent appeal from the Missionary Conference at Calcutta, that a student should be sent out to commence work among in Calcutta year after year from all parts of India, of whom 10,000 speak and 20,000 understand English. Mr. Campbell White was designated to this post, and reached India in the opening of 1895.

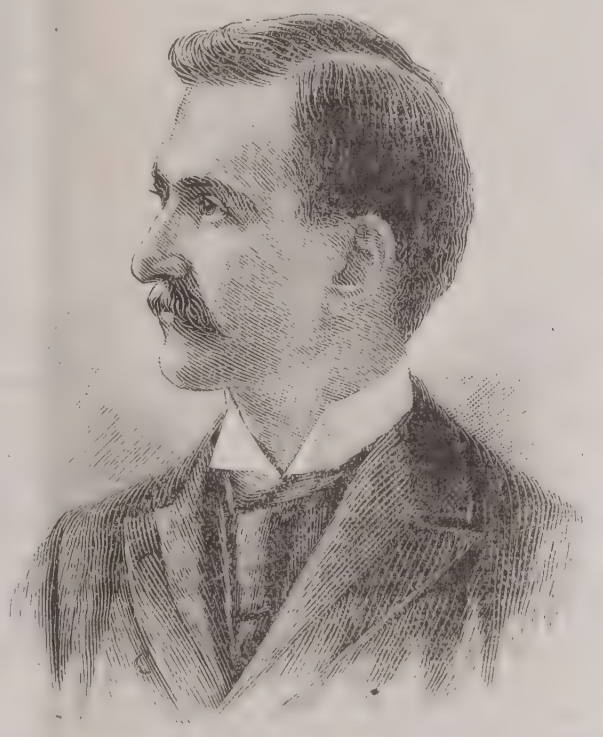
Operations among the students were commenced by the opening of a reading room, and it was so much appreciated that after the first week it was already too small to accommodate those who came. A Gospel meeting was held each week, at which from thirty to forty young men would be present; and the new secretary spent much of his time in reading the Bible with individual students who might be inquiring further into the faith of Christ.

One memorable Sunday evening, August 18, 1898, Dr. K. S. Macdonald, a veteran missionary, who from the first had taken a deep and living interest in this new departure, happened to mention that the Lady Dufferin Victoria Hospital, in the very centre and focus of the student life in Calcutta, was being offered for sale.

This building had been erected at a considerable cost, but its location was ill-chosen; first, because of the noise of the busy thoroughfares; and secondly, because the high-caste ladies refused to avail themselves of wards which might be overlooked from the tall houses around. But whilst unsuitable for its original purpose, no other site equally good could possibly be secured for the permanent home of the work among the students. It seemed, however, that the cost at which it was valued must preclude the hope of its acquisition by this young and hardly fledged organisation.

However, the little band of devoted men gave themselves to prayer. For the first two weeks the burden of their petitions was this: "Is it thy will, O God, that we should ask Thee to give us this place?" And on the morning of September 1 the leaders seem to have become fully convinced that it was in God's plan and purpose to give them the place for his work.



On September 2 a pamphlet was issued, called describing the situation, and asking for £11,250, for the purchase of the property.

"AN OPEN LETTER ABOUT AN OPEN DOOR,"

On January 16, 1896, a meeting of the committee of management decided, on the suggestion of Mr. J. R. Mott, that Mr. Campbell White should go to England to raise the purchase-money; and, remarkably enough, a sum of money, which had been waiting for appropriation to some such purpose, in the hands of Bishop Thoburn, was available to defray his travelling expenses. The hospital authorities had set April 15 as the limit to which the first refusal of the property would be extended, and for various reasons it was impossible for the secretary to sail from Bombay until March 7, which left only three weeks in England for the raising of the first £5,000, which, in the view of the committee, must be secured before a definite proposal of purchase would be entered upon.

One entire week passed before anything was secured. On the morning of April 1, an interview was obtained with Lord Overtoun, whose attention was arrested by discovering that the secretary happened to bear his own name. At the end of a few minutes' conversation, he said: "I believe that Great Britain is responsible for giving the Gospel to India, and that the best way to do it is through India's own educated young men. The fact that these young men are desiring and asking for this place makes it imperative that we provide it for them. I will be glad to towards the property it is proposed to buy."

Two weeks more remained before April 15, but until the 14th no more promises were received. On that day, however, when £4,000 more was required to close with the offer, a cablegram was received from New York announcing a pledge for the exact amount of £4,000. This gift was the result of one of the noblest incidents of the whole of this wonderful story.

Mr. David McConaughy, of the Madras Y.M.C.A., was at that time in the United States soliciting funds for the Madras building. One who promised to him was Mr. Crawford, an old personal friend of his. But when Mr. McConaughy learned of the great urgency of the Calcutta need, he stopped his own canvas for funds, and threw himself most heartily into the effort to raise the needed £5,000, with the result that his friend, instead of giving a large amount to the Madras building, gave £4,000 to the Calcutta College Association building.

On May 1 Lord and Lady Overtoun gave a breakfast, at which £2,000 more was subscribed; then generous gifts began to flow in from the Messrs. Denny, Lord Kinnaird, Sir George Williams, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. William E. Dodge, of New York, and many more; and so finally the entire amount was secured for the purchase of the property and the alteration of one of the wards into the great Overtoun Hall, which is capable of seating 1,000 persons. How surely does this narrative justify the motto suggested by Mr. J. Rutter Williamson for inscription on the building,

"BOUGHT BY THE POWER OF PRAYER!"

On July 16, 1897, the building, the total cost of which, including alterations and furniture, reached £14,000, was opened and dedicated to its new and important work by a large representative meeting of the leading Christian people of Calcutta. It was a marvellous story that the secretary had to tell of what God had wrought during the previous eleven months; and it was accepted as a pledge that He who had given the less would not withhold the greater, but that great spiritual results must accrue from the movement so favourably inaugurated.

Nor have those anticipations been disappointed. As many as 300 native students make daily use of the rooms placed at their service, and 600 are found in the weekly meetings. One hundred boarding-houses, in each of which some twenty students reside, are open to the visits of Mr. White and his associates, and inquirers are finding their way to the secretary's sanctum for further information of the doctrines of Christianity.

The following letter is a sample of others:—

"My knowledge of the sublime ethical doctrines of your religion is very limited, but the little I have heard and read of Christianity has led me to believe that yours is a practical and rational religion. I shall be therefore very thankful if you will kindly help me in this respect and grant me an interiew, at any hour, suiting your convenience."

During his stay in Calcutta Lord Kinnaird on three successive Sunday afternoons addressed 400 students in the Overtoun Hall, and writes warmly of the work, urging the claims of the students, of whom over 4,000 live within half a mile, and over 6,000 within a mile.

The needs for extension are very pressing, and I would urge that each of my readers consider whether he cannot help to meet them, and so come to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

First, the Boy's Branch. There are hundreds of schoolboys in this quarter studying for matriculation; and, important as it is to touch the men, it is almost more so to influence the boys. It is most desirable that premises should be raised as soon as possible, on ground already secured, for Bible classes, religious meetings, and perhaps a gymnasium. The cost of this would be £2,000.

Secondly, a Hostel is much needed to provide accommodation for about forty students, the majority of whom would probably be Christian, and in which the seekers and non-Christians would be brought under religious influences. This would cost about £1,000. Lastly,

THREE OR FOUR PICKED COLLEGE MEN

to carry on this gracious work, which is opening out in all directions far beyond the power of the one or two already in the field. Without the long delay of acquiring the language, they could at once set to work, and would find the most eager welcome and attention. To accommodate these Christian workers, rooms might be easily provided by the erection of another storey on the existing building.

With profound interest and sympathy I commend this great work to British Christians, and hope that during his residence in London Dr. W. W. White may receive substantial help to the furtherance of these schemes.

Other Lands.

The Condition of Spain.

By a Visitor.

A VISIT of three weeks to the heart of Spain has opened our eyes to much of the cause that has produced such sad results of late.

In the first place the poverty and discontent that seemed to reign throughout the country are very great. Crowds of persons filled the squares of the large cities conversing in groups as to the unsettled state of their unfortunate country. We could hardly walk down a street without being troubled incessantly by beggars, who are so importunate that it is difficult to escape from them. Every little child seems to have learnt to beg, and the grandeur of the most important thoroughfares of Madrid lies in very close proximity to the greatest squalor.

From a religious point of view, the one thing that strikes an English observer is to the worship of the Virgin Mary. You rarely in comparison see a crucifix or painting of our Saviour, but in every church and cathedral there are statues and statuettes, as well as wooden figures, which are larger than lifesize, highly decorated and painted over the altars of the Virgin Mary, and almost invariably with a gold crown on the head, and sometimes with a sceptre in the hand. She is generally robed in costly dress, and is evidently the one object of worship of the people of Spain.

In the Palace Chapel at Madrid, we happened to be admitted on a festival day, when the church was crowded with people, standing, for there are no seats in the Spanish churches. An immense number of priests were present, as well as an archbishop, who, seated in a golden chair, arrayed in gorgeous vestments, was kneeled to by priests one after another, who offered him incense and almost prostrated themselves at his feet.

After a great deal of time had been passed in ceremonials, he entered the pulpit and preached, evidently with great power and eloquence, for though we could not understand a sentence of what he said, we could see by his gestures, his immense earnestness, and torrent of words, as well as by the earnest faces of the people, that he quite swayed them, as it were, by the force of his oratory. Sometimes they wept, sometimes they laughed, and sometimes they fell upon their faces on the floor.

After we had listened for some time, and watched this strange scene, we left the building with our courier, who, though thoroughly Spanish, spoke English perfectly. We asked him to explain to us the subject of the sermon. His reply was: It was all about the Blessed Virgin. The text was this, "She shall be called the Glory of Israel." When the people were shedding tears, it was because he was telling them of the sorrows of Spain. He said that now that she had been trampled under foot by the heretic nations, that she was a by-word to all the world; she was poor and in trouble, yes, she was down in the dust to-day. Her soldiers were returned from Cuba wounded and suffering; her glory was laid aside. But there was a day coming when the Blessed Virgin would appear in the clouds with a crown of gold upon her head and a sceptre in her hand, and she would come in her great glory and receive the faithful ones to her bosom. Then, he said, Spain would once more recover the glory she had lost here.

He told them there was no salvation but in the Blessed Virgin. They must cry to her, and seek her mercy ere it be too late. "Oh," said the courier, as he wound up his description of the sermon, "that man could make anyone religious"—so saying, he sprinkled himself with holy water as we went out of the door.

When we were at Seville, we went to one of the ceremonies of the Holy Conception in the great cathedral, where the remains of Columbus have just been placed, and we saw the extraordinary function of in front of the altar. Once a year for a whole week, about twice a day, these boys perform these extraordinary gyrations. They are dressed in pale blue tunics and pantaloons, trimmed with silver, white stockings and white satin shoes, also shining with silver. They had on black velvet hats, three-cornered, very elaborately trimmed with white plumes. For nearly an hour, in the presence perhaps of thousands of people, these boys danced what looked to me very like a minuet. Now and then they whirled round and round, and used castanets, all the time keeping up a sort of childish singing in praise of the Virgin. The people listened and watched the whole proceeding with the utmost reverence.

The desolation of Spain impressed me more than I can describe, for, although in some parts there seems to be an activity in regard to agriculture and some prosperous looking farms, yet a great extent of the country seems absolutely desolate, and the principal towns quite 200 years behind our own times in civilisation.

My comment involuntarily was as we went from one part of Spain to another, "Certainly the Virgin Mary has not repaid with generosity the ardent worship of these poor devoted people."

The present poverty and emptiness of the country seems to afford a very strong contrast to the magnificent buildings of past days, which are kept in wonderful preservation, but very jealously kept, for they are not allowed even to be photographed or sketched.

THE CONTRAST WAS VERY GREAT.

When we arrived at Gibraltar, there was an immediate impression of prosperity and comfort in the English territory. I am delighted to see that Mr. Baxter has sent over an agent with large quantities of Gospels and Testaments for free distribution. Oh that God would truly send his light into the heart of that dark country! The people seem to be longing for comfort. If ever a land was open to the offer of the Gospel, surely Spain must be so now. Of course the bigotry and the darkness of past ages must raise up a barrier in many quarters; but, on the other hand, I have reason to think that the people themselves are very willing to accept and believe in the love of God and the mercy of our Saviour at this time of disappointment and sorrow.

We went into the tobacco factory, which was built by one of the kings for the express purpose of adding importance to this trade, and of making it a more successful one. In the building there are 7,000 women preparing tobacco for export to all parts of the world. The principal rooms contain 1,500 women in each, they are seated round tables with packets of tobacco in front of them, busily at work; some of the mothers with babies in cradles close to their feet, so that they can rock the cradles without desisting from their work. Everything is in perfect order, and inspectors are walking up and down the room all the time to see that the rules are carried out.

But in all these rooms there is an enormous painted wooden statue of the Virgin, much larger than life-size, dressed in different kinds of apparel, and at her feet an altar, which is covered with flowers and gifts of different kinds. I inquired of the manager why that figure should be there. His reply was, "Oh, we could do nothing without the presence of the Blessed Virgin." This is

ROMANISM IN ITS TRUE COLOURS.

The day of the Reformation saved England from its tyranny, and now in our own country there are vast numbers of people who are using all the powers they possess gradually to bring our country again under that same yoke.

One motto seemed to me to be written up over all this delusion of belief: "My glory will I not give to another." One could not help feeling that the only remedy for all this ignorance would be the introduction into Spain of the Scriptures themselves, without necessarily human teaching, for in that Book we find the mind of Christ Jesus, and we see how very few sentences even are said about the Virgin Mary herself, whilst the whole Book is given to the teaching of God's Holy Will with regard to both doctrine and worship. In this record we are told of the three Persons of the Trinity in their Holy Name and character, and that God alone, through his Son is to be sought, worshipped and obeyed.

Perhaps some of your readers may think of ways or means by which, on a large scale, the Scriptures could be introduced into that benighted country.

The Outlook in China.

AN idea has arisen that the Chinese Emperor Kuan Sü is a weak man, and one who, by pushing things too quickly, was in danger of arousing the hostility of the Chinese people, and thus of spoiling the cause of the true advancement of China. But this is not so much so as appears, for, from the reports that come in from very many different parts of China, there appears to be a very large and increasingly-influential party of progress, and especially so amongst the younger members of the literary classes, who are thoroughly in favour of the Emperor, and who hold that the hope for China lies chiefly in him to-day. His edicts were popular with this party, which greatly derives its strength from his countenance.

THE TRUE STATE OF THINGS TO-DAY,

therefore, would seem to be that on one side stands the great body of the intelligence and youth of the people of China, with their young and intelligent Emperor anxious to lead them on; and on the other a corrupt and powerful oligarchy, composed of the Manchu Princes and more powerful Mandarins, who act and work through the Dowager Empress, she finding her power through throwing herself in with them. Now, the leading idea of this party is personal greed, united with strong attachment to idolatry, and to the whole corrupt system of bribery, which now eats out the heart of Chinese political life, and causes deep concern and sorrow to a very large number of patriotic Chinamen, who love and desire the welfare of their native land. I have reason to know from many quarters that this is the case, and that could China and its Emperor but be freed from the terrible incubus of this corrupt oligarchy, the country and the cause of the Gospel would go forward in a way that would cause astonishment to all who do not know the true state of the case.

Besides all this, we have many strong reasons to hope that the present Emperor has himself felt the workings of God's Spirit, and is one who would—if he had a free hand—do all in his power to FAVOUR THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL.

Whence otherwise the eagerness with which he sought acquaintance with all Christian literature? Whence sprang the report that with his own hands he overthrew and broke idols in a temple in Peking? Why the orders for the doing away with many of the lesser Buddhist temples, and the advice which he gave in his public proclamations to change temples into schools for instruction in Western learning? Let all those who love the cause of the Gospel, and that of freedom and enlightenment, join in pleading in earnest prayer that God may bless and preserve China's Emperor, overturning the schemes of those who seek to oppose the cause of progress, and bringing about an opening of the mind and heart of multitudes in China to the Gospel through him.

So much concerning Kuan Sü, the Emperor, towards whom one's heart is strangely drawn. May God use these lines to draw forth a real cry to Him, which may avail to bring down rich blessing on China, and the deliverance which is now so closely within reach. T. W. Pigott.

Sheo-yang Mission.

The Gospel in Saxony.

HAVING recently returned from a visit to Dresden, a few notes on the present state of things in the province of which that beautiful city is the capital may be helpful and interesting. Persecution for conscience' sake continues to be the rule even in that land of Lutheran celebrity and Protestant fame. Even in Dresden, the home of fine art and literary culture, where there are several thousand English and American residents, rigorous and harsh laws are enforced on individuals and whole families, simply for loyalty to religious conviction, and consequent separation from the Lutheran Church. This seems to us so repugnant to all the principles of Protestantism and liberty which we associate with the illustrious name of Luther, and with Germany as the Fatherland of the Reformation, that it is difficult to get English folk to realise the fact. It needs to be seen to be believed.

The following facts, dating only from January of the present year, may be allowed to speak for themselves. On January 11 a fine of 100 marks was inflicted in Chemnitz simply for the offence of having conducted a Sunday School outside the pale of Lutheranism. On February 1, 160 marks for conducting a Gospel meeting in Sosa. January 4, 150 marks for baptising converts to the faith of Christ in Sosa and elsewhere. January 25, a pastor served with government notice that if it was proved that any religious work was carried on among children with his knowledge, a fine of 150 marks would be levied on him. January 29, a party of children in the hall at Chemnitz on the Lord's Day were surprised by the entrance of police and

FORCIBLY TURNED OUT INTO THE STREET.

In Dresden, recently, the pastor of the Baptist Church was summoned before the magistrates for having allowed a plate to be held at the door to receive voluntary offerings on behalf of the China Inland Mission. Many similar facts might be added. It is even dangerous to speak of these things. After years of hard personal experience along these lines, Pastor Mascher, of Dresden, on his own behalf and on that of many sufferers throughout Saxony, was induced last year to publish a pamphlet for circulation in Germany, narrating the struggles gone through for religious liberty. The Royal Department of Worship chose to consider this as a libel on themselves, and have taken action before the Civil Court of Saxony against him. On Monday, February 6, the case came on in Dresden before five judges.

The writer was present in court, and will not soon forget the scene as the pastor and four of his co-workers for Christ were marched in and at the instigation of Lutheran pastors arraigned for no other reason than that they sought the right of freedom to worship God. The proofs of the truth of all Pastor Mascher had written were to be seen in the pile of documents issued by the Royal Department of Worship for the infliction of fines bearing their own seal. The judges were evidently surprised at the facts adduced, and after some discussion that witnesses might be brought from various parts of Saxony to prove the statements made as to the action of the police and other facts. Much is to be hoped for from bringing these things thus prominently to the light, as public feeling is undoubtedly against such intolerance, much of which is done in the dark and without the cognizance of the civil authorities.

ADJOURNED THE TRIAL FOR SIX WEEKS,

The costs of the action and of the bringing up witnesses fall upon Pastor Mascher and his friends, who are ill fitted to bear them; but God will provide, and English Christians will not fail to show sympathy in such a case.

It was my joy and privilege to preach and to hold Bible readings during my stay both among Lutheran Christians and with the Baptist and other pastors and friends. A great desire prevails for light on the Bible, for deeper spiritual life, and for more manifestation of the Holy Spirit's power. We do well to pray fervently for Saxony, and to watch carefully the issue of the trial now in course. With freedom for all to proclaim the Gospel of Christ, a great blessing and a glorious awakening would be speedily realised in that fair and promising land. W. Fuller Gooch.

Work in Geneva.

GENEVA, the citadel of Swiss Protestantism and truth, from the days of Calvin down to the treaty of Vienna in 1815, and, indeed, for a generation later, was a small fortified town, with its glacis, surrounded by water. During the past forty-two years, since we first visited it, Geneva has so changed as to be perfectly unrecognisable. Ten new bridges have been built, grand new streets, stately public buildings, a celebrated university, sumptuous hotels, an unrivalled quay forming a semi-circular drive along the port, tastefully laid-out public gardens, and artistic villas. The feverish activity in building new houses and forming fresh streets in every direction cannot have escaped the wonder of the most casual visitor. New lines of electric tramways have constantly to be opened; everything is done by electricity.

30,000 TOURISTS POUR INTO GENEVA

monthly during the season, and, in the race of development, it is not clear whether Geneva or Zurich will shortly be the first to number a quarter of a million of inhabitants.

One of the most significant facts about Geneva is that some 50,000 French Roman Catholics have permanently established themselves here, and form an integral section of the population. They are tradesmen, professors, manufacturers, commercial men of all kinds. Moreover, having largely become naturalised Swiss, these can form part of the magistracy, and municipal and cantonal authorities, and are even eligible for the highest political positions. Another fact, not to be underrated, from its danger, is that the great amount of liberty enjoyed under the excellent Swiss laws has caused the worst revolutionary elements of Europe to flock for safety to this country from France, Italy, Germany, Russia, and even Spain. Not alone do Zurich and Geneva know this to their cost, but they seem incapable of preventing the immorality which characterises their lives, or their other crimes, while such example must deteriorate the indigenous population.

It is a matter of rejoicing to know what efforts are being put forth in Geneva for the extension of the kingdom of God. Great good has resulted from the consisting of 500 members, and possessing a stately building of its own which would make a good show in any British town, and moreover containing the seat of the International Committee of all such associations throughout the world, of which M. Fermaud is Secretary. There is also a far more modest Young Women's Christian Association, still struggling against obstacles. Solid work is going on silently by the Activité Chrétienne (Christian Endeavour Society), the members of which, numbering about fifty, are pledged to take active part in some branch of Christian usefulness to those around. Meetings for Biblical study, singing, &c., infuse knowledge as well as life into this sympathetic institution.

The Free Church of Geneva is richer in devoted men of God than in places of worship. The pure saving Gospel is preached—the whole counsel of God, and the perfect work of Christ for sinful men, occupying the first and the last place. Innumerable villages and scattered houses dot the lovely shores of Lake Leman, and extend on either side of the Rhone as far as the foot of the Salève and Jura. Owing to the scarcity of churches, during the summer time religious evangelical services are held under the canopy of heaven, on the property of ladies and gentlemen, who provide chairs or benches under the welcome shade of fine trees. These afternoon meetings, organised by M. Favre, a Genevese gentleman, who dedicates his life to evangelisation, and Pastor Frank Thomas, are duly advertised in the local newspapers, and are well frequented, so that much good can thus be done.

A few years ago a magnificent building, called the Victoria Hall, was erected to be available for public meetings and concerts. Slender iron columns support two ranges of galleries, and the seats under these are also raised in tiers around the parterre, which is very spacious. During the Swiss National Exhibition of 1896, Pastor Thomas held a series of evangelical meetings in this hall, and last year others were given for several months. It was a bold undertaking of the Committee to hire it for religious meetings, the cost being very great; all included may amount each time to 150 francs, and in winter, including the warming, 200 francs, which sum cannot be realised by the collections made at the doors.

Of all the multitude of objects worthy of the serious attention of British Christians, we know none more interesting than this one, and which we strenuously press upon those who have the means of helping it in an adequate manner. From the great importance and central position of modern Geneva, surrounded by Roman Catholic populations, sympathy should be shown with efforts, now being made, to provide more extended evangelical preaching to so many thousands who do not frequent any place of worship. In conclusion, it would be a source of real blessing, no less to the giver than to the population of Geneva, could the Victoria Hall be permanently assured every Sunday for these popular evangelical meetings; and such it will surely become if we follow the example of George Müller, who so simply put it: "I serve a rich Master." Repression in Tunisia.

WRITING from Susa, Tunisia, Mr. W. G. Pope says:—"The French authorities here have condemned two of our lady missionaries, Misses Cox and Scott to 12s. fine and costs, and six days' imprisonment, falsely charging them with having distributed copies of the Scriptures in the public streets at Djerba—an island off the Tunisian coast. The workers were willing to suffer for Christ's sake, but as the free distribution of the Gospel was thus sacrificed, we all thought it better that they should appeal to the higher court at Algiers. This was done; but they have confirmed the judgment.

"Nothing remains to be done but to appeal to the Court of Cassation at Paris. The appeal has been lodged, and however just that court may be, we cannot but feel that the strained relations between our two countries may go against us. We, therefore, appeal HIGHER, and ask that every Christian under whose cognisance this trial may come should petition the Throne of Grace that the final result may be for the Master's glory and the spreading of his Kingdom. Unless God interferes, we feel assured that our days in Tunisia are numbered, and yet we never had so much to encourage us as at present."

Home Missions.

"Wealthland and Woeland."

(Concluded.)

THE great evening meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, was worthy of the earlier proceedings of the day, and indeed, of the work (of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association), whose semi-jubilee was being celebrated. Not only did the occasion appeal to the ear, but also to the eye, for in presenting the annual report, Mr. John W. Arthur exhibited a long series of lantern slides, illustrative of the scope and progress of the work in its various channels. Beginning appropriately with a portrait of Mr. D. L. Moody, he sketched briefly the story of the revival of 1873-74, and passed on to show how the organisation then set in operation had expanded and developed until it now seemed to touch and provide for the needs of humanity at every point. Portraits of Mr. Alexander Allan, Mr. James Scott, Rev. Dr. Wallace, Rev. Dr. Somerville, Rev. Dr. Bonar, Mr. Walter Hislop, Mr. William Ralston, and others, seemed specially to appeal to the audiences as they recalled earnest lives consecrated to the Lord and laid down in active service.

During the twenty-five years the sum of £265,225 had been received and expended. As examples of the work accomplished it was mentioned that 68,089 poor children had since 1885 received the benefit of the Fresh Air Fortnight Scheme, and that the average attendance at the Sabbath Free Breakfast was 1,300.

Lord Overtoun, as chairman, gave expression to the feeling of devout thankfulness to God with which the members of the mission gathered together at this time. Describing the field of work he said: "There is the evil of externalism and the curse of indifference—drink, gambling, and opposition of all kinds, with the sneer of an unbelieving world. But after all, though

THE WORLD LAUGHS, THE WORK GOES ON.

He then passed on to give a sketch of the campaign which the Association is planning for next winter. The hearty co-operation of all the churches has already been enlisted, and it is intended to send a personal invitation into every home in the city. He called for volunteers to help in the meetings and other parts of the work. "Get into line in the matter of prayer and service. Two things you have to do: To pray, and to work. Do you say you are ready to pray? Then you are beginning to move the greatest instrument for the doing of this work. Will you pray? Will you help? Will you give? Will you interest people? Then indeed this great city and our beloved Scotland will, I believe, share in the blessing which so many expect is soon to be among us."

Rev. George Gladstone gave a most instructive and stirring address on "Wholehearted Devotion in Winning Men to Christ," which Mr. McNeill described later in the evening as a splendid oration. He said: "If we are going to work intelligently, there are some things which must be regarded as settled beyond gainsay. (1) That it is the blessing of God that maketh rich. The recognition of this secures that we work with the upward look, and that we boast of no man's part or merit. (2) That men need to be saved. All the wild talk we hear about progress does not eradicate the consciousness of guilt, the fear, or the unrest. We are not to overlook that. (3) That God calls us to work for the salvation of men. Many of us require to revise our conceptions of church membership. There are too many in our churches to be attended to, who look for attention—jealously seeking it, and offended if they do not receive it. I am not forgetting those who need special shepherding, but the convert's first prayer is—'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' And it should be the Christian's abiding prayer. (4) That God has given to us the fit instrument wherewith men can be saved. The world is not waiting for what you or I think, not perishing for lack of our but it is waiting for Christ. Souls are perishing for lack of Christ, and God calls us to tell the world of Jesus.

"If we are agreed concerning these, what are we to be—idlers or believers, idlers or workers? Shall we not be as those that eagerly seek to save, as those that have to give an account? (1) This work gladdens and glorifies Jesus Christ. Note how often He spoke in praise of men and women who did some work for his dear sake. 'Lord' we call Him, for 'Lord' we want Him to be—a Master whom it is a joy to serve, a Master whose smile is a reward that gladdens. (2) It helps ourselves. It is work angels might envy. It yields a joy the like of which is not out of Heaven. (3) It has secured for it a reward. There is to be a day when even the cup of cold water given in the Master's name is not to be forgotten."

Colonel Barker (of the Salvation Army) received a warm reception. Comparing the methods in use by the Association with those of the organisation to which he himself belonged, he declared most enthusiastically that not only were they engaged in a common work, but they were doing it on the same lines. The meeting heartily applauded his earnest testimony to the blessing which attended all faithful work done for Christ; and showed the true mutual sympathy that pervades workers of every name.

Rev. John McNeill aroused the deepest interest and sympathy throughout the great gathering as he recounted in graphic language the outstanding of the mission in which he is at present engaged to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. One of the most characteristic differences was the absence of hymns in the service of praise. The Scottish paraphrases were also interdicted in some places, leaving the Psalms alone to be sung.

DIFFICULTIES AND ENCOURAGEMENTS

It is splendid, though hard work. In some ways it is harder than was the campaign in London, with its immense halls and tabernacles; although that, too, was heavy. These northern people can take in a great amount of preaching and make no sign. One of their great difficulties is about instantaneous conversion; and it is worth while raising that point, for I sometimes think people get saved too easily down here. But I have been telling them that when you want salvation you should ask for the sudden kind, and see that you get it. I have had to tell them there is no man "sound" until he is a saved man. There must be heart heresy about you somehow.

The Highlanders have doubts about election. No man need go to the north unless he takes election and foreordination in his carpet bag. You may make fun about a Highlander's doubts and fears; but there is more faith in them than in some Lowlanders' assurance. Another difficulty with them is an unwillingness to say they have got salvation. It is like some fishing—even after you have caught him a Highlander is hard to land.

Three different choirs—those of the Mizpah Band, the Bible Training Institute, and the Noon Meeting—were much appreciated as they rendered, in the course of the evening, pieces of sacred music.

Advent Conference.—The fifth annual Conference on the Coming of the Lord has recently been held in Lansdowne Hall, West Norwood, and has proved the best in points of numbers attending and in spiritual power and blessing. The large hall was well filled each afternoon, and in the evening the meetings were crowded, upwards of 1,000 persons being present. The addresses given by Revs. J. J. Luce, R. Middleton, J. Sturdy, W. Houghton, J. Wilkinson, Dr. White, J. Turner, and others, dealt almost entirely with the practical side of the subject, and were marked by much spirituality of tone and deep impressions. Christians were present from various centres and of varied Churches, and the spirit of fellowship and unity realised was a distinct source of blessing. A verbatim report is in course of publication.

Reformatory and Refuge Union.

THIS excellent organisation searches so deeply into the root-causes of human misery, and indicates with such lucidity and care the very best means of alleviation or cure, that it has gradually achieved a position of great usefulness, not only to the suffering and distressed, but to society at large.

It undertakes the care of numbers of the fallen and destitute, irrespective of age, sex or creed, and self-denyingly makes a speciality of the most difficult cases of all. For instance, at the well-known Grotto Home in Paddington, are received those hulking fellows of seventeen or eighteen, who are just budding into junior membership among Birmingham's "peaky blinders" or London's hooligans. It was established at a time when no other institution cared to accept them. The Grotto, a "last chance" home, affords them careful training, under common-sense management and fervent Christian influence.

Another useful branch deals with "unfortunates." As Mr. Maddison, the general secretary of the Society, forcibly puts it, "While we found no dearth of homes and refuges, we found but little practical touch between them and the great mass of the fallen. It was necessary to bridge the gulf." In the effort to do so, by means of women missionaries, the Union maintain five mission houses. The workers seek and obtain their or abodes of shame—anywhere, so that they do get them. These "houses" are conducted as real homes. Nothing about the appearance or management is calculated to give the impression of an orthodox institution. The matron-missionary is "mother" as well as guide, philosopher and friend to her charges. A thousand women are dealt with per annum, not all in the Society's own homes, for the aim in considering each case on its own merits is how and where can the individual peculiarities of the case be most helpfully met. But cases of any kind are safe with this organisation.

The great work of child-saving has greatly developed from the days of yore, when it was not only a common but even a necessary thing to send a man round to literally pick up homeless children from the gutter. Much is done nowadays for destitute childhood, and—utilising the Act initiated by Miss Ellice Hopkins, by which any person may deliver a child from a house of ill-fame and have its future decided upon by a magistrate—the Society has a special staff of officers engaged in this difficult, not to say perilous, work. It rescues upwards of two hundred little helpless ones annually from dens of infamy.

Especial interest attaches to the efforts now being made on behalf of the children of those confirmed vagrants who, detesting work in every shape and form, are more than content that their children shall be exposed to all the suffering and vices of a nomad life, since it is "this 'ere pore little young 'un, y'r 'onner," that draws contributions from the public. The Society proposes that the School Board authorities shall be empowered to rescue such children and place them in industrial schools.

In the midst of its useful labours, too, the Union has been happily in philanthropic work throughout the kingdom. It has organised a Provident and Benevolent Fund for affording assistance to the widows and orphans of officers who have served in institutions, and to those officers who may become incapacitated through accident or ill-health, special arrangements being made for deferred annuities. The entire management and clerical work is undertaken free of any charge, the total sums subscribed thus being available for distribution. To describe adequately the many Samaritan efforts undertaken by the society would require a volume, but it is desirable to point out that the management is notable for skill and economy, for spirituality and kindly sympathy. Financial aid may be sent to Mr. A. J. S. Maddison, 32, Charing Cross, London, S.W.

MINDFUL OF THE MANY TOILERS

The Duxhurst Colony.

TIME passes so rapidly in these stirring days that we can scarcely realise that nearly four years have elapsed since the inauguration of the Farm Colony for inebriate women at Duxhurst, near Reigate. The work of the colony has now passed out of the region of experiment into that of assured result. No one could doubt this who listened to the pathetic and powerful address given by Lady Henry Somerset at the Mansion House one afternoon last week. Seldom we should think have the lordly walls of the mayoral residence echoed to such eloquent and touching pleas as those that fell from the lips of her ladyship. At any rate, they made a deep impression on the Lord Mayor himself, who confessed at the close that many new and undreamt-of thoughts and suggestions had been implanted in his mind as to the best methods of dealing with the female victims of drink.

At the outset of her address

LADY HENRY SOMERSET

had to make the sorrowful admission that drunkenness among women is certainly on the increase. All are agreed that something must be done to cope with it. The methods employed in past times to check this evil, in the shape of brief imprisonments, have proved utter failures—indeed, worse than failures. Drunkenness is too complex a thing to be met in that hard and fast punitive way. It is partly a physical evil, ruining the health of the drinker; but it is partly a moral curse, destroying the will power, and rendering the victim an easy prey to recurring temptation. It was in the light of these facts that the Duxhurst experiment was begun, and Lady Henry Somerset gave an interesting description of the means used to cure the inebriates—home life, individual diagnosis and treatment, open air occupation, womanly sympathy, the humanising influence of the children at the Bird's Nest, and

THE POWER OF CHRIST'S GOSPEL.

Her ladyship told how some came and stayed only six months, but not infrequently these have to return for further help and treatment. It is now a settled rule that all who place themselves at Duxhurst must agree to remain for a year. The restorative influences of an outdoor life, with its interesting occupations of fruit and flower cultivation under the supervision of duly qualified women, were descanted on; reminding one by inference of the utter fatuity of expecting to cure a woman of the drink crave by immuring her in a dreary prison and depriving her of all social, mental, and spiritual aids to a better life. The cases cited by Lady Henry Somerset to illustrate the good results achieved at Duxhurst were striking indeed. Christian methods are inevitably the best for meeting the ills and curing the woes of society. The most touching thing, said the speaker, that had ever happened in connection with the colony was when, a few months ago, a girl who had received benefit at the place herself came all the way from the Midlands, bringing with her her inebriate mistress for treatment.

Very touching was the account given of the softening influences exercised on the women by contact with the London slum children who are every summer drafted to Duxhurst for a stay at the Bird's Nest. From these infant lips too are learned many hints of the fearful and demoralising surroundings in which they are forced to live, and the women get a new view of the power to curse family life that is inherent in strong drink. In closing her address, which fairly enchained the large company, her ladyship appealed for practical help in carrying on this work. There is a debt of £2,000 to wipe out and only some 900 guinea subscriptions would be needed to maintain the colony from year to year. If ever there was a good work in which our wealthy city magnates ought to lend a hand, we think it is in such an effort as this, where the victims of a bad social custom are taken in hand, restored to their right mind, and strengthened for the hour of coming temptation.

We would advise all who wish to know more about this truly splendid work to send to Lady Henry Somerset, Duxhurst, Reigate, for a copy of the report recently issued.

Barbican Mission to the Jews.

IN a recent issue of his quarterly paper, Immanuel's Witness, Prediger Lipshytz reports that much encouragement attends the work in the temporary home of the mission, 262, Commercial Road, E. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, who is president of the Mission, appeals for help, in order that the new mission-house scheme may speedily be realised. As will be remembered, this new building is to be in memory of the late Prebendary Gordon Calthrop, first president of the mission.

One of the most interesting chapters of the paper is devoted to a narrative (in part) of the director's experiences during his last continental tour. We make a brief extract:—"Arrived at Flushing, I took train for Hanover. There were a number of Jews in the carriage, some of whom, coming from London, knew me. Without delay these started conversation by asking

THE BOLD AND CRUCIAL QUESTION—

'How is it that you, having been born a Jew, can believe in Christ?' I replied that it was just because I was a Jew that I had become a Christian. It was to the Jews, in the first instance, that God promised a Messiah of the seed of David. In due time Christ—that is, the Messiah of the seed of David—came. 'But our fathers did not acknowledge Him as such,' broke in several of the voices. 'Well,' I replied, 'that would not prove that He was not the Messiah sent by God; for it was not Christ alone that our fathers rejected. You will not deny that God sent prophets to our people; and you must admit that most of them were disobeyed and persecuted by Israel.'

"Proceeding, I asked whether Christ had not given full proof of his Messiahship. 'No one,' I said, 'will deny that He did marvellous things, and that his Apostles afterwards did the like things in his name. Through the preaching of the Gospel of from the dead, Grecian philosophers became followers of Him whom God had appointed to be an Everlasting Prince. In the Roman Empire and the pagan world the same marvels have been wrought by the same means; and nations have risen and prospered as the Gospel of Christ has entered into their life, and his principles have been embodied in their laws. True, our nation in its entirety did not accept Christ, but many of our people did. Christ was of our nation; so were his first followers and Apostles. Our nation as a whole rejected Him, and since the century in which He appeared we have been scattered amongst the Gentiles and reaping curses while we might have enjoyed blessings.' Arrived at Hanover, we parted in the most friendly manner. I distributed tracts, and my friends promised to read them."

Marylebone Medical Mission.

THE annual report of this useful work is an interesting record, which demonstrates how the Mission has, in a marked manner, won its way to the hearts of the people. Visits and ministry are welcomed even by those who are careless, indifferent, sinful and vicious. During the past year 4,162 new patients have been treated, while 3,144 home visits have been paid to those who were too ill to attend the dispensary for treatment.

Care is taken that medical benefits are confined to those who are not able to pay for them; and the patients are of the very poorest class—labourers, handy-men, odd-jobbers, and gutter merchants. A large number of those who come seem unfit for work of any kind, live from hand to mouth, and are on the verge of starvation.

From 60 to 120 of the poorest class of people are found attending the dispensary service before receiving medicine as needed. Among the attendants are many who never enter church, chapel, or mission hall; and excellent opportunities are found for setting before them the way of salvation.

A Bible class for women is held weekly. Some of those who attend, speaking of it as the happiest time of their lives, the cheerful hall contrasting very strikingly with the miserable homes from which they come. There is also a Bible class for young women, which is composed of young servants, some of whom have received spiritual benefit at the Mission.

Owing to the great poverty of patients, the clothing club is found to be of the greatest possible benefit. Clothing is sold to the patients at less than half value; but, in absolutely destitute cases, it is handed over as a gift. Large and liberal monetary aid is constantly needed in a mission which has for its business the alleviation of physical suffering, and the lightening of moral and spiritual darkness in a neighbourhood where great poverty is a painful and abiding fact. Communications may be addressed to Dr. Robert Chambers, 12, Bell Street, Lisson Grove, N.W.

The British Chautauqua.

THE third conversazione and lecture took place a few days ago in the lecture hall of Mount View Congregational Church, Stroud Green, when Rev. J. Hilton Stowell presided, and a large company were entertained by the friends of the church. Rev. C. Anderson Scott, B.A., Kensington, based his lecture on Selby's "Ministry of the Lord Jesus," and divided his subject into two parts, viz., (1) "Religious, or Man's Relation to God," and (2) "Ethical, or Man's Relation to the World and other Men." He treated the former aspect of the question in the present lecture, leaving the latter for a future occasion.

He described the great change that has taken place in the human conception of God's attitude towards man. Instead of thinking, as formerly, that God considered and dealt with man as a member of the State or of a visible and external church, it is now recognised that God judges man as an individual, responsible for his own deeds and words. This, he contended, was the revealed method of God in his dealings with man. There were many views of the object of Christ in coming to the world, and it was their aim to harmonise all these descriptions of one great consistent plan and object—namely, the offer to man of individual salvation from individual sins.

Rev. W. J. Avery announced that the forthcoming summer school would be held at Saltburn, Yorks, from August 12 to 26; and made some remarks explanatory of the constitution and objects of the society.

Lads in Whitechapel.

THE many friends and old subscribers to the Whitechapel Institute and Home for Lads will be pleased to hear of the increasing prosperity that is attending the work under the superintendency of Rev. Thomas Jackson. During the past two years Mr. Jackson has been most indefatigable in his labours. Orphans and country lads who have been found in destitute circumstances have been befriended and the benefits of a Christian home extended to them.

Not only are the physical and social needs of the youths provided for, but their spiritual interests also; recently the workers have been cheered by several deciding for Christ. Owing to Mr. Jackson's serious illness in November last, the income of the Institute has suffered, and the year's work shows a deficit of £150.

Readers who may know of respectable lads from the provinces, in circumstances of need, can render great help to such by referring them to Mr. Jackson (279, Whitechapel Road, E.), who will be pleased to find them a home and assist them to obtain employment. Friends wishing to inspect the Institute are welcome to do so any day from two to nine p.m.

School of Medicine, India.—A correspondent writes to point out that in his recent reference to the North India School of Medicine for Women Rev. F. B. Meyer erroneously states that it has been in existence for twenty years. It was started nearly five years ago.

Young People.

Brevities from Afar.

INSTEAD of my usual "pen-pictures" this month, I have given you three or four sketches of missionary work from different fields of labour. It is so necessary to begin when we are young to recognise the immense blessing that comes to heathen people who really receive Jesus Christ by faith into their hearts. First we have

AN ALMORA LEPER.

Almora is the capital of the Kumaow district in the north-west province of India, where there is a leper asylum.

Ujiala is a bright-eyed, pleasant-faced lassie of nineteen years. She was married, as usual, in her early girlhood. Her husband put her away owing to the disease, and left her to support herself how she could. Was it not terrible to have all life's hopes crushed at that early age? But she was brought to the asylum, and there, through eagerly listening to what some of the inmates had to tell her of the life to come, and of Jesus, the Way, the Truth, and the Life, she became inspired with a new hope, and when the missionary asked her why she wanted to be baptised, she said: "I want to be a follower of Jesus, who forgives and helps." So having come to a knowledge of Christ, even her sad lonely life became radiant with joy.

Next, we have a foundling who BECAME A MISSIONARY.

About sixty years ago, a small bundle was picked up in a street in Bristol by the river side just between the bridges. When it was unwrapped, it was found to contain a forsaken baby, who seemed to belong to nobody in the world. The child received the name of Thomas Bridges, because of the strange circumstances of his discovery. When he grew to be a big lad he was taken to the Falkland Islands, off Patagonia, in South America, in company with a devoted missionary. Here he soon picked up the Yaghan language, which is spoken along the rocky and desolate coast of Tierra del Fuego—or Land of Fire. After a time he gave his heart to Jesus Christ, and grew to be an earnest and energetic Christian. In a few years he returned to England, pursued a course of study, and was ordained a clergyman. He then went back as a missionary to those Yaghans, who perhaps are the most degraded race on earth. Mr. Bridges devoted thirty years of his life to work among this people, and translated the Scriptures into their barbarous language.

Would not some of my young friends, girls as well as boys, like to serve Jesus like that?

Jubilee of the New Hebrides Mission: The Islands of the New Hebrides lie fourteen hundred miles away from Sydney, in Australia, and are separated from each other over a length of many hundred miles in the South West Pacific Ocean.

Well, fifty years ago the first station was opened in the Island of Aneityum, and the first missionary settled there, the Rev. John Geddie. All the thirty inhabited islands of the group were sunk in heathenism. No one knew anything of the true God and Jesus Christ, whom He had sent to save the world. To-day there are in the whole of this group no fewer than twenty-four missionaries, five assistants, a trained nurse, about 300 native teachers, and about 2,800 who remember Jesus in observing the Lord's Supper. A training institution for teachers and a hospital are also established. This is God's wonderful work in fifty years!

I don't suppose you will be able to remember these figures. But all I have said in these "brevities" makes it quite clear that faithful preaching of the Gospel and living it in lands where the love of Christ is not known are certain to be blessed by God. The true missionary is a living epistle, known and read wherever he makes his home. And young people here in England can never tell how far their prayers are used by God for reaping a very harvest of souls amongst depraved and Godless nations. What a grand thing it would be if some members of the band of Bible searchers, who read THE CHRISTIAN, were to give themselves to God for Christ's service in some distant mission field!

"The Christian" Bible-Searcher.

ANSWERS TO LAST WEEK'S SEARCHER.

(No. 164.)

1. Barnabas. Acts xi. 24. When the Church which was in Jerusalem sent him to exhort the Church in Antioch.

2. Paul. Acts xxi. 38. When the chief captain rescued Paul from the violence of the people of Jerusalem, and led him into the castle, he asked him this.

3. Apollos. Acts xviii. 25. Apollos taught diligently, knowing only the baptism of John. Aquila and Priscilla expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly.

4. Eutychus. Acts xx. 10. While Paul was preaching, Eutychus, being asleep, fell down from the third loft and was taken up dead. Paul went down and brought him back to life.

5. Paul and Silas. Acts xvii. 6. The Jews in Thessalonica made an uproar and assaulted the house of Jason where they were staying.

6. Lydia. Acts xvi. 14. Paul and Timothy baptised her and her household, and she constrained them to stay in her house.

7. Elymas the sorcerer. Acts xiii. 10. When he withstood Paul and Barnabas and sought to turn the deputy in Paphos from the faith.

8. Peter. Acts xii. 15. After the angel had taken Peter out of prison, he went to the house of Mary, and when Rhoda, who went to the gate, told the others, they could not believe it was Peter.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 165).

By whom and to whom were the following words spoken? Give references. From each verse given take the number of words as stated, and from the Hidden Text give reference:—

(St. John's Gospel.)

Two words—I am the Vine, ye are the branches.
One word—Continue ye in my love.
One word—Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.
Two words—If ye keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love.
One word—For without Me ye can do nothing.
One word—Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name He will give it you.
Three words—These things I command you, that ye love one another.

[Children under ten do any three, those under thirteen any five.]

Personal.

Some of my young friends or their parents write me from time to time giving various reasons (illness, &c.) why answers have not been sent in during a particular week; but as three weeks are allowed in the course of the quarter for mishaps of all kinds, it is not necessary for me to make any exceptions. Children must send in nine correct papers during twelve weeks to be eligible for the prize competition.

DORA GAY.—I think you must mean the fish that swallowed Jonah.

CATHERINE BARBER.—I am glad you have such happy recollections of Dr. Barnardo's Homes, and heartily join with you in the hope that he will soon be restored to health.

DORA ELLWOOD.—Thank you for your interesting letter. I am glad you enjoy your Band of Hope meetings, and hope you have good times there.

FLOSSY AND AGNES FULLARTON, DAISY AND VERA PETRIDES.—Many thanks for the nice little letters, all written on such pretty notepaper.

FRANK MEDCALF.—That is a very good idea of yours. I hope the clocks will always be a help to you.

DOROTHY PATTEN.—I hope you will like your new school You may be able to find time after lessons are over to do your "Searcher." I hope so.

H. M. STUART.—I am sorry you have been ill and hope you will soon be quite well again.

IVY SHERWIN.—Thank you for your interesting letter. Next week will be a little late, so I will wish you many happy returns of your birthday. You write very nicely for such a little girl.

GEORGE BROWN.—I am sorry your brother is ill, and hope he will soon be able to do his "Searcher" again.

ASHLEY BOWKER.—It is always a pleasure to know that the prizes and certificates are appreciated, and I hope that all the Bible Searchers, as well as yourself, will feel more and more the value of their Bibles.

ELLA HAKE.—I am glad to know you are taking such care of your rewards.

KATHLEEN MCCLURE.—I am sorry you are not well, and hope you will soon be well again.

EVELYN GIDDINGS.—I hope you will not forget what the missionary told you and the things he showed you.

The Bible Searcher for last week (February 23) should be No. 164, not 163, as given. Answers will be found under 164.

Evangelistic.

Mr. Henry Thorne has held a series of encouraging meetings at the Baptist Tabernacle, Southport. At one of the services some sixty young people professed decision for Christ.

At the conclusion of his present evangelistic tour, Mr. Bewley Weaver has to undergo an operation for the removal of a growth which, as the result of continued speaking, has formed under his tongue.

Mr. Canning, of the Evangelisation Society, has conducted a Gospel mission in Grangemouth. Night after night, there were souls seeking the Saviour, while many believers have been revived and quickened.

Remarkable blessing has attended the meetings held in Bristol by Mr. Charles Inglis. The preaching was very faithful and definite, especially on the subjects of sin and repentance. Large numbers professed conversion.

A week's mission, conducted by Mr. Ned Wright at Woodberry Hall, South Tottenham, has been well attended, and resulted in much blessing. Believers have been stirred up, backsliders restored, and sinners converted.

P.

Mr. H. Stafford Smith has conducted a mission over nineteen days at King's Teignton, South Devon. The attendance was exceedingly good. The Gospel was clearly and faithfully proclaimed. Many were led to give themselves to the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Carrubbers Close Mission, Edinburgh, has had quite a number of anxious enquirers of late coming about the meetings. The young converts' meeting last Friday was the largest yet held; many are being awakened and led into the light one by one. R. C.

A United Free Church Mission, extending over a week, has been held at Buckley, near Chester, with not a few tokens of Divine blessing. The preachers were various ministers and laymen. Some earnest united prayer meetings were held before the mission.

Miss Gill, of Devonport, has completed a fortnight's mission at the Baptist Chapel, Shaldon, followed by a fortnight's mission at Bishopsteignton. Believers have been quickened and sinners awakened. At the closing meeting in each place numerous testimonies were given to blessing received.

Mr. Bray, of the Evangelisation Society, has concluded a mission at Cripplestyle, Cranborne, Dorset, that has stirred the neighbourhood. Many have been awakened to a sense of sin, the spiritual life of the Church revived. A pleasing feature has been the hearty co-operation of other churches. On one occasion no less than thirteen were represented. All the meetings were well attended, and some were crowded.

Mr. Newton Jones has concluded a ten days' mission at Bridgwater, held under the auspices of the local Sunday School Union. The meetings have been well attended, and as the result it is believed that many have been led to trust in the Lord Jesus as their Saviour; others have confessed Christ openly. The work among the children has been specially encouraging. Mr. Jones impressed upon the the workers the great need of following up the work. B. L. Sully, Hon. Sec.

The revival meetings recently held by Rev. E. Payson Hammond in South Omaha, U.S.A., were attended by marked conviction, and some hundreds of persons professed conversion. Subsequently Mr. Hammond conducted special meetings at the Lowe Avenue Presbyterian Church. At the first gathering for children many of the pupils of the public schools were present, and were greatly interested by a talk on "dolls," in which the speaker drew many spiritual lessons from his homely subject. The meetings were to be continued at Clifton Hill Presbyterian church, a chief feature again being the gatherings for young people.

Requests for Prayer.

For a series of Gospel meetings in the village of Whittlets, Ayrshire, under the auspices of Ayrshire Christian Union.

For blessing on eight days' mission to be held in St. Saviour's Mission Hall, Mary Street, Dundas Hill, Glasgow, commencing March 5.

On behalf of a ten days' mission to be conducted by Rev. J. P. Cushing in St. Andrew's Parish, Dublin, March 4-13.

For blessing on a week's special mission to be held by Rev. John Mitchell, at Shirehampton, commencing March 5.

For blessing in the closing meetings of Mr. Galletly at the Conference Hall, Stratford. Praise is given for blessing already received.

For blessing on meeting at the Southend Evangelistic Mission Hall, conducted by Pastor T. L. Johnson.

For blessing on Rev. T. Cook's mission at Drayton Park.

For special mission by Mr. Leonard Weaver and blind singers at Earlham Hall, Dalston, from Sunday, March 5.

Praise.

For the Divine blessing for the missions at Kilcadden and Ballindvate, Co. Donegal, conducted by Mr. William Cowden, Belfast.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. B. Donkersley, a faithful official of Buxton Road, Huddersfield, Wesleyan Circuit.—Rev. W. H. Awdry, rector of Ludgershall, Wilts, aged sixty-three.—Rev. Cadvan Jones, the well-known Welsh Congregational minister of Carmarthen, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He had ministered for nearly forty-eight years in the Tony Valley, Carmarthenshire.—Mr. George Rushbrook, Wesleyan, of Ampthill, senior circuit steward.—Rev. Richard Ridgill, by whose recent decease South Africa has lost one of the oldest of the second generation of Methodist ministers. For more than fifty years his name has been a household word in the Cape of Good Hope District, in which his whole term of service was spent.—Grimsby Methodism, in the decease of Mr. John Goddard at the ripe age of eighty-two, has lost an attached member and an active worker of former years.—Mr. John Richardson, one of the senior inhabitants of West Hartlepool, who was largely interested in the founding of the Tower Street Congregational Church, aged seventy-nine.—The sudden and unexpected death of Samuel Baker at Hoshangabad removes one of the oldest Indian missionaries of the Society of Friends.—Suddenly at Walsall, Rev. Elijah Clapham (Wesleyan). During the fifteen years he spent in circuit work he was much respected in St. Austell, Marazion, St. Just, and Selby circuits.—Dr. Herbert Bree, the Bishop of Barbadoes, has died at Brighton. Dr. Bree was consecrated in 1882; was curate of Drinkstone, Suffolk, 1851-4; Wolverstone, Suffolk, 1854-8; rector of Harkstead, 1858-65; vicar of Brampton, Hunts, 1870-82; and was appointed Bishop of Barbadoes in 1882.—Mr. William Bickford-Smith, a prominent Wesleyan. He was a liberal benefactor to education and philanthropy.—Rev. Maurice Nicholas, Primitive Methodist, in the sixty-seventh year of his age and the forty-second of his ministry.—Alderman George Ridgway, J.P., of Hanley, a well-known member of the Methodist New Connexion. His ancestors were associated with the formation of the connexion in 1797.—Rev. G. Wilson, Free Church minister, Glenluce, N.B., aged seventy-five.—At Norton House, near Falfield, Gloucester, on February 25 (two days before completing his eighty-sixth year), Mr. Charles Bennett, for about fifty-three years a Sunday school teacher and superintendent, and also senior deacon of the Congregational Church, Falfield. For a lengthened period he was guardian of the poor. His early religious life was nourished by the preaching of the Revs. Rowland Hill and Richard Knill.

Letters from Bishop Tucker, giving news from Uganda towards the end of November, describes the military position in Uganda as being far from satisfactory. The missionary work has reached a position in which for a little while no marked progress will seem to take place; but there is no real arrest of progress. The famine in East Equatorial Africa is still causing deep distress.

The Theatrical Mission.—This mission has been doing good work during the winter among theatrical employés. A free tea, followed by earnest Gospel address, has been given every week to some fifty ballet and chorus girls, and there is every reason to believe that deep impressions have been made. In addition to its general work, the mission is frequently called upon to deal with cases of exceptional necessity. Quite recently it succeeded in rescuing two young girls who had been induced to leave their homes in Lancashire by fair promises of employment. Within a week of their arrival in London they were left utterly friendless and penniless on the streets. Finding their way to Macready House, they were at once sheltered, and after telegraphing to their almost broken-hearted parents were sent home. This is but a sample of the cases frequently occurring. The mission is just now making a great effort to rid itself of the financial burden which has rested on it so long.

Temperance Notes.

THE Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs states that the Belgian Government has issued invitations to the International Conference upon the West Africa liquor trade, desiring that it should meet at the earliest possible date.

. . . . . .

In his annual statistical statement of Britian's Drink Bill, Dr. Dawson Burns states that last year the United Kingdom spent on intoxicants two millions and a fifth more than in 1897. In Scotland, however, there was a slight decrease.

Rev. T. Eynon Davies, speaking at a National Temperance League meeting, said that when they found in this country about 27,000 breweries, 170,000 public-houses—one, he believed, for every hundred adult males of the population—600,000 drunkards, falling at the rate of 60,000 per annum into a drunkard's grave, he thought that was sufficient to prove the darkness in the land. He appealed to the young men and young women present to use their influence and power in helping to stay the awful invasion of strong drink.

The Christian Mission, Limehouse.—Situated in the midst of East London's poverty and spiritual darkness, this mission is endeavouring to bring before the people the message of the Gospel. The agencies employed are Gospel services for adults, mothers' meetings, Sunday school, Band of Hope, and other temperance efforts, penny bank, &c. The tract distributors and visitors call regularly at the homes of the people with the glad tidings of salvation, and during the past five years many trophies have been won. God is greatly blessing this part of our work. To go forward, the workers need the prayers and sympathy of friends. There are much sickness and suffering in the district at present; to mitigate this, and to carry on the work efficiently, assistance is greatly required. The hon. sec. of the mission is Mr. J. B. Blair, 24, Salmon Lane, Limehouse, E.

Wallingford, Berks, is a small town, the centre of a large agricultural district. Rather more than a hundred years ago a number of godly folk felt compelled to leave the parish church and erect for themselves a meeting house where a purer gospel could be heard. Hence Market Place Chapel, which for many years was the home of vigorous Christian effort. During recent years, however, while other churches have flourished, this has languished, and of late the doors have been closed. Now at length, with a revival of conditions very similar to those of a century ago, the time has come to reopen the historic building. Pastor Thomas D. Lawton has undertaken the oversight—with nothing in prospect but uphill work, and the joy of serving Christ. The work is not likely to be self-supporting for a considerable time. Full particulars may be had from Mr. Arthur Clayden, 1, Upper Woburn Place, London.

Obituary.

REV. JAMES HOCART.

THE death is announced of Rev. James Hocart, father of the French Wesleyan Methodist Conference, at the advanced age of 87, and the sixty-fifth year of his active work. He was born at Guernsey, of Church of England parents. He was fifteen times elected president of the French Methodist Conference, and was frequently sent as French representative to the British Conference, the last occasion being eighteen months ago at Leeds. He was also the founder of the Paris Children's Home. M. Hocart died at Nimes, after two days' illness, from the effects of cerebral hemorrhage.

MISS KENNY.

A loved and valued worker has been called from our midst into the unveiled presence of the King, whom she so faithfully served. Louisa Kenny had been for fourteen years an untiring but very quiet worker for God. In many an East End factory and workroom her gentle influence was felt, and her earnest words for the Master drew hearts to Him. After six days' sharp illness, on February 18, she fell asleep in Jesus at our London Fields Children's Home. She was carried to her resting place in Abney Park Cemetery by her class of postmen, who offered this last tribute of love to their faithful teacher. A large crowd of sorrowing "mothers" and young business women surrounded the grave, but the sure and certain hope of a joyful meeting at our Lord's return brought comfort to their hearts. Now their prayer is that they may be used in witnessing day by day in many a place where the loved voice will no longer be heard. C. R. Stock.

Tides.

The moon over Barna's mountains
Looks forth, as a lady gay,
At her face so round and ruddy,
In her mirror—the glassy Bay,
Where the tide rises up to meet her,
Ever true to her queenly sway.

The tide comes in from the ocean,
In the moonlight calm and grand,
With life to the myriad creatures
That are waiting in the sand—
With life, in its great suggestions,
To the people on the land.

. . . . . .

A tide comes in from an ocean—
From love's unbounded sea,
From the heart of our Heavenly Father—
Comes in to you and me,
To quench the thirst of our spirits,
However deep it be.

With the power of God behind them,
These living waters glide;
They have need of no human effort
To bring them to our side;
They come and the thirsty drink them,
And they live in the living tide.

Personalia.

Dr. T. J. Barnardo, we are glad to learn, continues to improve, but he is still confined to his room in Belfast. The ailment is the too popular influenza.

Rev. G. S. Everleigh of the Mission to Seamen at St. Vincent, Cape Verde, has been obliged to visit England for surgical aid in consequence of typhoid fever.

Mrs. Soper, widow of the pastor who died last year in New Zealand, has returned to England with her four young children. She hoped to reside with her mother at Birmingham, but on arriving was met with the sad news that death had once more invaded the family, her mother having just died. "Wave upon wave" of trouble for one who had been much weakened by Brazilian fevers. It is hoped that Christian sympathy will be forthcoming for the education of the poor children. Letters to Mrs. Soper should be addressed 188, Camp Hill, Birmingham.

The Y.M.C.A.

A NEW association has been successfully inaugurated, during the past week, at Banbury, Oxon.

A new association has been successfully started at Morecambe. Fifty young men were present at the meeting.

At the Exmouth annual meeting, it was reported that a building fund had been started, £60 being already in hand.

The General Committee at Exeter are planning to increase the annual income by £100, to meet the needs of the growing and encouraging work in that city.

A fortnight's gospel mission by Rev. W. H. Aitken, in connection with the Liverpool Association, has been arranged for in April. Earnest prayer is asked that a rich blessing may rest on the effort.

A motion has been adopted by the Scottish National Council of the Y.M.C.A. to encourage and organise temperance work among the various branches. It has been also agreed to deal with the Y.M.C.A. and the temperance question at the Scottish Conference, to be held in Montrose in September.

The workers of Plymouth, Devonport, and Laira Y.M.C.A.'s met in conference in the Devonport building to discuss the question "The Inner Life of the Associations." The district secretary, Mr. F. J. Fedarb, opened the subject with an address, and an excellent discussion followed on the methods of work.

The annual meeting of the Bournemouth Y.M.C.A., held on February 24, was signalised by a report of the practical clearance of the association from a debt of £1,018, the amount having been raised by a special canvass, made during the past few months. Sir George and Lady Williams will hold a reception of the members on March 8.

Omagh Y.M.C.A. has welcomed the newly-appointed general secretary, Mr. David F. Ramsay. It is the smallest association in the United Kingdom having a paid secretary devoting all his time to the work. Mr. Ramsay commenced with a week's special services, which were owned by God in being the means of leading many souls to decision.

The Southampton Association recently held its annual public meetings. Sir George Williams attended the President's "At Home" in the afternoon and presided at the public meeting in the evening. Clergy and ministers and other prominent gentlemen of the town were present during the day, and many ladies in sympathy with the work also attended.

Delegates from Kettering, Bedford, Leicester, Birmingham, and other centres assembled in the new premises of the Northampton Association on Feb. 23, to confer upon important questions affecting the advancement of association work. Papers were read as follows:—"A Higher Ideal of Membership: How to Promote It," by Mr. A. E. Robinson, of Kettering; "Extension to New Centres," by Mr. Matt. Griffin, of Northampton; "How to Help Weak Centres," by Mr. A. M. Edmonds, of Bedford. Following the conference, the anniversary meeting of the Northampton Association took place. The report showed much valuable work done during the year, while the association had been successful in acquiring suitable premises at a cost of £2,400.

Ladies in Reduced Circumstances.—Kindly allow me to plead in your columns on behalf of a society (for the assistance of ladies in reduced circumstances) of which I am the hon. sec. Many of the members are considerably over seventy years of age, and to these we try to allow small monthly or weekly sums of money. They are too old and feeble any longer to work. Others are able and willing to do so, and almost any kind of plain or fancy needlework can be undertaken by them. This society tries to help ladies who have known better days, and especially those who are now in their old age, overtaken by sickness, and are in dire poverty and distress. Ellen Shallcross

MANY will hear with regret that through the failure, it is hoped but temporary, of Professor White's health, the Central Committee of the Ten Weeks' Bible School have decided to terminate the course forthwith. To those who were looking forward with prayerful interest to the closing lessons, and hoping to witness much blessing as a result, this announcement will bring genuine disappointment. We are glad to believe, however, that God has greatly owned the work in so far as his servant was enabled to carry it forward, and that many who heard the lectures and demonstrations will in future pursue Bible study under new light and with fresh stimulus. Meantime a proposal is made (see p. 16) that permanent courses of Bible study should be established in England under Professor White's direction.

A conspicuous figure in English legal, political, and social life has been removed through the deeply-regretted death of Lord Herschell in New York, where he was representing his country on an international commission. As a lawyer and as a high-minded Christian man he was a worthy successor of such ex-Lord Chancellors as Hatherley, Selborne and Cairns. It is a great thing for any country to possess in its highest officials such men, who were not only humble believers in Jesus Christ, but active workers in his cause. May such a noble line of succession long be maintained. The Queen has shown her deep sense of Lord Herschell's worth by ordering a British warship to convey his remains to England for interment. Many charitable societies and kindred efforts in London will miss his lordship's wise counsel and hearty advocacy.

All English-speaking people are glad that Rudyard Kipling's life has been spared. We could have wished that his and our dependence on Providence had been more generally acknowledged at this critical time; but that is not the way of newspapers—it would be called "cant." One may hope that he himself will not "forget" whose hand has raised him up. He is not afraid to name the name of God, nor to admit that he had been wrong on such an important subject as temperance—how he discovered why ministers "are always raving against drink," and how he vowed his own vow against it; and his "Recessional" will probably outlive all else that he has written. If he will give us more in that strain, and less in the way of exalting our pride as a nation, the generations to come will bless him.

There has been an interesting discussion in Brooklyn on the advisability of more pastoral visitation. Dr Cuyler, in the course of the controversy, has said some straight things to those who depreciate this branch of ministerial work. He says: "The minister ought to go and study his people, and then he ought to study his Bible, then he can bring the truths of the Bible home to his people." It is the "veriest bosh," he adds, for ministers to imagine that their congregations are essentially intellectual! "As a matter of fact, there was a deal more of sober, hard-headed thinking fifty years ago than there is now." Truly what most people need is not thought, but stimulus and help, and conviction driven straight home to their conscience; and the preachers who can do this work with most force and directness are those who have a personal knowledge of their people.

The great difficulty nowadays in the way of pastoral visitation is that of carrying it on at hours when the men are at home. Most ministers from city churches are so beset with evening meetings that it is impossible to do any pastoral work then. Unless means are found of releasing them for one or two evenings early in the week for this purpose, there is no remedy. In the New Testament this trouble, in another form, led to the appointment of deacons, so that the Apostles might be released for distinctively spiritual work in the Church and among individuals. A clear apprehension of the situation might lead to a similar delegation of many of the duties now performed by ministers, so as to release them for the essential function of coming into closer contact with the souls under their charge.

There is something very pathetic in the reappearance of Ranavalo, ex-Queen of Madagascar, for a brief moment, on her way from one place of exile to another. Educated for a Queen, and instructed in the Christian religion, she had the prospect of ruling over a growing and progressive nation, when France, in retaliation for our action in Egypt, sent an army against her, seized her country, and took her away as a captive. It is said that she has since adopted the Roman Catholic faith, which is very likely, considering the influence she is under. But her subjects, though oppressed and terrorised for awhile, have not all fallen under the Romish power; thousands have been true to their faith. And now perchance a better day is coming; for it is said that the prohibitory tariffs which exclude English goods are to be revoked; thus an increase of English influence will come, which will tend to toleration and peace.

Rev. J. T. Lloyd, of Johannesburg, who is in this country, and has been interviewed on the relations between the Uitlanders and the Boers, has uttered some wise remarks on the function of the churches in South Africa in promoting a better feeling between the contending parties. Little good can be done while race antipathies are perpetuated and fostered. Christianity has always been a reconciling force between man and man as well as between man and God. This aspect of the Gospel should be more and more emphasised. The nations and races of the world are being brought into ever closer relationships by commerce, travel, intercourse, and international relationships. But racial and political hatred still continues, and the only force which can reconcile them is the Cross of Christ, in the presence of which all men are one and equal.

"Palm Tree Christians" was the Christian Endeavour topic recently. It would be a great pity if only young "Endeavourers" were to aspire towards this spiritual ideal. The symbolism is so striking that none of us dare turn aside from it without reflection. In ripe, robust manhood the disciple of Christ must be upright, fruitful, useful, full of life and vigour, enduring, and a blessing to his immediate circle of friends. Only by abiding in Christ can he expect to attain these excellencies. Rooted and grounded in Him—not driven about by every wind of doctrine—he reaches the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

It is stated in the daily newspapers that the public are growing weary of the Ritualistic controversy. If so, the Ritualists are not. The passion and the enthusiasm they display are a direct call to those who would defend the "pure milk of the word" from contamination to bestir themselves, and to put aside the love of a false and foolish tolerance with the recrudescent Romanism which is sweeping in one vast tide over the land. The principles of the Protestant Reformation are in real danger, Romanism is determined and unscrupulous, and nothing but a deep awakening of spiritual life and energy will turn it back.

Some of the Sacerdotalists are more honest in stating their aims and intentions than others. The Secretary of the S.P.C.K. said, at Lancaster last week, that the "schools are the nurseries of the Church," and that "if the system were taken away from the Church, where would the Church be?" That national funds and institutions should be used for this purpose would be considered an injustice by such thinkers if they were used by Dissenters for sectarian purposes. Why should it be otherwise when certain Churchmen make secular education a lever by which to turn the rising generation from the faith of their fathers and from the simplicity of the Gospel?

The dictum that "Rome is always changing but is ever the same" has received fresh illustration in the Papal decree, on the attempt that has recently been made to "Americanise" Popery, i.e., to adapt the teaching of the Church of Rome to the freer air and more democratic conditions of life in the United States. Under the garb of specious verbiage the document shows the same unyielding attitude towards the spirit of liberty which has always characterised the Vatican authorities. American Romanists will have to submit their intelligence and their conscience to the principles of Jesuitism, or break away from the Papal tyranny. There is no hope of reform, no prospect of any independence of judgment or conviction. "The liberty wherewith Christ has made us free" has no place in the iron system of Romanism. That is always and everywhere the enemy of spiritual progress and of individual judgment. Therein lies its final condemnation.

It seems incredible, until we seriously think about it, that the drink bill of the United Kingdom for last year, according to Dr. Dawson Burns, reached the almost fabulous sum of over £154,000,000. This is a most serious thing from an economic and moral point of view, for after all this vast amount does not represent the whole loss to the country. There are the wrecked lives of men and women by thousands, who but for this monstrous evil might have attained honourable positions in society, and helped to promote holiness and truth. The influence, too, of these wasted lives on others can never be estimated.

The ancient "preacher who sought to find out acceptable words—words of delight," was a wise man, who may be usefully imitated by every preacher of the Gospel. All the great preachers have been masters of words, which they used for the purpose of setting the truth forth with the utmost clearness and attractiveness. There is no need, in declaring the unsearchable riches of Christ, to have a bald, hard, repulsive style. A vivid apprehension of the truth and warmth of love to the Saviour must of necessity create a glowing form of utterance. The soul makes the shapes in which all sentences are cast. Paul objected to "enticing words of man's wisdom," and preferred such as the Holy Spirit taught; but these were rushing, mighty sentences Dr. Dale used rhetoric as a Divine talent. Bunyan and Spurgeon will never be excelled for strength, simplicity, and melody; their words win men to ponder the meaning that lies in their pellucid depths. Of the Master his enemies said: "Never man spake like this man."

"It is sometimes a man's duty not to choose the work that he can do best, but to accept the work to which in the Divine wisdom he has evidently been set."

These words, from the biography of the late Dr. Dale, express a great and forgotten truth. It is taken for granted that it is a man's true aim to get into the exact sphere in which he feels he can do most justice to his own powers. The apportionment of our lot and opportunity in life frequently does not seem to fulfil this law. The result in many cases is a sense of disappointment and fancied injustice, with consequent discouragement and half-hearted service. Work done in this spirit is work ill-done.

This was the sin of the man with one talent; but it often afflicts those who have five. At its root is a secret pride, which professes to know its own merit, and chafes at the limitations of the appointed lot. We must not affect to know our place in the world better than God. There may be better work to be done where we are, if we will but look for it, than where we are not. In Dr. Dale's case, his firm conviction at a certain period in his career that he would have had a more congenial sphere in Manchester, to which he was called, than at Birmingham, was overridden, and he remained where he was, with what splendid results we now all know. We should have less unrest in the ministry and in many other positions of Christian service if we could have more of this spirit to follow the "pillar of cloud and of fire" whither it leads.

There are few more needed lessons in the present day than to distinguish clearly between "feverishness" and activity. In business, in the home, and in religious service there is a perpetual tendency to fume and fret, and when this habit generates its inevitable result—exhaustion—the complaint rises about overstrain and nervous failure. Very many of these evil consequences are the result of a flassy and unnecessary expenditure of energy, which, if it had been wisely husbanded and frugally expended, would have been amply sufficient to meet the demands of life. In the Gospels we have the picture of a life that was full of intense and unremitting activity. Jesus Christ "went about doing good." In the midst of it all He was beautifully and unfailingly calm, and never gave way to feverishness of mind and feeling. And He left his people the legacy of his "peace." It is a legacy which few of them have known how to appropriate. But it is an essential condition of relief from the "overstrain" of which we are always complaining.

The secret of peace is prayer. Those who think they have no time for this refuge from the frets and cares of life would do well to remember Luther's paradox, who said that when he had a specially hard day before him, he could not dare face it without first spending some hours in prayer. Another helpful plan would be to run through the Gospels, pencil in hand, and note the number of times our Lord escaped from the multitude in order to be alone with the Father, and how He returned refreshed and strong for the trying duties of his mission. Great doers for God have always been great pray-ers, and they have always said that the secret of their strength was in this prayerful habit. They draw from the inexhaustible fountain of God's grace strength for all the duties and trials of life, and so they are able to go serenely and without exhaustion through the crowded calls upon their energies. He who would work well must therefore pray often; then, according to his day, so shall his strength be.

The pastor of the Original Secession Church, Kirriemuir, Mr. Conn, owing to differences with his fellow ecclesiastics rather than with his own congregation, has left his charge and his communion. We only refer to the matter because of a very noteworthy confession which he made in his farewell discourse on Sunday last. His words were:—

> Among the many lessons I have learned while here I would like to mention one, because it is a lesson that more than myself would do well to take to heart. I preached all manner of sermons and watched their effect. Some were nothing more than an aping after a literary production; some were dry essays; some were as near as I could produce them pure Gospel discourses, containing only the old and new message. These last were the most effective, the most popular, and the ones that reached the heart. I have discovered that the unadulterated Gospel of Jesus Christ is the message men want to hear, and is the message that brings water to the thirsty soul. I shall therefore remember with gratitude the place that has been more than college to me, and has done more to equip me for the work of the ministry than the most extended college curriculum.

Doubtless Mr. Conn will find another pulpit, in surroundings more to his mind; if his parting words at Kirriemuir are heeded by all preachers, this unpleasant experience will have proved a blessing in disguise.

Indian Christian Realm.—Last week's mail brought tidings to this mission of the baptism of eleven Bheel converts in one district; in this same field five educated young Brahmins have applied for baptism. £8 per year will support an Indian worker. Mr. Jai Bhai will very shortly be returning to India. The London office of the society has been removed to 39, Burton Road, Brixton, S.W.

The Late Empress of Austria.—Mainly through the exertions of Miss Stewart Sandeman, a movement is on foot to erect a monument in Switzerland to perpetuate the memory of the lamented Empress of Austria. Already a considerable sum has been raised towards realising the object, but it is hoped that those who can help Switzerland in the matter, not merely to honour a noble name, but to reprobate the crime by which the Empress lost her life, will come forward and make the memorial truly representative. Communications to Miss Sandeman may be addressed Alexander Cottages, Cannes, France

Killed on an Errand of Mercy.

ONE of God's faithful servants of the Sheo-yang Mission, N. China, has been suddenly called from the midst of much loved work to the Master's presence. God grant that these few lines telling of her removal may be used to lead others to consecrate their lives to his service, as was so truly the case with our sister. Miss Ellen K. Brown was early led to the Saviour, and when quite young most earnestly desired to give herself to missionary work abroad. For years she longed and sought to prepare herself for this, but home claims kept her back for many years, during which she laboured earnestly at home, greatly loved and prized by a large number of God's people.

It was only when about fifty-two years of age that a door being opened in which she felt that she might help the work in Shansi, she at last gained the desire of her heart and set forth to join our mission work in Sheo-yang. Her first idea was to set free others for more direct work, by helping in the care of the household and the teaching of a little child; but some years before, when it seemed as though this door might open for service in China, Miss Brown had begun to study Chinese, and with such success that when she arrived in Sheo-yang she could already ready a little, and had copied out eight chapters in John's Gospel in the Chinese characters. Thus from the first she was able to begin to help in the work of making known the Gospel, and before long was wholly engaged in this work.

Bright, loving, energetic, and methodical, she soon made her presence felt, and became a much valued member of our little band of workers, where her loss has now made a sad blank, as she was much beloved by both the Chinese and her fellow workers.

A young girl, betrothed to the son of one of the Christians, had been suffering persecution in the village of Sichuang, about five miles from the city of Sheo-yang, and had sent word to Miss Brown, desiring that she might visit and help her in her trouble. Miss Brown and Miss Shekleton, with two of the Christian women, left Sheo-yang one morning early in November last for the purpose of seeing this girl, and of having a day's work in the villages. Their road lay in a valley by the side of a stream, the banks of which are liable to be undermined by floods. Miss Brown had just been speaking of the joy of service when the cart wheel went down, the bank giving way.

The Chinese women slipped off behind, but the horse and cart with Misses Brown and Shekleton rolled twice over down a bank, about twelve feet deep, into the muddy stream below. Miss Shekleton found herself unhurt, but greatly shaken, lying between the horse's legs. Freeing herself she looked round and called Miss Brown, but there was no reply, for the latter lay buried in the deep mud under the cart, which had turned upside down over her. It was a terrible time as she waited and in vain implored passers-by to help. Over an hour had passed before—by large rewards—men were persuaded to lift the cart and recover the precious remains. It took eighteen men with ropes to drag out the cart, and the body was found deeply embedded in the mud, but bruises on the head made it probable that there had not been much pain, and the sweet and restful smile told of the bright hope that shone in our beloved friend's heart and life.

And now dear Ellen Brown is gone who will come to fill the empty place? It was her joy to serve and to use her income for the Lord's cause, giving all freely for Him who loved her, and for his wandering sheep. Are there not many who might follow her example of giving all for Christ, find the hundredfold even now in this present life, and manifold more in the life eternal, and all this in the joy of fellowship with the Lord in his work of suffering. This emptying of Himself and becoming poor to make many rich.

The Necessity of a Mediator.

(Concluded.)

FROM the denial of mediation, as considered last week, let us turn to the affirmation of it, and show how sublime and true it is.

It is a natural principle that wherever there are two great extremes, a middle element is necessary to unite them. Illustrations of this abound on every hand. For example, intercourse between two remote countries, separated from each other by a great ocean, can only be carried on by the "mediation" of vessels, or the cable. In social life mediation prevails everywhere. Between the two extremes of queen and pauper there are many intermediaries through which, in the ordinary way, intercourse is possible. Illustrations such as these, however, are of necessity imperfect, yet they may serve the purpose of shedding a little light upon the higher theme.

Now when we deal with Divine things, we see that mediation is neither mechanical after the manner of a line of steamers plying between two distant countries, nor conventional after the style of our human societies; but that it is a profound necessity, arising out of the essential difference between God and man.

Suppose that man were at his very best, that he had never sinned, that alike in body, mind and spirit he possessed the plenitude of an untarnished purity and power—even then he would be at an infinite distance from the Great Father. He would be finite and but an atom; his eyes could not bear an unmediated vision of the Divine dazzling purity; he would still need a Mediator between himself and his God.

Mediation per se is not a contrivance to repair the damage inflicted by sin; it is an essential element in the intercourse between God and man. But man, alas! is not at his best; he has grievously sinned, and damaged his moral nature to a terrible extent. If then to a perfect man mediation is indispensable, to the sinful man it is trebly necessary.

It is a remarkable phenomenon of religious history that when men have been deeply convicted of sin they have always cried for the Mediator, while they have never assumed the easy airs of those proud spirits which, regarding themselves as better than others, think to approach God without any intermediary.

But who is to be the Mediator? There is but One, replies the Bible. The Bible knows nothing about whose prayers we may invoke in order to obtain the favour of God. Its message is, there is ONE Mediator only—Christ Jesus; and it reveals Him as the GOD-MAN—the second member of the Holy Trinity—"very God of very God, and very man of very man."

A God-man is necessary in the nature of the case, because a mediator must sustain full relation to the two parties. No other being could possibly mediate between the two.

The Mediator must have a fulness both of God and of man, or He would be overwhelmed at once. He must have a fulness of God or He would have no right to approach the Dread Throne of Majesty with anything like authority. He must have a fulness of man, or He could not adequately represent the whole human race. Any imperfection about Him would disqualify Him for the office of Mediator.

Jesus Christ alone answers to this demand. He is both God and Man. He has a fulness of each. He is absolutely immaculate. He is the God-man and therefore the sole bond of union between God and man. We need to be most jealous here for the honour of our Lord. There is a word-juggling abroad concerning the person of Jesus Christ which is contemptible to the last degree. Men admit his "Divinity," yet when they are pressed to define their meaning, all they wish to convey is that He is "Divine" in the sense that Dante, Tasso, or Fra Angelico were "Divine." They mean no more than that He is a man of God; they do not believe Him to be a God-man. Now a man of God is no use whatever as a uniting person between man and God. At the highest he is but a man.

Jesus Christ then is presented to us as the One Mediator; but why He rather than another? The Bible defines even that for us. It gives to us why Jesus should be the One Mediator. The most succinct account is found in Colossians I., where the threefold relation of Jesus Christ is set forth as the ground of His mediatory work.

A COMPLETE ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS

(1). His relation to the Father. "He is the image of the invisible God," (i. 15). "All fulness dwells in Him" (ii. 9). The Godhead has relation within itself, and the relation of Jesus is that of the Eternal Son. He was from the beginning: He was with God—He was God. He was "in the bosom of the Father." He was "the beloved Son." He had his glory with the Father "before the world was." He saw the Father and He was his "express image." So that, if revelation is to be accepted at all, we must believe that Jesus had a perfection of God, and so fulfilled one of the conditions of a mediator between God and man.

(2). But our Lord has also a special relation to creation (i. 16). The New Testament is very emphatic about one thing, i.e., that the Father did not produce the universe immediately, but mediately through the Son. "In Him were all things created that are in heaven and earth . . . all things were created in Him and for Him." Further, Christ is the principle of cohesion in the universe. "In Him all things cohere" (ver. 17). Even Christians talk loosely about "God" having created all things. In the most careful way the Apostles insist upon the truth that Jesus Christ the Son was the active agent in creation.

(3). Jesus also has an equally special relation to men. He is the "firstborn of all creation" (ver. 15). Elsewhere the same Apostle tells us that "the head of every man is Christ." He is our natural Head: the Pattern after whom we were formed. Jesus did not begin to be the representative of men when He came into our world at Bethlehem—

HE WAS ALWAYS THAT—

but He came into human conditions "to be made like unto his brethren . . . that He might make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (Heb. ii. 17).

But He is also our special Mediator on account of sin. He who created men was best fitted to redeem them, and this his immense love led Him to do. Had sin never occurred, we should all have approached the Father through the reigning Son; as it is, we approach Him through the suffering Son—"through his blood."

Jesus, then, is the one Mediator, because He alone possesses the relation proper to God and to man.

But is He your Mediator, my reader? Have you given Him your sins to cleanse; your prayers and praises and worship to offer?

He is sufficient — no other mediator is needed; but we must accept Him if we are ever to reach the Father. Let none abandon his only hope, by neglecting to make Christ the One Mediator.

Preaching to Unconverted.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D

IS direct preaching to the unconverted as frequent as it was in former times? I feel quite sure that it is not. If anyone will examine the printed discourses of Lyman Beecher, President Edward Dorr Griffin, Dr. Shepard of Bangor, and Dr. Taylor of New Haven, he will see that all those men of great intellectual gifts made it their chief purpose to arouse and direct impenitent souls to Jesus Christ. They recognised human sinfulness, and strove to save sinners. Their style of preaching was common in all the evangelical denominations; even in the Episcopal Church such men of commanding power as Dr. Bedell of Philadelphia and the elder Dr. Tyng practised the same pulpit-methods.

In recent years a great change is observable. Various topics—theological, sociological and ethical—are discussed. A large portion of the sermons preached are addressed chiefly to Christians; and the reason is plausibly presented that if Christians can be kept well up to the mark, sinners will the more readily be won to Christianity. I make no criticism on the methods of my brethren, especially of those who are earnestly aiming to kindle and quicken the people of God; I merely state facts.

Let us go back to the fountain-head. What was the practice of the Divine Founder of Christianity? We are told that "Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." What was the practice of the greatest of the apostles? He "ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears," and under his pungent warnings one sinner "trembles" on his throne! The three most conspicuous preachers of the eighteenth century were John Wesley, Whitefield and Jonathan Edwards; and how faithfully and constantly they dealt with the unconverted all my readers know full well. The most successful preacher of this nineteenth century was Charles H. Spurgeon. Look over all his hundreds of sermons and observe what a large portion of them are aimed at awakening the impenitent and bringing them to Jesus Christ. In one of my many talks with him, he inquired, "How far do your American ministers aim at the conversion of souls?" Spurgeon's the "outsiders," kept up an unceasing stream of new converts into his vast church.

When we speak of preaching to the unconverted, we do not mean that sermons are to be only—or even mainly—vehement exhortations. Discourses that are only hortatory seldom produce much result. We mean that the eye of the preacher is not to be chiefly on Christians, but very largely on those whom he strives to make Christians. He should so instruct sinners as to the nature, guilt and doom of sin, and so instruct them as to the benefits and blessings of the Christian life, as to win them to the Saviour. In his efforts to convert sinners he should not cap Sinai or conceal hell! "Warn them from Me!" is the Divine injunction to all his ambassadors; and because there is less of this solemn, tender warning to sinners, is one reason why the number of conversions is sadly decreasing. If ministers do not pray, preach, and labour to win the unconverted to Christ, then not many will be won.

Dr. Alexander McLaren, of Manchester, is not a hortatory preacher; he is profoundly instructive as well as eloquent; yet in nearly all his discourses he recognises the awful fact of sin and presents Jesus Christ constantly to his hearers. The atoning blood streams through all his sermons. What I am driving at is, to urge my brethren to direct efforts to move and win the unconverted to Christ. Essays, treatises, and ethical discussions are not the staple of a soul-converting pulpit. The great mission of the Christian ministry is "to seek and to save the lost." A ministry that brings no souls to Christ is—not a success whatever it may do.

I.—HOW I FOUND MY PARISH.

ABOUT the year 1890, having occasion to be in Glasgow one day, I spent an hour at the noon meeting in the Christian Institute. The subject for the day was, "Be filled with the Spirit," and the speaker dealt with the theme in the clearest and simplest way possible. It came home to me with fuller meaning than ever, and with the assurance that God meant really to fill us according to his command.

The meeting was closed with prayer, when I remembered different persons were named for whom special prayer was made that they might be filled with the Spirit. As I sat wondering, Had these persons been filled as we prayed for them? there arose a wish that the speaker had known my name, so that I also might have been prayed for. But as no one in the meeting knew me, or could possibly know my name, I decided to ask for myself that I too might share this blessing. I asked that I might be filled, and gave God the promise that I would seek to find some of those for whom Christ died, and bring them to his feet.

Having claimed this blessing, apart from any emotional experience, I left the Institute, wondering what I could do, or where I could go, to fulfil my vow. Thus musing, I wondered on until I turned the Trongate corner. On looking up to see where I was, I found I was in the locality of the Saltmarket. I had heard of the place before, but never had seen it. My chief thought was, Surely I have been led here by the Spirit, that here I may fulfil the promise newly made. As any one at all acquainted with the Saltmarket knows, there are plenty there steeped in sin, and as much lost as it is possible for human beings to be.

I walked on, wondering if I should speak to one of the many women I noticed loitering about. After a word of prayer, in which I asked to be led to the right one, my attention was directed to a young woman who had just come out of a close near me, and whose appearance indicated that

SHE WAS ANYTHING BUT HAPPY.

I ventured to ask her if she stayed there, and she answered that her home was up in the right hand garret I asked her name, and was told it was "Nellie." But my inquiries nettled her. Why, she asked, was I "speiring sae mony questions?" what was I wanting with her?

I replied that my only reason was my wish to help her, and that I wondered if we could not be friends. She answered back quite gruffly, that when she wanted a friend she would pick one for herself, and it would never be I. Then she told me to go about my business, and leave her alone. Surely I did not know what kind of woman she was? She did not want anybody to come about her, and had no thought or wish to lead a different life.

After trying to converse with her a little longer, I saw that she wanted to get away, and so I said to her:

"I will come and see you in your own house some day, and perhaps you will let me get talking to you there?"

I need not come to her door, she replied angrily; it would never be opened to me, and I would never get within it if she could help it. So I said "Good-bye; but mind, I am coming to see you, and I am quite sure I shall get in some day."

As I came away from Nellie that day, my mind was filled with the thought of her miserable face. I felt sure that the call to go after her till she was found had come from the Good Shepherd, who specially rejoices over the return of those who have gone far astray.

II.—THE TALE OF A SIEGE.

The following week I went along to Nellie's home to pay her a visit and try to have a talk with her. I found her door easily, and on my knocking, it was opened by the girl herself; but before I could get saying a single sentence she had it shut again. I waited for some time, but she refused to open. I could go, she called out to me, and need never come back, for she would never let me in; I need not waste any time on her.

With the assurance in my heart that she would one day be won for Christ, I did not consider that the time would be "wasted," although I called back again; and so the following week I once more climbed the stair leading to the right-hand garret, but only to meet with the same reception — the door being opened and shut as soon as ever I was recognised.

I went twelve times, I think, but always with the same result—never getting one sentence spoken. On the thirteenth occasion, she opened the door rather wider, and informed me that if I came back another time, she would throw so determined was she to stop my visits. She looked quite wild that day, as if she could really carry out her threat.

On going down the stair, I met a lady coming up; and, as she seemed to be a visitor among the poor there, I asked her if she had ever visited the girl who stayed in the right-hand garret. She said she had been at her door twice, but had got it closed in her face, and had not gone back. I told her I had been thirteen times, and had that day been promised a bucket of water if I made my appearance again; "but," I added, "of course I mean to go back again. I wonder if two would be better than one? Do you think you would agree to go with me the next time?"

She laughingly replied, "To get a share of the pail of water?"

But, as we made no agreement to meet, I returned alone the following week, which was my fourteenth time. As I went upstairs, I thought that if Nellie threw the water, there was no neighbour there but would just laugh, and think it all a fine farce, and say I had got what I deserved for coming so often where I was not welcome.

On knocking at the door there was no answer, and I thought she must be out, although I knew it was generally the evening before she went out much. I repeated my knock several times, and then a voice from within said "Come in!" Opening the door and entering, I found Nellie lying on a bed of straw with no covering over her except a piece of packsheet. I could easily see she was in a kind of fever and suffering very much; but as soon as she recognised me, she said in the same bitter tone as she had used to me week after week:

"Oh, it's you, is it? And so you've got in owre at last! I ken ye're rael prood that I'm ailen, because it's let you get in, and you wadna hae gotten in ony ither way." She went on to tell me that I need not wait, as I was not wanted, and she did not think any good person would wait where they were not wanted.

I told her I could not possibly leave her without doing something for her; and as I could find no food in the house to cook, I went out and got something for her. When I had prepared it, she would scarcely take it because I had made it. Then I went for a doctor. On examining the girl, he said she was very low; suffering from a fever brought on

PARTLY THROUGH STARVATION!

She was lying on a bundle of straw, with scarcely anything of any value in the room. For the renting of this garret she paid a trifle in the month. Her life, almost from the time she knew anything, had been a course of sin. Her own mother had sent her to the street when she was about fifteen, and never had she known what it was to earn food or clothing by honest labour. No love had come into her life, no kind word been spoken to her, and she had grown up to think how much better it would have been for her if she had never been born.

I visited her as often as I could, and sometimes sat a few hours with her, always trying to speak a word for the Saviour who loved her, and had given Himself for even her. As may be guessed, her ignorance was great. She had never heard of the Saviour, nor had she any idea that He had come from heaven to earth to save sinners, even the chief. The story of his love and power was new; in fact, it seemed to her almost incredible. In a life to which no love had come, it was no wonder she could scarcely believe that love so great could exist. Sometimes, while I was speaking to her, she would say that the only proof she had was that I had come so often when I had got the door shut. That, she thought, suggested the possibility that God might love her a little. I tried to lead her on to the greater proof that God had given in Jesus, and all the blessings He had promised us, as we received his salvation which comes through faith in his Son. As I went often to see her I got to love her, and thought I would go after no other one till she was won, so that I might devote all the time I had to her.

Thoughts for Parents.

AMUSEMENTS.

Let the young men now arise and play before us.—(2 Sam. ii. 14).

BODY and mind alike require recreation; neither good health nor wisdom is possible without it. The aim of parents should be to find such recreations for their children as shall invigorate spirit, mind, and body. Time spent in games is not lost.

Much of the so-called amusement of the present day is absolutely exhausting; the laborious Sunday outing; the dance carried on until early morning; the athletics, which require the Sunday to be spent in bed to recuperate. The theatre and the music hall—places where the senses are stirred, the passions fired, and the deadly drink furnished—are not the places for your boys and girls. Good rules for the guidance of parents as to amusements are the following tests. Amusements are wrong which

1. Render work distasteful.
2. Damage the desire for Divine things.
3. Involve the moral loss of those who amuse.

Direct your children's minds to simple pleasure, cultivate the sense of beauty in scenery, in trees and flowers, birds and insects, river and sea, sun, moon and stars. Do not grudge a day spent with them in the country.

Frances S. Hallowes.

True Love.

Love without knowledge is impossible.
True love is born of reverence and worth;
The child of fancy sickens at its birth,
And only high-born love has permanence.
Man was not made to feed on mad desire,
But o'er his passions to hold dominance;
Burning at last clear passage by love's fire
Through all earth's darkened heap corruptible.

Thus may two souls, in perfect union blending,
Grow more each day in other to rejoice;
Thus man and wife, in friendship never ending,
May praise their Maker with united voice:
Love is of God, and unto God must tend,
Who having loved, loves freely to the end.

Literature for India.—Several homes of rest for missionaries are being opened in Coonoor, India, by Miss Orlebar. One will be for invalids, and a school will be established for the children of missionaries. Miss Orlebar will be glad if our readers will send periodically copies of The Christian and other literature of a helpful kind. Packets should be addressed to her, post paid, at Cairnsfoot, Coonoor, India.

Female Education Society.—Miss Gage-Brown, lady superintendent, Chinese Girls' School, Singapore, writes on February 3: "We have had an anxious year with regard to our buildings, as they have, one by one, become dangerous. Two have fallen, happily without injuring anyone, as all were outside at the time. They will cost quite £140 to rebuild, and we are anxious to avoid debt. We continue our efforts to reduce our mortgage of long standing for £550, and are glad to be able to report that about one quarter of this has now been collected." Help for either of these objects, or the support of one of the orphan girls at £10 per annum, will be gratefully received by Miss Webb, 267, Vauxhall Bridge Road, London, S.W.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, March 12. Numbers xxiii.

THIS is the story of an extraordinary attempt on the part of two men to induce the Almighty to fall in with their plans. Balak had a great belief in the malediction of the prophet to whom he had sent two embassies. Beneath his words he expected to see Israel wither. Therefore, everything was done that he could do to secure his purpose; the altars were reared, the sacrifices offered, and the aspect from which Balaam should look on the encampment, carefully selected, that there should be as little as possible to stir thoughts of Israel's greatness: "Thou shalt see but the utmost part of them."

Balaam on his part was extremely anxious that the flow of inspiration should be antagonistic to Israel, because of the rewards on which he had set his heart. There are times when we are tempted to act similarly. We desire to obtain God's assent to some project on which we are set, and we twist the Bible, or circumstances, or our conscience in that direction. How often people bring themselves to believe that they are right by construing some incident in a non-natural manner, though it is contradicted by the whole trend and drift of God's nature, or by the principles laid down in his Holy Word.

This man who asked to die the death of the righteous, died accursed on the field of battle (Num. xxxi. 8). We must not only cherish good desires, but be careful to yield to the Spirit of God. Nothing is more terrible than to divorce our religion and our morality. To have high and noble thoughts as Balaam had, and to prostitute them for selfish and mercenary ends, is to court hardening of the heart and utter destruction.

MONDAY, March 13. Numbers xxiv.

When your heart is dismayed because of the hatred and opposition of Satan, the great accuser, turn to this chapter. If Satan stands to resist you, the Son of God stands up in your defence. He will make it clear that, in spite of all that may be said or done to the contrary, it has pleased the Lord to bless you; not because you are invulnerable, for there is more than enough to justify the worst maledictions of the adversary, but because God hath entered into a covenant with Christ, in whom by faith you stand accepted.

In Deut. xxiii. 5 we are told the blessed secret which explains Balaam's failure: "The Lord would not hearken unto Balaam; but the Lord thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the Lord thy God loved thee." Because He had set his eternal, unchanging love on Israel for their fathers' sakes, and for the sake of his Son, He stood by them. All that Balaam could do or say failed to alter his tender regard. So with his saints still.

These words of Balaam give us a remarkable insight into the spirit of prophecy. It is, first, clear that a man may be greatly gifted, and yet altogether wanting in grace. It is also clear, that inspiration was at times altogether above man's control, bearing him forward to matters of which he naturally had no knowledge. What fair thoughts God has of his people! Here was his ideal for Israel, which they so sadly missed. See to it, my soul, that thou dost not so traverse the Divine purpose in thy life.

TUESDAY, March 14. Numbers xxv.

This was a shameful fall, due, as we learn in subsequent Scripture, from the suggestions of Balaam. Thwarted on one side, he would at least succeed on another (Rev. ii. 14). If his incantations and curses failed to divert God's favour from the people of his choice, he would at least inaugurate a policy which would secure the same result. For if Israel were allured into the licentious rites and practices of Moab, this would, in itself, alienate them from their pure and holy God.

Ah! believer, be warned by this terrible chapter. It may become so literally part of your inner history. It is true that Satan cannot divert God's love from you; but he can so tempt you to sin as to cause God to withdraw his favour and help. You may become joined to your idols or to the world, and the anger of the Lord be kindled against you.

Let us not be entangled by the fatal web of evil, but resemble Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, who was jealous with God's own jealousy. Let us come out from among the adulteries of the world and its infidelity to the love of God; let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; let us go out to Jesus without the camp, bearing his reproach. Then God will receive us, and be a Father unto us, and make with us a covenant of peace.

WEDNESDAY, March 15. Numbers xxvi.

The numbers of Israel, at the end of the forty years wandering, were much as they were at the commencement: compare v. 51 with Num. i. 46 and v. 62 with Num. iii. 39. But the salient point is brought out in v. 64, that there was not one man left of the former generation with the exception of Joshua and Caleb. Their carcases fell in the wilderness, even all that were numbered of them, from twenty years old and upward (Num. xiv. 29).

It is inevitable that unbelief will keep the unbeliever from the land of rest, satisfaction, and victory. There is no escaping this law. Our exclusion does not depend so much on any individual decision on the part of God, as on the very nature of the case. Faith alone can claim and enjoy the Divine provision which is ours in Jesus. God has stored in Jesus all that we need for life and godliness, all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, but they will not avail us until we definitely claim and accept them. There is forgiveness in Jesus for all, but it avails nothing till the penitent sinner claims it. There is abundance of grace and power, but they avail nought unless we learn to receive them. It is only they that receive the abundance of grace that can reign in life.

THURSDAY, March 16. Numbers xxvii.

Up to the last Moses was faithful as a servant to Him that appointed him, in all his house. Notice that he did not attempt to legislate for these young girls, who pleaded for a possession in their father's right; but he brought their cause before God. It was still, "as the Lord commanded Moses" (vv. 11, 22.). And when God calls for him to ascend the mountain and die, his main anxiety is on behalf of a successor to lead the people out and bring them in, "that the congregation of the Lord should not be as sheep without a shepherd." It is much to trust God, it is more to be trusted by Him. The one is faith, the other faithfulness. Let us so act, that God may be able to entrust us with the interests of his kingdom, whether less or more.

The Master said: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." There is the servant stage and the friend stage in Christian life. If we are faithful in the one we shall be promoted to the other, in which the mysteries that had veiled the face of the truth shall be withdrawn, and we shall see, not in a glass darkly, but face to face.

FRIDAY, March 17. Numbers xxviii.

"My food" (v. 1, R.V.). Such is the Divine designation of the offerings which Israel was to make by fire. And it is added that they would be as a sweet savour to God.

Thus we may think of our Saviour's consecration to do the Father's will. For Him that will was meat indeed and drink indeed: for his Father, his obedience was as bread—sweet-smelling savour also (Eph. v. 2). And when we truly appreciate and meditate upon that sublime self-sacrifice which yielded back the life which the Father gave (John v. 26, x. 18), we too feed with God. This is the mystery of the Lord's Supper. It is the communion of the Body and Blood of Christ, not with one another only, but with the Father.

The children of Israel were required to observe the religious year. Each day and Sabbath day had appropriate victims; the beginning of each month was specially signalised, and the opening month of the year brought again the reminder of the blood by which they had been redeemed. This principle, at least, is very applicable to ourselves. We are apt to fall into a routine, and our religious life to sink into a dull uniformity. It is well then to have special seasons—the anniversaries of birthdays, deliverances, or ordinations—in which we shall renew our early vows. And since we are in danger of slurring over the successive incidents in "the process of Jesus Christ," it is good to set apart certain seasons for their special remembrance. We are bound by no human legislation, but we may voluntarily adopt the principle of the Christian Year, and follow the steps of Jesus from his Birth to his Ascension.

SATURDAY, March 18. Numbers xxix.

The children of Israel certainly did not sacrifice to God of that which cost them nothing; and the enumeration of the sacrifices in the present chapter is sufficient to show the costliness of the ancient ritual. It has been calculated, indeed, that these "old Jews," as they are rather disrespectfully designated, gave as much as one-third of their entire income to the maintenance of the Tabernacle and the service of God. And in truth the closing verses of this chapter corroborate the same conclusion: "These shall ye offer, beside" . .

Let us therefore search ourselves whether our gifts are commensurate to the great love and cost of our redemption. If in the twilight of the law they gave so much, what ought not we to give in the meridian glory of the Gospel? The true system is to count ourselves God's bond-slaves, and to reckon that He expects us to hold all our property for Himself, reserving only what is necessary for the maintenance of ourselves and our homes. Most Christians practise the reverse of this. They take all as their own, giving what they think they can spare to God; instead of counting all as God's own, allowing themselves what they think He would permit for their own support.

In this connection we should remember that union with the death of Jesus should characterise every day; and if we voluntarily dedicate one day to its special remembrance, it is that all other days may share the blessed result: "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow Me."

John Hooper,

and the Priesthood of Believers.

By MARGARET A. ROLLESTON.

PERHAPS there has been no time in the history of the Church when it has been more necessary to have clear scriptural views on the Christian Priesthood than now; for while the work of denouncing the errors and abuses connected with the Catholic and Anglican theories of the priesthood has been most necessary, it is certain that the plain exposition of the truth does more than any amount of bare negative criticism to lead men into the liberty Christ has won for them.

This is more especially the case when, as in the present Church crisis, one side is in possession of a half truth, which, from its very character, is more difficult to fight than a lie; and the other has in the past too much neglected the doctrine of the priesthood of the believer. Let us never forget that in virtue of Christ's sacrifice we are "kings and priests unto God"—"kings" in the sense that through Christ we have been made conquerors over our evil natures; "priests," in that we are privileged to offer ourselves to God, and to proclaim the Gospel to others. In studying the New Testament doctrine of the priesthood of believers, the life and writings of Bishop Hooper, martyr in the reign of Mary, form an excellent commentary.

John Hooper was born in 1495, and after an education at Oxford became a monk. Probably he was disillusioned as to the holiness of the monastic life, for he abandoned its profession, and in 1536, we find him again at Oxford, "stirred with fervent desire to the love and knowledge of the Scriptures."

was completed by reading the writings of the Swiss reformers, and then he tells us he determined by God's grace "to serve my godly brethren in Christ, and the ungodly for Christ." Persecution, following Henry VIII.'s "Bloody Statute" against the Protestants, forced Hooper to flee for his life, and after many adventures, "bonds and imprisonment—harassed by sea both by enemies and storm," he finally reached a safe haven at Zurich. He devoted himself to Scriptural study, and in 1546 married Anna de Tserclas, "a godly and wise woman," and thus, like Luther, asserted the falsity of the monastic ideal.

In 1547 he wrote his "Declaration of Christ and his Office," of which the greater part is occupied in an examination of the priestly office of our Lord. This he shows to be fourfold: 1st as Teacher, 2nd as sole Mediator, 3rd as sole Sacrifice for sin, 4th as Sanctifier of his people. From Scripture Hooper pointed out that Christ came to teach, and how He commanded his Apostles to do the same. From 1 Peter ii. 9, he proves that the priestly office of the Christian consists in preaching "the power of Him that hath called us from the darkness of sin." Throughout his writings Hooper lays great stress upon the importance of the preacher's or priest's office, which is "to show, by the Word of God, God's justice against sin, and God's mercy in Christ to such as repent." The name priest, used for a church officer, means, according to Hooper, a preacher. "Let all bishops and priests know," he said in one of his sermons, "their office is to preach and pray."

It was not till two years after the accession of Edward VI. that Hooper returned to England to aid in the advance of Evangelical truth. He was shocked at the Popish character of the service still retained by the English Church, and he set himself by his bold Scriptural preaching to open men's eyes to the truth. Twice, and even thrice, a day he would address large crowds, and we read that the people "looked upon him as a prophet." In 1551 he was appointed Bishop of Gloucester, but on account of his objection to the episcopal vestments there was difficulty about his consecration. Cranmer and Ridley argued that such matters of clothing were indifferent, and that for the sake of peace and quietness they should be retained. Hooper answered, "As ye have taken away the mass from the people, so take from them her feathers also. . . . For things that be not brought in by Christ but by popes, must be restored to them again. . . . If these things"—(i.e., candles, vestments, crosses, altars)—"be kept in the Church as things indifferent, at length they will be maintained as things necessary."

It would be well if the rulers of the English Church would remember Hooper's words of warning, instead of following the example of Ridley, which the latter afterwards acknowledged as mistaken, in asserting the non-importance of certain ceremonies. Ritualism may, as Bishop Barry says (Contemporary, November, 1898), have arisen, partly out of "the desire to clothe with dignity, and . . . . with beauty the offering of Divine worship," yet, as having for its avowed object the teaching of doctrine which will bring men back to the bondage of the law, it cannot be too strongly resisted. The Levitical priesthood has been superseded, and "there is made of necessity a change also of the law."

For a time the dispute between the Protestant leaders was very bitter. Finally, a compromise was arranged by Hooper consenting to wear the obnoxious garments on grand occasions, but being allowed as a general rule to do as he pleased. As bishop, no one could have exceeded Hooper's activity. When urged to take care of his health, he answered "We are born for our country and not for ourselves," and so capable did he prove himself to be that the Diocese of Worcester was put under his charge. The state of the clergy in the West of England was indeed deplorable. Out of 311 there were 168 who could not say the Ten Commandments, and forty who did not know where in the Bible the Lord's Prayer was!

BITTER WAS THE OPPOSITION

that Hooper had to meet from bigotry, ignorance, and sin, but he laboured so wisely and boldly that when his brief episcopate was over he had gained his people's love whilst leading them to Christ.

On the death of Edward VI. he loyally supported the claim of Mary to the throne, for, though he knew her accession would probably mean his death, he also knew that the cause of truth is not served by injustice. His loyalty went for nothing; he was deprived of his bishopric and thrown into prison on the charge of heresy. This accusation was based upon (1) his denial of the virtue of celibacy, and (2) his rejection of transubstantiation. We cannot stop to consider his trial nor his sufferings in prison, nor his quiet, patient conduct, which won for him the goodwill of his guards. To strike terror into the western counties, the Government decided to have him burnt to death at Gloucester; and there, on February 9, 1555, in the presence of a large concourse of people, he witnessed by his death to the truth of the one all-sufficient sacrifice of Calvary.

The Railway Mission Convalescent Home. — The annual report of the home at St. Leonards contains a record of good work done among our railway men during the past year. 283 men were admitted as patients. Interesting extracts are given from letters written by the men expressing their deep gratitude for the benefits of the home, both physically and spiritually. A number of the men embraced God's offer of salvation during their stay. The need for this Convalescent Home will be seen from the fact that about 3,000 railway men are injured every year by accident in the United Kingdom. Further particulars may be had from Mr. R. Nixon, secretary, Railway Mission, 1, Adam Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Motherless Children.—Three years since a small home was opened at Chiswick. So numerous have been the applications that now two homes and a cottage (with accommodation for sixty-one children who have no mother) fail to meet the need. It is desired to open another home as soon so the necessary funds are forthcoming. £2 10s. entitles the donor to name a bed, and £10 a ward, and such a gift would prove a fitting memorial of a mother's love and care. Though no father pays more than 5s. a week, yet by careful management the homes are (beyond the matter of furnishing) nearly self-supporting. As children are now awaiting admission, it is hoped that friends will soon help to furnish an additional home. Particulars may be had from the founder, Mr. R. T. Smith, 90, Thornton Avenue, Chiswick.

The English Church Union.

THE influence of the English Church Union is great and widespread, and altogether on the side of Romanising practices. At length the Union has declared itself on the various questions raised by recent controversies, and in tone and substance the manifesto is even more Romish than the well-known utterance of the clerical meeting held a few weeks since in Holborn Town Hall.

According to the Union, which numbers its members by thousands, alike in the clergy and also the lay ranks, the Church of England is not Protestant but Catholic, and practices that obtained before the Reformation may be continued to-day if they have not been expressly forbidden in the Prayer Book! This is a bold contention, but it is by no means the boldest to which Lord Halifax and others like-minded commit themselves in the memorial adopted at the meeting of the E.C.U. held on Tuesday last week.

In face of a whole dispensation of change and re-construction in the sixteenth century, the Union plays with terms and "denies that a new religious establishment was set up in England in the sixteenth century." Again, in face of facts, numerous, well attested, and undisputed for generations, the Union denies the right of the Crown or of Parliament to determine the doctrine, the discipline, and the ceremonial of the Church of England. The rule of the Bishops is to be respected or otherwise according to the character of the same and the trend of the decisions they arrive at.

Of course, it is impossible to conceive a Church enjoying State patronage without submitting to State control. The issue involved seems to have occurred to the framers of the memorial, for they even say, "We are not prepared to barter the principles of the Church for the sake either of establishment or endowment." They go further, and profess themselves willing to suffer gladly in the maintenance of these things. Yet no sooner does the manifesto see the light than a number of clergymen come forward, questioning the policy of the Union, criticising its details, and intimating their determination to stand on one side! In a word, the memorial seems to have

OVERSHOT ITS MARK.

Taken as it stands, the document expresses mutinous sentiments. The "continuity" which is so much affected by High Churchmen is a misnomer—in reality, a reversion to pre-Reformation type. The will of the people, we sincerely trust, stands in the way of this; while the Church is the Church of England, it must submit to the decisions of the courts and the control of Parliament. The daily Press of every section has exposed the intolerable nature of the claims of the Union. The Standard, for instance, insisting upon loyalty and obedience on the part of the clergy, wrote:—

To deny the supremacy of the Crown in ecclesiastical cases is to be false to the Thirty-nine Articles, which every priest is called upon to subscribe. To disobey the authority of the Bishops is to be false to the oath which every priest takes on his ordination. We have no patience with men who accept Crown livings, and every advantage which the Establishment confers upon them, and then flout the authority alike of the State and of their ecclesiastical superiors.

With equal force the Daily News declared:

The mask is thrown off at last, and the Ritualist Party have openly declared their mutiny. They deny the Royal Supremacy. They assert their independence of the State. They flout the Reformation. They throw aside their vows of canonical obedience. There is only one law which they recognise, and that is the law which they mean to be unto themselves.

The Record believes that the action of the E.C.U. has given the bishops a great, perhaps a last, opportunity; if they embrace it boldly, the Church and the nation will support them.

The leaders of the revolt will go to Rome and be swallowed up out of sight; the rest will remain, chastened and obedient. The Church will be saved. But if they now hesitate, temporise, shilly-shally; if they rely on smooth words and vague promises and charitable hopes and conjectural developments of favourable events, they are lost; and so is the Church. Disestablishment, disendowment on the worst terms, and then disruption are upon us.

An interesting feature of the present situation is that, notwithstanding the possible object of this manifesto to intimidate them, some of the Bishops are taking steps to stem the advance of Ritualism. Even High Church prelates are putting their feet down; and assuredly the time has come for those who have a name to be Evangelicals to see that the law, as it has been fully ascertained, shall be upheld by those who have voluntarily placed themselves under its operation.

Meanwhile, the memorial of the Union has been discussed in various parts of the country. A useful word was spoken at Louth by Mr. R. W. Perks, M. P. He held that:—

So long as the Church is a State establishment, Parliament is responsible to the nation for seeing that the clergy comply with the formularies and teach the doctrines of the Protestant Reformed Church. They could not divest themselves of this duty; and while he, as a Nonconformist of Nonconformists, utterly abhorred the theory of a State Church, he should assist the Protestant evangelical laity of the Church of England in any reasonable measure they might introduce into Parliament to compel the Anglican clergy either to abandon their Romanising practices or else give up their salaries and start a new sect of their own.

This is a reasonable position. Whatever views we may hold on matters of high policy or remote theory, there is no doubt that it is the duty of those who have at heart the cause of the Gospel to do combat with this evil, in the hope that its baneful consequences may be lessened, and opportunity be given for the dissemination of those truths and principles which are the warp and woof of the Heavenly Message to men.

Protestant Outlook.

IN the House of Lords on Friday, Lord Kinnaird moved for returns as to the exercise of the Bishops' veto, and the setting up of confessional boxes in Anglican churches. Lord Dudley, on behalf of the Government, said that a return under the Church Discipline Act could not be granted, as no records were kept; but a return was being made by the House of Commons with regard to the Public Worship Regulation Act. A return of the number of churches in which confessional boxes had been set up, was agreed to.

In the course of the debate on Lord Kinnaird's motion, the Marquis of Salisbury spoke some piquant words on Confession. He held that no return would tell one-hundredth part of the evil of the practice; also he feared that, as those who return the existence of a confessional box would thereby confess to committing a breach of the law, it would be difficult to ascertain the true condition of things. The Premier seems to think that confession to so-called Anglican priests is confined to women; but those who have more thorough knowledge of the spread of sacerdotal opinions know that many men are victims of the same sinful delusion.

One of the most serious features of the present crisis in the Church of England is the custom of some clergymen to take the children of the day-school to church to witness mass, making this spectacle a substitute for religious instruction. Parents who object to the pretensions of the clergy to change bread and wine into the very body and blood of Christ may well object to their children being led away to see the profane mummery practised. And all English people who remain Protestant in their convictions, and pay rates and taxes, have a right to object. The Bishop of Oxford, we are glad to see, has forbidden the children of Burnham, Bucks, to be taken to church to see mass; but the Government declares that it is "no part of the functions of the Committee of Council to interfere with the religious instruction given to the children of voluntary schools."

Mr. Frank Roberts, writing from Ingham Lodge, South Myms, Barnet, tells in few words a typical story. A new vicar was recently appointed, and on his induction read the usual solemn declaration. Immediately afterwards he introduced into the service candles, wafers, incense, crosses, acolytes, prostrations, adoration of the Host, and other Romish practices. The Bishop of London was appealed to; the cleric was "admonished," but without improvement. The dishonesty of such conduct needs not to be mentioned. Mr. Roberts says it is impossible for Protestants to attend the parish church. He concludes:—

Unfortunately it is the only place of worship in the village, and we are thus placed in the dilemma of either abstaining from public worship altogether or building a free church. We are adopting the latter alternative, and thus a parish of over 550 inhabitants is divided against itself solely through the mischievous action of one man.

In a long letter to The Times on Saturday last, Mr. Walter Walsh, author of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement," says that nearly 1,800 clergymen of the Church of England pray every month for the restoration of "Sacramental confession." He writes:—

The English Church Union advocates Sacramental confession in a large number of its publications, and its confessional—as well as its other work—is supported by 4,200 clergy and thirty-two bishops. Sacramental confession is undoubtedly a part of "extreme" Ritualism, yet many of the bishops tell us that there is "very little" of it at the present time!

The clerical oppression which goes on in country districts in the interests of Sacerdotal teaching may be judged from the following instances in Norfolk.

A mother was persuaded to have her child re-baptised a few days after this had been done by a Congregational minister. A young girl was forced to attend church instead of chapel as a condition of entering the teaching profession. A Methodist local preacher, after being promised a farm by a vicar, was soundly refused directly he confessed his Dissenting principles, the vicar saying "I'll never have a Methodist in my parish." The parents of certain children attending a Church School were summoned because they stayed away during Passion Week, when they were required to attend Church every day.

These cases are personally vouched for in answer to a challenge from the Vicar of Whitwell, who denied that any charges could be substantiated of oppression and bribery against the Church.

In an article in the Positivist Review, Mr. Frederic Harrison says:—

It looks like a hopeless task for the Bishops to stem, with bland episcopal counsels, the tendency they have so long trifled with, minimised, and even encouraged. And yet, if they do not, if there be more rebellion, more scandals, more open Romanism in the Church, the British public—which is still Protestant in mass—will knock aloud at the doors of the House of Lords and of Commons, and will insist that these Popish practices and priestly usurpations shall no longer be carried out by the wealth and prerogatives of a Parliamentary Church.

Among recent demonstrations in which Protestant truth has been set forth as an antidote to Romish error, may be mentioned one at Oxford, addressed by Dr. Charles H. H. Wright, and another at Acton, at which Rev. James Neil was the speaker.

A statement, signed by members of the House of Commons and others, has been issued on behalf of the Nonconformist Political Council with reference to the proposed Roman Catholic University for Ireland. The Council gives many reasons and arguments against the endowment of sectarianism in any form.

Howard Street Gospel Mission (Wandsworth Road, S.W.).—During the four months thousands of poor have been fed and cared for by the mission. It has been pitiful to see children with hardly any clothing to cover them, no boots on, and almost starving. The superintendent is Mr. John Soames.

Manchester "Strangers' Homes."—These excellent institutions, conveniently situated near the railway stations, Manchester, and instituted under the care of Bishop Fraser, provide a temporary home for respectable women and girls. When absolutely needed, a free bed, supper, and breakfast are given; the case is investigated, a loan made, or the fare paid, and the stranger seen off to her own home. During the past year much good work has been done. The inmates—for the most part young women from the south—go to Manchester in search of employment, while many hot-tempered, self-willed wives and girls who have run away from home or been placed in circumstances of difficulty, have been advised and mothered. The hon. superintendent is Miss Wright, 9, Addison Terrace, Victoria Park, Manchester.

International S.S. Lessons.

"Christ the Good Shepherd."—John x. 1-16.

Golden Text.—Verse 11.

Introductory.

THE behaviour of the Pharisees to the blind man whom Christ had healed (question on the last lesson) led to the discourse which forms our lesson for to-day. Jesus made Himself known to the poor man who had been driven from the Temple, and then addressed Himself to those who set themselves up as the leaders of religion (Refer to Matt. xv. 14). They were bad shepherds; Jesus, in contrast, calls Himself the Good Shepherd. The Pharisees would know from their Scriptures the meaning of Christ's words. The Jews were a nation of shepherds (Gen. xlvii. 3). The teachers of the people had been reproved under this title (Ezek. xxxiv. 1-10). Their Messiah had been foretold under the imagery of a shepherd (Isa. xlix. 10, Jer. xxxi. 10, Zech. ix. 16, Mic. v. 4). David, the type of Christ, was the Shepherd King, Ps. xxiii. was familiar to all. When the Lord proclaimed "I am the Good Shepherd," they must have recognised who it was He claimed to be.

Explanatory.

Verse 1. Eastern sheepfolds were not covered, but enclosed places surrounded by a wall of loose stones with thorn bushes on the top—sometimes a shelter at one side in case of storm; they were built on the sunny side of the hill. Shepherds led their flocks in at night, shut the door, and left them in charge of the porter and his dogs. "Thieves" steal craftily. "Robbers" come in gangs and use violence (see Jer. xxiii. 21). (Boys climbing over a wall to rob an orchard.)

Verses 2 and 3. The shepherds return to the fold in the morning, ask the porter to open the door, then call their own sheep by name, and they come out from the rest and follow him. Some sheep have characteristic names, as "One Eye," "Torn Ear," "Broken Leg." The shepherd calls the names very rapidly, and they come at once and he leads them out (Ps. xxiii.).

Verse 5. A fact in Eastern life. A traveller in Greece once met three shepherds with flocks of 500 or 600 sheep each, all mixed up together, and he tested them by getting one and another to call a particular sheep, and watch them find their way out to their master.

Verse 6. This allegory about the door. The sheepfold means the Kingdom of Heaven, Christ the only entrance thereto.

Verse 8. Anyone else professing to be the Messiah, or teaching any other way into God's Kingdom. A true test for all teachers, preachers, rulers.

Verse 9. The door shut in for safety, shuts out enemies; yet the sheep are not prisoners, but go in and out under the shepherd's care (John xiv. 6, Eph. ii. 18).

Verse 10. Not only life, but abundant vitality, overflowing with activity and joy.

Verse. 11. Characteristics of the Good Shepherd? Enumerate them.

Verse 13. Hireling: some one who works only for pay, not from love.

Verses 14, 15. R.v. "I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me and I know the Father." Intimate relation.

Verse 16. Many folds but only "one flock," and "one Good Shepherd."

Lesson Points.

1. Only one way into Christ's kingdom. Care needed that I get in.
2. Thieves that try to steal us away—sin, temptations, &c.
3. Two "I ams" of Christ. Think of some more.
4. Christ the Good Shepherd Isaiah (xl. 11). The Great Shepherd (Heb. xiii. 20). The Chief Shepherd (1 Peter v. 4).
5. The sheep and lambs are the true disciples of Jesus: He knows them and they know Him, and are known by their obedience to his voice.
6. The Good Shepherd specially cares for the lambs (Isaiah xl. 11, Mark x. 16).
7. Jesus knows us by name, knows all about us individually.
8. Jesus seeks after the wanderers (Luke xv. 4-7). Died for all.
9. If we love Jesus we shall listen to his voice and follow Him.
10. How do we hear the voice of Jesus speaking to us?
11. Test all other teaching by the words of the Lord.
12. Test ourselves. Do I know Jesus as my own Shepherd?

School for Bible Study.

TO the regret of all who have attended the meetings in connection with the Ten Weeks' School for Bible Study, the work has told seriously upon the health of Professor White. The result was apparent on Wednesday last week, when the exertion of expounding the Epistle to the Galatians to the large audience gathered in the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, proved too much for the highly-strung mind, and the Professor was compelled to seek relief in prayer and heart composure.

Those who know what is involved in public effort on a large scale must deeply sympathise with the victim of this sad, but let us hope only temporary, breakdown. There is nothing mechanical about Dr. White's work; he prepares for every address, and he spends himself in every effort. It seems clear now that the arrangements by which the School was opened, with two meetings daily for several days in the week, involved labour beyond the powers of the Professor—exertions on a scale that few men could endure for any length of time.

The meeting on Tuesday in the King's Hall was largely attended, and the subject was

THE BOOK OF JOB.

To begin with, Dr. White quoted from (among others) Sir William Jones and Daniel Webster, Charles Dudley Warner and John Ruskin, on the Bible as literature; and regarding the book of Job he quoted from Carlyle and Victor Hugo. Both these latter spoke of the grandeur of the composition, the Frenchman saying that if to-morrow all literature were to be destroyed, and it was left to him to retain one work only, he would save Job! Though a great work, and worthy the attention of the most thoughtful mind, the Bible is simplicity itself in making known the way of salvation. The waters of Scripture are, as has been said, shallow enough for a lamb to wade in, deep enough for an elephant to swim in.

Dramatic poetry, as we know it, is not found in the Hebrew Scriptures, three parts of which are poetic in one form or another. Job, however, comes near to the dramatic type, being singularly living in its portraiture of persons and events. The epic also is lacking; while other literature glorifies man, the Hebrew ever honours and glorifies God. The Psalms constitute the finest lyric poetry in the world. Job is didactic, and has been from Moses to Jeremiah, and assigned to various periods of Israelitish history. On the whole, Professor White inclined to the earlier date, the absence of any allusion to the great events of Israel's history and well-known religious institutions favouring this view.

The structure of the book suggests a historical basis, with a digest of discussions on the great subject of the relation of suffering to sin. The first two chapters comprise the prologue. After Job's introductory lamentation (iii.) comes the first cycle of the poem (iv. to xiv.), in which Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar speak, and are answered by Job. The second cycle consists of chaps. xv. to xxi., in which there are further speeches, with answers. In the third cycle (xxii. to xxxi.) there are addresses by Eliphaz and Bildad, with an answer to each. Then follow the speeches of Elihu (xxxii. to xxxvii.), and the address of the Almighty Himself out of the whirlwind (xxxviii. to xlii. 6). The remainder of the concluding chapter is an epilogue narrating the end of Job's life. Proceeding to notice

FEATURES IN DETAIL,

Dr. White remarked that the first address of Eliphaz is regarded as one of the masterpieces of the book. (1) He noted particularly the ghost scene in iv. 12-17. Eliphaz claims to have received doctrine through some supernatural being, and hopes thus to impress his views upon Job. (2) Observe also the unsurpassed picture of a troubled conscience in xv. 20-28; and (3) the Redeemer passage in xix. 25-27, in which Job reaches his deepest depths, and in his darkest hour takes his highest flight of faith. Here we are in the middle chapter of the middle cycle of the debate, and by the arguments of his friends, the sufferer is driven more and more into the mystery of the situation. More and more, also, does he reject their views and statements about his case, and at length he shakes himself free from his friends and falls back upon God. He finds that there is no help in those who had come to console him, and, as has been said, he planted the flag of victory upon his own grave. He knows his Redeemer is living, and is assured of vindication in the end.

No longer does he charge God with injustice. He was never in reality bitter against God as he conceived Him, but rather against the God depicted by his friends. As to their doctrine of God, it was true as to character, but wrongly applied. For a time Job accepted it, but finally he repelled it. That fact alleviates the difficulty caused by some of the statements of Job concerning God. The prologue makes him out to be a just man; and the epilogue finds him where he was at the beginning—a servant of God who had spoken what was right. Great care is needed to distinguish things said concerning God according to the special context in which they appear.

Another (4) notable passage describes the majesty of God in nature (chap. xxvi.). The whole book is enveloped in natural scenery. Then again (5) described in chap. xxviii., contains a marvellous description of mining operations. (6) Also note Job's solemn protestation of innocence in xxxi. He is more than ever set against the charge that his suffering has come because of sin. There is a tendency of self-righteousness (though no claim to sinlessness) in the statement; and maybe that tendency was one reason why God brought trouble upon him. Job maintained that the special sin charged upon him by his friends was not in his life. That was true, and possibly that is the special point for which he was commended by God (xlii. 7). (7) Finally, note the addresses of God, chaps. xxxviii.-xli.

Dr. White proceeded to expose the comparative barrenness of the thought of Job's friends. They could quote precedents by the score; but Job knew that he had not sinned as they declared, and therefore he would not allow their teaching as to the cause of his trials. Driven to desperation, he argued that if God had sent the suffering because of sin, then He was attributing to him offences which he had not committed! Note Job's constant

"WHEREFORES?"

While he inquires, his friends are positive in their declarations. He was in dead earnest to understand his trials; and the man who emulates his example will, in like manner, find his way into the light. God will show Himself to any man who asks "wherefore," and takes all the means of finding out the will of God.

The prologue makes it clear that the suffering was sent as the result of a suggestion on the part of the adversary that Job was not serving God for nought, but had selfish ends in view. God allowed Job to be tested, to show whether he had more than selfish motives; and the grace of God enabled the man to stand the test, so that to intelligences throughout the universe it was demonstrated, as it has often been since, that goodness and love of God may be disinterested. The words of the adversary, "All that a man hath will he give for his life," are not true. A man will give his life for the love of God. The doctrine of suffering presented by the friends is, generally speaking, that suffering is punitive; that involves the conclusion that there has been sin in proportion. Elihu regarded the suffering as corrective, and held God to be right in sending it. He would emphasise the fact that God sends suffering for man's good. The words of God at the close of the debate give no new explanation of what had taken place, but were rather a full and gracious

REVELATION OF HIMSELF.

God does not place Himself at our disposal to explain his treatment in its various processes; sufficient for us to know that God understands all and has a purpose for our good. Job accepts the fact that God knows, and comes out of his trial, not as a result of explanation, but as the result of an operation of faith. God does not base his claim to man's love and obedience upon explanation, but upon evidence. It is impossible for God to make everything plain to us; but if we get a conviction that God is just, holy, and wise, and if we are able to take hold of Him by faith and accept Him, we shall be happy even in the presence of mystery. Among the

LESSONS DERIVED FROM THE BOOK,

Dr. White mentioned—(a) There may be suffering which is not punishment for sin. (b) Suffering is not evidence in all cases of special sin in the life. (c) God may send suffering to test or try, just as He did to Job and Abraham—to develop our character, and prepare us for a fuller revelation of Himself. (d) All things work together for good to them that love God. (e) Selfishness is not the mainspring of love of God; goodness may exist irrespective of a sense of reward. In connection with the problem of suffering, study three Psalms, xxxvii., xlix. and lxxiii., and recall the statement of the Apostle James: "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord, how that the Lord is full of pity and merciful." Again: "We call them blessed that endure;" and "Take, brethren, for an example of suffering and of patience, the prophets" (James v. 10, 11, R.V.).

On Wednesday afternoon, in Queen's Hall, Langham Place, Dr. White began an address on the Epistle to the Galatians, but he was unable to develop the subject through sudden indisposition. This much, however, was made clear, that whereas the Epistle to the Romans shows that salvation is not dependent upon works, that to the Galatians shows that it is not dependent upon ceremonies.

CLOSE OF THE SCHOOL.

At a meeting on Friday last of the Central Committee of the School for Bible Study, the following resolutions were passed:—

(1.) "The temporary failure of Prof. White's health having rendered necessary the discontinuance for the present of his lectures, the committee have decided to bring them to a close at once, as the course is almost completed."

(2.) To Prof. White, to be signed by members of Central and Local Committees:—"We, the undersigned members of the central and local committees of the Ten Weeks' School for Bible study, desire to express to you our grateful thanks for your lectures. We rejoice with you in the remarkable blessing which God has vouchsafed. Your lectures have given to many a new view of the Bible, and to all an impetus to fresh study. We pray that our deeper enthusiasm in the study of the Word, and our closer adherence to the will of God, may be a permanent memorial to you, and a reward for the abundant labour you have so ungrudgingly expended in the School for Bible Study. It would be a joy to the committee if this present visit should result in the permanent establishment of similar courses under your direction."

Money paid for unused tickets will, if desired, be refunded on application to the secretary, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W., who will also gladly receive and forward any thank-offerings towards Dr. White's Missionary Fund for India.

A PROPOSAL.

Sir,—The announcement of Professor White's breakdown at his sixty-ninth lecture, on March 1, has evoked, we know, the deepest sympathy.

His methods of Bible study have proved so great a blessing, and the interest in them has so widened and deepened week by week that we may surely hope their sudden cessation is not final.

Many friends have already expressed an earnest desire that a permanent School for Bible Study might be established in London under Professor White. Will all who know him join in prayer that his health may be completely restored, and that, if it be God's will, the way may be made clear for him to return and undertake this great work?

I shall be happy to receive communications and suggestions on the subject from any who will kindly write to me.—Yours faithfully,

J. Herbert Tritton.

A Semi-Jubilee.

PASTOR DAVID J. FINDLAY,
St George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow.

THE celebration by Pastor Findlay of his semi-jubilee in work for God in Glasgow carries us back to the stirring revival times of 1874, when the Holy Spirit was claiming the allegiance of many choice spirits among the young men of the west of Scotland. Mr. Findlay was only in his sixteenth year, but matured physically and mentally beyond his fellows, when the call came to consecrate his big heart and great capacity for work. Ever since he has been filled with a passion for the winning of souls.

One evening, in February of the year named, a neighbour came into the house of the Findlay family, saying he had just attended a most remarkable meeting. At Mr. Moody's invitation 101 young men had risen to make solemn profession of having received the Saviour. A week later, Dr. Alexander McLaren, of Manchester, preached from John iii. 16. At the close of the service Mr. Findlay, with many others, crossed the street to another church where Mr. Moody was preaching. He can recall nothing of text or address, but the singing of a hymn—"Just as I am without one plea"—is riveted in his memory. When those were asked to stand who were Christians, or who wished to press into the Kingdom, he felt glad that he had no seat; and he still looks back to the singing of that hymn as the occasion when he consciously "passed from death into life."

Having had the advantage of a godly up-bringing, at the hands of parents who are still spared to him, the young convert was well versed in Scripture knowledge, and with a characteristic energy at once set about his Heavenly Father's business. By the autumn of 1874 he had originated a kitchen meeting, which continued for two years, although the accommodation was altogether inadequate for the numbers who came. In 1876 the British Workman Public-house movement was inaugurated, under the auspices of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association; and an application by Mr. Findlay for leave to hold a week-night meeting in one of their rooms was granted on condition that he would also conduct one on Sabbath evening. About the same time the Evangelistic Association also introduced tent-work into their operations, and Mr. Findlay threw all his energies into it during the summer months of each year till 1894. Two years under the British Workman roof were followed by six in Grove Street Home Mission Institute, and these again by two in the Windsor Hall.

In 1885 Mr. Findlay's attention was drawn to Garscube Hall, then newly built, with the result that it became the centre for ten winter seasons of much blessed work in a densely populated district. These were years of upbuilding as well as of ingathering. A great company of those for whom the darkness had been dispelled began to apply themselves diligently to the study of the Word, and the hall became even more widely known and appreciated as a place of meeting for workers from different parts of the city. The fellowship meetings attracted visitors from distances and were themselves an eloquent testimony to the value of the help, stimulus, and encouragement received.

The work took what promises to be its permanent form when, with the Autumn Conference of 1894, the Tabernacle in New City Road was publicly dedicated. The main hall seats 1,000 persons, and on many occasions this accommodation has been taxed to its utmost capacity, while on not a few it has fallen far short of the requirements. Every Lord's Day it is well filled three times. Conversions have never been tabulated. No one is asked to continue coming, should he prefer to worship and serve elsewhere, and the records of what God has wrought here would be hard to gather together. Besides those who have gone to other parts of the country and to distant lands, there are men and women scattered over missions and churches in every part of Glasgow who are never done telling of blessing received at the Tabernacle. No sectarian element is allowed to interfere with the simplicity of Gospel effort.

The outstanding and continuous success experienced is attributed, by those who know it best, to the fact that prayer is made the beginning, middle, and end of every step taken. The greatest possible emphasis is placed on this, with the result that at least six meetings are held every week exclusively for intercession and supplication. Equal importance is attached to systematic Scripture study, while the great aim of the pastor is the expository unfolding of the Word. The third main feature may be said to be the constant open-air testimony. Even in winter, not fewer than four such meetings are held weekly, a number greatly increased in summer. Thirty of the workers have set themselves apart for the regular visitation of a needy street in the vicinity; and a special benediction, shared by all concerned, has rested on this branch.

A leading feature of Garscube Hall, the Tent, and the Tabernacle has always been special missions; recently they have been held twice in each year. A strong mission is arranged in connection with the autumn conference with another in spring adapted to any special circumstances that may arise. No such season has ever been barren. Without exception they have been times of special harvesting. Conversions are laboured for, prayerfully expected, and graciously granted at all times; but the missions have been occasions when the Lord "made bare his holy arm" in the eyes of all.

The interest in the wider field is carefully fostered. A missionary prayer-meeting is held every week, with frequent gatherings for the reception of those engaged in the high places of the field. Many who have had a more or less close connection with the Tabernacle have gone forth at the Lord's call to different parts of the world; but ten who are specially reckoned "of our own number" have answered the summons in this way, and of these several are wholly maintained by their old friends and companions in arms. Over and over it has been proved that prayer was followed by generous gift, and that again by self-surrender.

No account of the Tabernacle, or of its pastor, would be complete without a reference to Mrs. Findlay. Her father is Mr. William Quarrier, well-known as the friend of the orphan and outcast children of Scotland. The greatest blessing of Mr. Findlay's life, since his conversion, was his marriage nearly seventeen years ago. From the very outset his wife was a powerful influence for good, both directly and indirectly. She has seldom come to the front as a speaker at large public gatherings; but, while health and other circumstances permitted, she carried on a meeting for mothers, through which many were helped into the upward way, and others to a clearer understanding of the path of holiness. A number of the workers and friends are united in a prayer union. Many a shy girl and woman have been attracted by Mrs. Findlay's winning smile and gentle manner. Where other workers have been baffled she has won confidence, and has had the privilege of leading not a few into peace and joy. The sick and suffering have been her special care.

Those who know Mr. Findlay intimately are deeply impressed with his strength of character and many-sidedness. Through all these years he has been carrying on—as he still does—his business in Argyle Street, and in addition has found time and opportunity to show a practical interest in many good causes. Few are privileged to look back over such a record of successful work in the Gospel, and he has been cheered as well as surprised to hear from different countries of lonely and discouraged workers stimulated to fresh exertions by his testimony to the abiding faithfulness of God.

Our Oxford Letter.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

CONTROVERSY is not pleasant, but it is certainly necessary. Such was our feeling on Monday evening after attending a lecture by Dr. C. H. Wright on "The Sacrifice of Christ and the Sacrifice of the Mass." Dr. Wright is the clerical and general superintendent of the Protestant Reformation Society, and on the Sunday preached two sermons in St. Aldate's on "The Bible and the Church" and "Is Protestantism a Negative Religion?" The lecture on Monday drew a large audience. There was some opposition, but Dr. Wright said that no anathemas of Rome would alarm him, and no anathema would prevent him from saying that there was no need of any repetition or continuation of the sacrifice of Christ, which was complete and finished.

Mr. Beaney, "bishop of the hotels of London," as he styles himself, had an interesting account to give on Thursday of his work for the London City Mission among hotel employés. The power of the Word of God was illustrated in striking ways, many dating their conversion from the day they began to read the Bible given by the Missioner.

One cannot but regret that the occasion of sending down an undergraduate for misconduct is made the scene of much disorder by other undergrads. This was especially so on Monday, and has given rise to much comment. The party, after creating a disturbance at the station, adjourned to the refreshment rooms, where they boisterously drank the health of "the disgraced member." Such scenes themselves add disgrace to dishonour, and must be injurious to the youth of the city.

In connection with Ruskin Hall, which was opened last week with some fifty working-men students, an evangelistic service has been commenced on Sunday evenings in the Corn Exchange. There is room for services of this kind, where aggressive evangelistic work will be carried on.

Rev. F. F. Irving, speaking on Thursday on behalf of the Assyrian Mission, said that while the highest praise was due to the Presbyterian Missionaries among the Mohammedans in Turkey and Persia, the results of their work were disheartening. It would almost seem that a religion propagated by the sword is impervious to any means short of its own, and that the Lord's coming alone will usher in a day of salvation or doom for the followers of the false prophet. They that live by the sword shall perish by the sword.

Dr. W. White addressed 100 University men in the Hannington Hall on Sunday evening. His subject was "The Claims of Christ," and he urged the men to keep in mind three things—(1) That the claim rests on evidence, not on explanation; (2) That truth must be studied in relation, and not in the abstract; (3) A beginning should be made with what we are sure is true, and that should be followed at all costs. He said that the religion of Christ was the only one which said, "Live and do."

Home Missions.

Twenty-five Years' Apprenticeship.

THERE was given to the people of Glasgow on Friday last, in connection with the semi-jubilee of the conversion of Pastor David J. Findlay, a splendid object-lesson in the true unity which seems to prevail in an increasing measure among Christians of every name. The chairman (Mr. Daniel Walker) struck the true key-note by declaring that the great gathering was for the exaltation of the Lord Jesus Christ, who had done such great things through his servant. The speakers each came forward as representing different companies of Mr. Findlay's friends of many years. The first two were fitly the presidents respectively of the Lanarkshire and Ayrshire Christian Unions. Mr. John Colville, M.P., recalled with a touch of humour the days of 1874, when the exuberance of the young convert earned for him the name of "Hallelujah Findlay," which still adheres to him; and Mr. William C. Gray told how, as a young convert himself, he had been privileged to join hands with Mr. Findlay while their years were but few.

Following these reminiscences came others from Mr. William M. Oatts (Y.M.C.A.), who dwelt on the outstanding character of the man, and admitted the element of suspicion with which various innovations in the tent and hall work were at first regarded, warning the people at the same time that not even the most successful worker is to be imitated, in building a tabernacle or otherwise, but each man is to do his own work. Mr. William J. Govan spoke earnestly of the genuine satisfaction with which he and Mr. Findlay had laboured together, and Mr. Downie expressed the belief that he was the only other person present who had also been in Free St. Peter's Church on March 3, 1874. The band of foreign missionaries who have gone out from the Tabernacle was represented by Miss Charlotte Kerr (North China), who had known Mr. Findlay from his boyhood, and who testified that the Tabernacle was the only place besides her father's house where she had felt quite at home on her return to this country. Colonel Lamont (Greenock), and Provost Logan (Troon), in addition to personal greetings, brought those of many friends in England and Scotland, who had been brought to the truth through Mr. Findlay's ministry.

Handsome presentations were made to the Pastor and Mrs. Findlay, followed by characteristic and touching addresses in reply, in which all the glory was again humbly ascribed to the Lord. Everything else in the meeting was for the time forgotten, and a deep hush prevailed, as Mr. Findlay made the announcement (for the first time) that the Lord had at length opened up the way for his giving up his business as early as suitable arrangements can be completed, leaving him free to devote himself entirely to Gospel work—"after an apprenticeship of twenty-five years." His wife expressed in a few well chosen words the joy with which they had both received the Divine leading in this matter.

Thereafter congratulations were expressed on behalf of the evangelists who had held missions in the Tabernacle by Mr. John Climie; a word as from old fellow workers came graciously from Mr. John George Govan (Faith Mission); Mr. John W. Arthur (secretary) spoke for the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association; Grove Street Home Mission Institute sent a fitting deputy in Mr. Edward J. Mitchell; the Rev. Edward Last expressed the greetings of ministerial brethren, while the children's department of the Tabernacle work had as spokesman Mr. David J. Knox. In every case there was joined with the warmest expressions of affection a thanksgiving for the new departure which is expected to crown the great things wrought by God in the past. It appeared that one after another had for long considered the change highly desirable, and had frequently pressed the thought on Mr. Findlay's attention.

Even the intervals for music were taken advantage of to afford friends from a distance an opportunity of joining in the meeting; and the only drawback at all seemed to lie in the thought of the hundreds who had wished to be present, but had been unable to find accommodation in the large building.

Southwark Home Mission.

A SPECIAL interest attached to the gatherings last week at the Home Mission Hall, Holland Street, Southwark, in connection with Mr. Fegan's well-known work. The first anniversary of the various mission agencies maintained on the capacious premises, which are specially utilised for the aid of factory girls, happily coincided with the opening of the new Institute for Lads.

The latter building, which adjoins the "Homes for Boys," and fronts on Southwark Street, is a splendid addition to the social and philanthropic institutions of London. Situated in the centre of "hooliganism," it supplies a crying need, easily outrivals the drinking shops in comfort and attraction, but disdains to descend to the merely secular. It bridges the gulf between the Christian youth and the London rough, to the advantage of both, the former graduating as home missionary, and the latter coming into touch with a manly and vigorous type of Christianity.

The upper floors are cosily fitted as class-rooms, where courses of technical instruction will be given, the lower being devoted to reading and meeting rooms, a library, a temperance restaurant, and a splendid gymnasium replete with modern arrangements. In each department there is a sense of homeliness and comfort, the walls are hung with tasteful prints, and the blaze of electric light is everywhere. Certainly if the alleys are not attracted they must be hard to please. The large number of friends assembled in honour of the occasion expressed great satisfaction with the building.

At the public meetings Mr. Fegan described with characteristic vigour and humour the efforts made by the Home Mission in one of the most poverty-stricken of London districts. There is a medical mission, commenced under the guiding counsel of Dr. H. Soltau. The staff includes a qualified Christian medical man, a sister-superintendent, a dispenser and a trained nurse, who devote all their time to the work, and fourteen Christian workers—some who have given themselves to foreign-missionary work, and by way of preparation are undertaking sick nursing in the homes of sorrowful slumdom.

Large numbers of poor people are daily attended to in the dispensary, and by means of a Samaritan Fund the workers "are able to give milk daily for, say, a week to a baby pining away, or a fresh egg daily to a delicate girl, or coal to a poor mother who has not got enough even to warm a poultice." There are, in connection, many other mission agencies of a varied and attractive character. The arrangements made for are beyond praise: many live close at hand and work far away, while others work close by but live at a distance; but both classes attend the Girls' Institute, which Mr. Fegan pointed out has well answered the highest anticipations. Not only are the many useful departments—cooking class, sewing club, library, ambulance class—thoroughly successful, and the cheap meals in great request, but mission services have resulted notably. All the Sunday school teachers are converts of the Mission, and the hall, a favourite resort of the poor, is the scene of great blessing in the Evangelistic meetings.

Mr. Fegan's stimulating reports were received with enthusiasm by large audiences. Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the blind singers, and Madame Annie Ryall sang, and addresses of an inspiring character were given, among those who took part being Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Revs. J. J. Luce and J. Wilson, Messrs. W. H. Seagram, D. C. Apperly, McVicker and Leonard Weaver. The expense of carrying on so extensive a work among all classes of the community is of course considerable, and the necessary outlay in connection with the Youths' Institute especially calls for help. Communications may be sent to Mr. J. W. C. Fegan, the Boys' Home, Southwark Street, S.E.

N. E. London Gospel Mission.

THE many good works which, like thriving buds from a healthy tree, have developed from the North-East London Gospel Mission's original stations must command our sympathy on account of the pronounced Christian spirit which characterises each and all.

For several years the well-known Earlham Hall, in Balls Pond Road, has been a centre of evangelistic work, and a prosperous cause has been built up, bristling with useful agencies, prominent among which are a work-room girls' institute, a night school for rough lads, and a Bible and Christian literature depôt. The mission work in this of London still makes progress, and some interesting instances of changed lives and homes bear witness to its solidity. Earlham Hall is a regular centre of work for many of our leading evangelists. In addition, two aggressive missions are maintained at Bow Common and in the Isle of Dogs.

At the former, amid scenes of squalor and misery, two lady workers devote themselves to the arduous labours of a slum mission. An excellent work is done in sick visitation; rescue and many other social undertakings are the obvious outcome of loving toil in any of our British plague-spots. The district is largely occupied by the match industry, and the Mission's institute for the factory girls has proved a centre of Gospel-light and influence in one of the dreariest neighbourhoods imaginable. The weekly dinners for poor children, and the sales at nominal prices of women's clothing, are a great help to families who exist in a

STATE OF CHRONIC WANT.

The work is maintained in close proximity to the premises of a Romish propagandist effort. At Cubitt Town other evangelistic work, which has been carried on for many years, supplies a great need in a neighbourhood largely under sacerdotal influence.

Among the most successful branches of the mission are the seaside homes at Lancing, which are used to an increasing extent by many south British missions as a summer home for the convalescent poor. There are now four homes, devoted, respectively, to women and children, to men, to mothers with babies, and to the aged and dying. In all, 180 people can be accommodated. As affording to the suffering ones of large cities a brief respite from the agonising struggle for existence, these excellent institutions are well deserving of support.

The demand for admission has so far outgrown the space at command that Mr. Chorley is anxious to secure larger premises, and a providential opening has occurred for securing a really good, large, well-built house of some eighteen or twenty rooms, facing full south, overlooking the Channel, and within a short distance of the beach. A friendly builder has examined the premises, and declares they were not built for the sum that is asked, £2,050, which sum Mr. Chorley desires to raise. Many pathetic stories of of keen, helpless misery relieved, are associated with the home for the dying, and especially satisfactory are those cases in which poor persons of tried Christian character have there found a haven of refuge, which is a happy alternative indeed to the monotony and rigour of workhouse life. Gospel meetings and Bible readings are a regular feature of the administration at each home. Communications regarding the work may be addressed to Mr. Chorley, at 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, N.

The State of South London.

A VIVID description of the condition of those notorious plague spots of South London, which are so well-known as the head centre of Hooliganism, is given by Rev. W. J. Somerville, Rector of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in his recently-issued Annual Report. He says:—

In the courts and alleys off the Borough High Street, drunkenness and immorality abound. This part of the parish consists of a multitude of short streets of two-storey houses, running out of each other at all sorts of angles, and forming a veritable maze to all but constant frequenters.

Only the rent-collector could tell how many families now mingle under one roof; and even he, unless he were the owner and rent-collector rolled into one, would hesitate to term these places really homes. One room is the frequent lot for father, mother, and four or five children. One room also is the holding of multitudes of tenants whose modes of living may not be too closely scrutinised. Men and women of the worst character haunt these places.

About one in every fourteen of the population is born, lives, works, and often dies within the four walls of a one-room tenement. Of every 1,000 children born, 189 die under the age of one year, against 159 in the rest of London. The mortality from measles, diarrhœa, and whooping-cough is very much higher than in the rest of London, some of the chief conditions tending to these deaths being:—Loose, damp soil, polluted by liquid filth from defective sewers, density of population, crowding of buildings on the area, restriction of and impediments to the free circulation of light and air both within and without the buildings, sewer emanations, and accumulations of domestic refuse in ashpits and dustbins. The registers kept at the church show that almost all the births were illegitimate.

There can be no question, says Mr. Somerville, in conclusion, that in Southwark the churches have lost hold upon the people, if indeed they ever had a hold at all. Thousands are living lives of practical heathenism, never entering a place of worship, never thinking of the necessity of training their children in the fear and love of God, never thinking of anything higher than the dull round of monotonous toil, varied with evenings spent at the public-house. There are hundreds of children who ought to be in Sunday schools, but are never found on the Lord's Day elsewhere than on the streets, their childish lips uttering words of awful blasphemy which they constantly hear from their elders, their childish eyes growing accustomed to sights in which they will all too soon take part themselves. There is only one remedy, and that is to send among them men and women whose hearts are on fire with the love of God and their fellow men, who are ready to spend themselves and be spent in their Master's service, who will strive to help, comfort, bless, and raise those with whom they are brought into contact, to whatsoever things are pure, honest, true, lovely, and of good report.

A Growing Work.

MAY I, on behalf of the Committee of the Open-Air Mission, seek prayerful sympathy and help in the present position and prospects of this work?

During the past year we experienced great blessing and enlargement, so that our duty to "go forward" is more than ever clear to us.

There is an unparalleled opportunity in these days for reaching multitudes of our neglected populations with the blessed Gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation. We have seen them listening in hundreds, sometimes for hours together, under the sky of heaven, and at such unlikely preaching-places as racecourses and fairs. Over and over again, as our evangelists have preached and sung the glorious Gospel in the power of the Holy Spirit, have we beheld quivering lips and weeping eyes among the crowd; and more, those impressed have often come forward and yielded themselves to Christ on the spot, and the racecourse or fair-ground has become the scene of a prayer-meeting as we have knelt on the ground and helped souls to a knowledge of the Saviour's ove.

Multitudes have thus been reached of all classes, who seldom or never darken the doors of any Christian sanctuary, and to whom the Gospel, preached in simple dependence upon God's power, comes as a message new and strange. Thus, indeed, we have seen God's power at work in conviction and conversion, in some measure as Whitefield and Wesley, and other glorious heroes of the past century, saw it in their day. Often our services have lasted more than three hours at a time, with an audience standing round as if spellbound the whole time, though they had originally come there for worldly pleasure.

Altogether our evangelists—sometimes many in company—laboured at 811 races, fairs, fêtes, &c., conducted 2,493 special services, distributed 1,018,781 Gospel publications, travelled 63,414 miles, and reached no less than 714 cities, towns and villages in forty-four English and Welsh counties and 127 districts in London. The income increased from £1,663 in 1897 to £2,034 in 1898, but this is not a tithe of what could be used to grand purpose if the committee were entrusted with larger support.

We have issued a little book entitled "The Joy of the Reaper," recounting the blessing given, which we shall be happy to send post free to any reader.

Having brought only a balance of £6 into the new year, we are greatly straitened at present for lack of funds, and the special object of this letter is to beg the help of Christian friends to enable us to launch the year's work on a large scale, and to respond to the requests for evangelists which we are receiving from many distant parts of the country. FRANK COCKREM, Secretary.

Open Air Mission, 11, Adam Street, Strand.

Union Tabernacle, Wandsworth Road.—At the annual congregational meeting, presided over by Pastor D. M. Cameron, an interesting review of the many useful undertakings of the Church, with an account of the year's progress, was given by the secretary, Mr. C. J. Moignard. £350 is required for the erection of a new hall for work among the young. Mr. Cameron is about to start on an evangelistic tour in Scotland, and asks prayer for his meetings at Munlochy Free Church, commencing March 12.

Showmen and Gipsies.—Mrs. Millington, Layerthorpe Grove, York, honorary secretary of the Showmen's Mission, writes emphasising the need there is for increased effort to bring the Gospel message to bear on these nomads. Though rough and careless as a rule, they are amenable to good and kindly influences. Gospel temperance work among the showmen has not been without success in the past. Mrs. Millington asks for the co-operation of our readers, and will send to any applicants copies of The Caravan and the report of the mission.

The Y.M.C.A.

A NEW association has been formed at Bolton, Lancashire.

A successful inaugural meeting has been held of an association at Bridgend, Glamorganshire.

Dr. Monro Gibson has consented to deliver a course of Biblical Lectures at the next Conference of General Secretaries, June 17-23.

The Great Harwood Association has acquired suitable rooms in a central position, and has already a membership of over 100.

The Hastings Association bears an honourable reputation as a recruiting ground for workers in the foreign mission field, no fewer than nine of its members having been accepted by various societies.

The Totterdown (Bristol) Association is commencing forthwith to erect, at the corner of Wells Road and Bushy Park, a new building, which, it is estimated, will cost, including purchase of site and furnishing, a sum of £5,000, of which £3,217 has been already subscribed or promised.

The annual meeting of the Wimbledon Young Men's Christian Association was held in the Lecture Hall on the 2nd inst., the Mayor of Richmond occupying the chair. In the course of the proceedings the deeds of the new premises were presented to the trustees, the building having been freed from debt.

The work of the new association at Oldham was inaugurated by a successful mission to men. The association has already upwards of seventy members. Starting in 1892 with a total membership of forty, the roll of the association now stands at 203, and great promise is given of success in all departments of the work.

Mr. F. G. Wootton, hon. sec. of the Y.M.C.A. and S.C.A. at Lydd, Kent, is anxious that the rooms of the association should be made available every week evening instead of twice or thrice a week as at present. There is no Soldiers' Home for the troops frequently encamped, and the need for such a place of resort is great. Mr. Wootton will be glad of help in this effort.

Sir George Williams presided over the sixteenth annual meeting of the Bournemouth branch. Lord Kinnaird and Rev. W. R. Mowll (Brixton) gave addresses. Sir Matthew Dodsworth, as treasurer, had the satisfaction of announcing the clearance of a heavy mortgage debt which had for some years retarded the full development of the institution.

The Birmingham Association has secured the site of St. Peter's Church, Dale End, for the erection of larger premises, the property having been purchased for it by a friend at a cost of £6,500. It is an extensive piece of freehold land in the centre of the City, more than 2,000 square yards in extent, one minute's walk from Corporation Street, and readily accessible from all parts of Birmingham. The Council have in view the erection of a large pile of buildings thereon. The association has for many years carried on active and varied work amongst the young men of Birmingham.

The forty-fifth report of the Cheltenham Y.M.C.A., presented at the annual meeting of the association, stated that the purchase of the premises now occupied had proved immensely popular amongst the young men in the town, as was evidenced by the fact that no fewer than seventy-seven had joined during the past year. It was a source of satisfaction to the committee that the Cheltenham association, after many years of depression, had once more gained a position as one of the leading associations in the Western District Union. The library of the association contains 3,000 volumes.

The celebration of the ninth anniversary of the Madras Y.M.C.A. has lately been observed. The Bishop of Madras occupied the chair at a public meeting in the Memorial Hall. Mr. W. Reierson Arbuthnot, president, read the annual report, which gave the following particulars: The membership advanced from 425 at the beginning to 521 at the close of the year. Of the 521, 171 are Indian Christians, 236 Hindoos, 20 Mohammedans, one Parsee, one Burman, and 92 Europeans. The treasurer's statement was very satisfactory, showing a total receipt of 6,503 rupees, all locally obtained, which more than met all the expenses of the Association, with the exception of the secretary's salary, which is contributed by friends in America. The educational work of the association, shows considerable progress, and has secured support from the Government in the shape of a grant of 24,000 rupees towards the new building, which will be opened in April next. A hostel for students is part of the enlargement scheme, and will provide accommodation for thirty-eight young men.

Missions to Seamen.—An interesting booklet has been compiled by this society giving many details of the way in which godly seamen have been practical helpers in the evangelisation of people in distant lands. Copies of the pamphlet can be had from the office of the mission, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand W.C

Other Lands.

Visiting Rangoon.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

As the steamer makes its way up the noble Irrawaddy to the city of Rangoon, the eye is arrested by the golden Cupola of the great Buddhist Temple, standing on a wooded height immediately behind the city. It is said to have been erected before the commencement of the Christian era. By universal consent it is admitted to the front rank of the Buddhist temples of the world—some say it is the largest and finest.

There is not much in Rangoon for the mere sightseer. It has all the conditions of becoming a great city, and has already attracted a population of 200,000 from neighbouring countries. Here are Burmese, Karens, Chinese, and Japs; every steamer from Calcutta brings over one or two hundred Bengalis, and in addition there is a strong English garrison, a large colony of Americans, and some 5,000 young Englishmen, who are employed in the various great business houses, the premises of which show nobly along the wharves and quays of the riverside.

The river abounds in craft of all kinds, and its landing-stages are crowded with picturesque groups of coolies, many almost naked, but the majority in light Eastern costumes. The streets—laid out in blocks, after the American system—are broad, shaded by avenues of trees, and intersected with steam trams. Pagodas, Hindoo shrines, drink saloons, houses of glaring shame and sin, churches, bungalows, and public buildings line the streets in every conceivable variety. There are also extensive parks and pleasure-grounds. The municipality is to be congratulated for the broad outlines on which the city is being laid out, the streets presenting a pleasing contrast to those of Calcutta.

Of course, every one goes to see in the woodyards. They wait till the timber is heaped together and surrounded by the chain to which a rope is attached; then, twisting the rope around their trunks, they draw the timber to its place, piling it up according to its length, making the ends even; or perhaps rejecting the whole load if it be, however little, in excess of the usual weight. The way they use trunk, tusks, head, and feet in this laborious work is most astonishing, and is said to be the most extraordinary instance of animal sagacity on record. And they do their work with the air of haughty condescension to the weakness of men whom they are thus compelled to assist. Why should the lords of the forests spend their lives in piling wood!

But the pagoda is abundantly full of interest. It stands on the hill, the only rising ground for miles. You ascend by a broad covered staircase. At the foot of this, built of brick and covered by stucco, are the figures of mighty and terrible dragons. All the way up, on either side of the stairs and the broad landings, are shops, in which are sold candles, rosaries, charms, emblems, gongs, prayer-flags, toys for children in memory of their visit; and these shops are, for the most part, tended by business-like and pleasing Burmese women. For in this country and a very happy, independent, capable, and pushing set they are. They always appear well satisfied and contented, intent on their business, and quite satisfied for their lazy husbands to smoke and loll about, if only they will allow them to carry out their business plans on behalf of themselves and their families.

At the summit of the long stairway you come out on a broad square platform, about the size of Trafalgar Square in London. In the centre, right before you, is the main shrine, behind which the pagoda rises 400ft high in the air. Imagine a temple, the roof of which is supported by two rows of four columns each, painted amber to one-third their height, the rest gold. One image of Buddha sits at the end of the building in a kind of inner shrine, and to this the worship is paid; but there are thirty-six colossal images of him beside, close packed, all round the temple walls, the eyes half-closed, a smile of beatific repose mantling the features, to denote his ecstatic entrance into nirvana, i.e., his absorption into nothingness. Some of these images are covered with gold-leaf or adorned with exquisite dresses; all are shaded by umbrellas; and in very hot weather they are fanned by punkahs.

Before the central shrine hundreds of guttering candles burn, some in iron hoops, like those in use in Roman Catholic churches, some standing on their ends on the stone steps. There is a brazier on which incense is sprinkled, receptacles in which offerings of flowers are deposited, whilst scores of prayer-flags, each of which is covered with petitions, WAVE IN MUTE APPEAL.

There is no lack of worshippers. A constant stream is always pouring up the steps, and in this and the other shrines numberless figures are bowed low in prayer, or raised with every expression of devotion and earnestness stamped on the face, while the lips mutter the name of Buddha and one or two almost meaningless words. Oh, when shall the vast stream, which for centuries has passed into these old walls, be diverted, and the name of Jesus be universally substituted for that of Buddha on the lips of the Burmese!

There is no doubt, however, that the worship of Buddha is not nearly so debasing as that of the Hindoo deities. There are no obscene emblems here, no worship of monkeys or cows, no dancing girls, no wily Brahmins, their lives defiled with sensual excess. Priests abound in saffron-coloured robes, but they are credited with living pure and virtuous lives; and these fanes are not polluted with vicious orgies like those which corrupt the morals of India.

Around this temple is a broad walk or promenade, on either side of which are shrines, and temples, and miniature pagodas crowded with enormous figures of Buddha. Certainly there cannot be less than 300 shrines on the plateau, and three additional ones are being built by wealthy Buddhists with lavish magnificence.

WHAT SIGHTS ARE HERE!

An old man calculating horoscopes for a group of women. Pilgrims passing from shrine to shrine. Women praying for boy children to be granted them. Vendors of small wares and refreshments. Groups sitting under the shadow of the trees listening to native music and enjoying family picnics. Everywhere the figure of Buddha, generally sitting upright, the legs crossed; but in some cases reclining, the head on one hand. Plenty of fine carving in wood or ivory, grotesque and fanciful. Rude paintings of scenes in Buddha's life. Rich jewels set in statues. Splendid cloth of gold and brocade. And always the motley, passing, laughing, careless tide of humanity, silent for a moment before the shrine, then resuming its glad, careless, sparkling career.

* * * * *

How different is all this from the truly splendid work which is being accomplished here by the American Baptist Missionary Union! It surely must stand in the front rank with the most successful and important of foreign missions. In Calcutta I saw the baptistry in which Dr. Carey baptized Dr. Judson. There a corn of wheat fell into the ground to die. By that act Judson cut himself off from those who had sent him forth from the United States—a circumstance which led to the inauguration of distinctively missionary work on the part of the Baptist churches there, and here is one sheaf of the resulting harvest, with its 164 supported workers and 40,000 baptized members, to say nothing of the thousands of young people of both sexes under instruction.

Dr. Judson landed here in 1813; and I grasp hands with him through those of a venerable saint of ninety, one of his colleagues who still survives, hale and hearty, full of memories of the past, lifting his voice in prayer more than once in the course of the mission.

The principal work of the A.B.M.U. is in connection with the Mission Press, which supplies missionary literature for all the races of Burmah, and the Baptist College with 476 students of all races. I addressed a mighty gathering of these, which filled to overflowing the spacious chapel and adjacent corridors. Two schools of Karen and Burmese girls were included. How they sang! And to be told that the vast proportion was Christian gave me a larger perception of the possibilities of the educational system, when in the hands of godly and earnest tutors, than I had ever received.

They told me that large numbers of these youths, after graduating, enter religious work, content to receive about one-fifth of what they might earn in the service of the Government. Some become properly ordained pastors; twenty of them passed out of the theological seminary for that purpose on the day fixed for our arrival in Rangoon. I can only rejoice with Dr. Cushing and his colleagues, who so kindly welcomed me, in all they are permitted to effect. Work like this must

REVOLUTIONISE BURMAH!

Large numbers of missionaries came in to the meetings from other towns and districts. To travel 300 miles did not seem too great an expenditure. And what stories they had to tell, specially of work among the Karens! There had been a tradition rife among these, handed down from far-away generations, that one day white people would come, bringing a book which would teach them the true religion. Whenever, therefore, white missionaries visit the villages of these hardy mountaineers, they are surrounded by eager and sympathetic crowds, who hail their advent as the fulfilment of the long-cherished prediction. There is no difficulty in securing an audience; the only difficulty is to supply teachers fast enough for their proper instruction and training, it being the rule of the Society not to administer baptism, or receive into church fellowship, apart from unmistakable evidence of conversion.

It is impossible to enumerate all the good work which is being prosecuted in Rangoon: that for instance among the Telugus and Tamils by my friend, Rev. W. F. Armstrong, or that among the women by a perfect army of noble ladies. And now Mr. McCowan is beginning to work for the young men, who sorely need some help against the awful tide of impurity, drink, and fast living, which pours through European society here. Here too are the Methodists, the English Baptists, and others. God bless them all!

Our brother, Rev. F. B. Meyer, has closed his series of meetings in Rangoon. They lasted through two days and the early morning of a third. All that was done in these two days and a quarter, eternity alone can tell; enough is manifest to call for volumes of praise to God. Four meetings were held the first day, five the next, keeping Mr. Meyer at it almost constantly from 7.30 in the morning till past 10 at night, and one meeting on the third day at 7.15 in the morning, which closed just in time to enable him to catch the mail boat for Madras at 9 o'clock. Large audiences greeted our brother at all the services, composed mostly of Christian workers in different spheres and of different races. Many missionaries were in attendance, coming for the purpose from all parts of Burma, one coming from near the border of China, a journey of 800 miles.

One of the meetings was for ministers (brethren) and one for ministering sisters. One address was translated into Burmese for the benefit of the more than 500 Karen and Burman students gathered in the Baptist College. Another was translated into Tamil for an audience understanding that language which filled the large Baptist church. The other meetings were for the general English-speaking community, who gathered in large numbers in the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches. A mighty impulse has been given to Christian life in Burma, which we believe will produce an eternity of praise to God.

Letters from America.

THE VOYAGE.—THE WEATHER.—NEW YORK.—NIAGARA.

MORE than three weeks have elapsed since we started on our trip to America. We have since been passing through various kinds of climatic phenomena.

Our first experience was the fiercest storm on the Atlantic through which the Lucania had ever passed. Our considerate captain, not wishing to increase the discomfort of the passengers, let the ship drift southward for more than twelve hours. The American liner St. Louis drove through the hurricane, and arrived twenty-four hours ahead of us—unfortunately with loss of two boats and injury to more than one of her passengers. The action of the two commanders—on the one hand caution, on the other "go-ahead"—was characteristic of the nations they represented. You know already that ours was for the greatest length of time, the fiercest storm, and the smallest day's run in the experience of the fleetest of the ocean greyhounds.

On the arrival of the telegraphic news at home, "tears, idle tears" were shed in sympathy with our supposed sufferings; but we suffered very little, and having taken inside berths, we escaped the influx of water which incommoded some of our outside neighbours.

On landing, we heard that the passengers of the St. Louis had been subjected to by the Customs officers, in obedience to a regulation which had lately been passed by the Legislature. The morning papers were full of the grievances and complaints of the home arrivals, and we got the benefit of their protests, and passed easily.

We called one morning at the offices of the City Mission. Dr. Schauffler was giving a lecture to young missionaries and missionary candidates. We could not wait to see him that day, but listened for a few minutes, and this was what we heard: "When preparing an address of which the subject is a narrative or a parable, ask five questions,

"WHERE? WHEN? WHO? WHAT? WHAT THEN?

This will enable you to form a mental picture and to describe the scene.

"Where? The answer will present to your mind's eye the country and its climate, the people and their history.

"When? In the time of Abraham, or Moses, or Christ, or the Apostles? Now you have depicted the locality and the period, and your picture is half complete.

"Who are the actors in the scene? and

"What does their action consist of?

"Now your picture is complete, and the culminating question is,

"What then? What is the meaning of the picture and what its application to present time and people? For man is the same in all periods, and what men did in other ages they will do again under the same circumstances."

I cannot do better than pass this useful method on to others.

We had occasion to call at "Wanamaker's," late A. T. Stewart. This great store occupies an entire block, and represents almost every conceivable business. We were delighted to find that the young people here, as well as at the same proprietor's store in Philadelphia, are provided with seats which they occupy when not engaged in serving customers. The elevators are continually running, and employés, as well as customers, are constantly using them. Even from the point of view of the employer's own interest, how wise is this arrangement! An assistant kept standing all day, and having laboriously to climb stairs, as in our General Post Office, cannot be so efficient and capable as those who are saved this unnecessary work and weariness.

We also observed that ready-made garments and costumes were much better finished than in some establishments of a similar kind. These have sometimes indicated underpaid women's labour, while here ready-made clothing was equal in style and finish to the best work made to measure.

The four days we spent at New York were cold and windy; but there was more to follow. We left on Friday for Canada, just in time to escape that has swept the east coast of the States for years. The railroads were blocked, trains snowed up, traffic and business paralysed, mail service crippled, and great suffering brought upon the poor. Governor Roosevelt opened the armouries of New York to afford shelter, and also supplied food to the homeless; and the charitable and Christian agencies joined heartily in this good work. Even Tammany Hall contributed 50,000 dols.

Had we not left when we did, we should have been weather-bound in New York for several days. In this and other circumstances we have proved the truth of the exceeding great and precious promise, "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

A CHRISTIAN GUIDE.

At Niagara we were shown the rapids where Capt. Webb lost his life. Our guide was a wholesome, honest-faced old man who quite won our sympathy. As we came away I asked, "Are you the father of the young lady in the store?" "No," he replied, "I am only a guide." "Are you an American, or a Canadian?" "No," he said, "I am an Englishman born in good old London, and married my wife in Marylebone Church."

"Is your wife alive?" "Yes; she's seventy-six!" "Are you going to the better country?" I asked, to which he enthusiastically replied, "Yes, bless the Lord; and I know it!" By this time we were in the carriage, I held out my hand, and he ran after us and gave me a hearty grip which I shall remember until I shake hands with him again in the Better Land.

When we dismissed the carriage, a word about that Land to the driver brought out the remark: "If any one gets there that old guide will, for he is a real good Christian man." Truly "a good name is better than precious ointment," and "having a good report of them that are without" is no mean qualification.

Bible Work in South America.

CHILI is a long strip of country on the Pacific coast with a seaboard of about 3,000 miles and an average width of 100, and is the only country of South America that at all vies with Argentina in point of material progress. The chain of the Cordilleras runs through its entire length, leaving it very little arable land; and the rainless district, extending over a thousand miles of its northern seaboard, presents nothing to the eye but bare brown hills, without a sign of vegetation, except where an occasional mountain stream flows down to the sea. These are always taken advantage of for irrigation.

It is, however, very rich in minerals, and the greatest wealth of the country is derived from its very extensive nitrate fields. The mining and nitrate industries have created most of the seaport towns north of Valparaiso; all the latter taken from Bolivia and Peru some twenty years ago.

As stated in a former communication, soon after its organisation in 1816 the American Bible Society had sent consignments of books to all the chief seaports of South America. In 1823 Dr. Brigham visited Buenos Aires as agent, and carried his agency to Chili and Peru. In 1843 another agent came to Chili, followed by Dr. Trumbull, the first American missionary on the Pacific Coast, in 1845. In an historical review of early Bible work by this society, Dr. Trumbull, speaking of this agent, says "he did so much as to elicit a document from the archbishop against the publication." Of his own early work, Dr. Trumbull says: "From the first I have circulated the Scriptures and other books religious in their nature. The stream of outflow has been constant although small, on an average five cases of books per year. Scriptures in various languages have been put into circulation, say 300 copies per annum in sixteen years, which give 4,800 vols." Under his direction the Valparaiso Bible Society was organised in 1861, by its constitution affiliated with both the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society. For over forty years the late Dr. Trumbull was the soul of nearly every evangelistic effort in Chili, and in all the chief centres of work his name is loved and revered.

For several years we have had depositories of Bibles in the four chief cities of Chili. In Valparaiso the work has chiefly been done through the local society. In the capital, Santiago, in Concepcion in the south, and Iquique in the north, resident missionaries have rendered valuable help in taking the oversight and directing the distribution. From Concepcion, the centre of an important agricultural and mining district, the books have gone out in all directions. Mr. Arms, the resident missionary, says the books last sent have gone into quite new regions of country, and the man who sold them is now trying to open up mission work in the most distant provinces that he visited.

Iquique, the largest of the nitrate ports, a city of about 40,000 inhabitants, is a thriving centre of Bible and other evangelistic work; the former and much of the latter are under the immediate care of Dr. Hoover. A letter, recently received from a resident missionary in Oruro, Bolivia, mentions a Christian lawyer there who had been converted through Dr. Hoover's instrumentality, and within a few days letters were received by us from a colporteur at work at Punta Arenas in the Magellan Straits, who is also one of Dr. Hoover's converts. From these four principal centres there have gone out during the past year over 5,000 copies of the Scriptures.

Work in Spain.

AN agent of the Spanish Evangelisation Society, writes:—"One of the colporteurs of Cordoba province was going from house to house in the town of Nueva Carteya, when he heard himself called by the inhabitants of a house which appeared to be superior to the rest. They asked him what he was selling, and he gave a courteous reply. Enchanted with what the colporteur told them, and with what they afterwards read from the Bible and booklets, they sent a letter begging me to come and explain to them our Protestant belief, and telling me that many others in the town desired an explanation likewise. That night, after due notice given to the authorities, I held a meeting, which was packed with more than 300 persons. For the first time in their lives they heard the good news, and that with strained attention.

"We agreed to meet again next evening. All next day people were visiting me, anxious to hear the Gospel. The time of evening meeting drew near, when there came a policeman from the Alcalde forbidding the meeting. We had to give up the public meeting, but we held one in a private house. Next morning many came to me asking for leaflets, and expressing a desire to hear more of the Gospel."

The Spanish Evangelisation Society is in great need of funds to enable it to carry on the good work. The Secretary is Miss Rosalba G. Peddie, 44, Viewforth Terrace, Edinburgh.

Paris.—Miss De Broen writes from 3, Rue Clavel, Belleville, Paris:—"In spite of the intrigues for a coup d'état, we gave away nearly 25,000 souvenirs, setting forth the Gospel, on the occasion of President Faure's funeral, without being stopped by the police. They were readily received, even the soldiers stretching out their hands for them as we went through the lines where the procession was expected to pass. May God greatly bless the sending forth of his Word. In the midst of all the political excitement, we have been able to continue our meetings in the mission hall unmolested."

Things Chinese.

By Rev. GEO. C. NEEDHAM.

OUTSIDE the North gate of old Shanghai, lying on the filthy bridge spanning the dirty lazy stream, green with weeds, lay a young man in the unconscious moments of approaching death. The upper part of his body was covered with a jacket, while partly shrouding his limbs was a piece of tattered matting. His eyes were closed; his face, youthful, refined, intelligent, was drawn and pinched, suffering and starvation left their chiselled lines. The body, seen through gaping rents of matting, was a mass of scrofulous, raw flesh, where swarming flies had access. Evidently, the youth was friendless. The busy passing crowds did not even cast on him a look of pity.

And we were helpless. Our language was unintelligible. We could get no information which would enable us to serve a fellow-being in the dying hour. We could only look on in dumb sympathy. Our report soon after to a group of devoted lady missionaries called out the testimony, "These are common sights all over China. They haunt us, for only in rare instances can we give relief. The Chinese are indifferent. They would not stoop to save a drowning child. Our work of rescue, of teaching, of evangelising exhausts us, while the death-rate increases alarmingly."

To see a neglected pagan die, as animals die, is an object-lesson not easily forgotten. And to know that one thousand an hour, one million a month, in China, are dying without the knowledge of God as a loving Father

MAKES THE HEART SICKEN.

The vastness of population is the one overwhelming fact of a Chinese city. Other features fade from the memory; this oppressive reality is a perpetual nightmare. The pathetic fact is the heroic missionary, in the midst of these mighty oceans of human life, bravely facing every form of danger and of death to rescue the perishing.

What a contrast from the narrow, dirty streets and polluted atmosphere of old Shanghai, within its dismal crumbling walls, to the pure and peaceful compound of the China Inland Mission! The one an earthly inferno; the other a temporary paradise. One showing the degradation and stolidity of heathenism; the other the refinement and unselfishness of Christianity. Within the gates of the latter we breathe the air of heaven. Its outward aspect of comfort, convenience, and refined taste is very gratifying. The buildings, which occupy three sides of the square, are solid and imposing. The fresh, grassy lawn, the summer-house and flower-beds, arrest the eye and rest the nerves.

In those buildings are rooms for fifty transients, exclusive of the home staff, a hospital, general store for supplying outlying stations, a post-office, a go-down or luggage department, spacious offices, and a Gospel-hall. Everything within and without is executed with business system. The friction of machinery is overcome through the lubrication of a loving spirit, which percolates into every department.

When one hears at a distance of the aggressiveness of this great mission, and of the increasing enrolment of new missionaries, the emotion of surprise is paramount. But our fortnight of membership in the family furnishes proof sufficient that were it otherwise there would indeed be occasion for wonder. For in addition to unceasing prayer by individual intercederes, the thrice daily united prayer of more than two score believers, missionaries, and helpers, in that large dining-room, is explanation of itself. These men and women know the power of prayer; to them it is real; the promises are real; God is very real, and very near. Add to this, the weekly united prayer of sympathisers in London, in Toronto, in Melbourne, in many parts of China, and other portions of the globe, and the last day of each year observed at all the centres for over thirty years as a time for fastings and supplications, and no one need be incredulous that supernatural signs follow.

IMBUED WITH THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT,

There are other agencies at work in China with bands of heroic missionaries of whom the world is not worthy. They stand in need of instant prayer. The evangelistic work carried on, and the medical work established, in addition to other departments of missionary labour, all demand generous support. Certainly the hospital department is invaluable. Thither flock "the poor, the maimed, the halt, the blind," and loving ministry is given unstintedly to soul and body. As we stooped over a patient, and saw the affectionate tenderness of the lady physician in dressing the mortifying foot of a poor girl, we thanked God for such a ministry. And what a foot! Oh, sad, sad, sight! A foot with its crushed instep, toes doubled beneath, compressed into a shapeless thing three inches long. Think of millions of women hobbling on such limbs as these.

Some educated Chinese have already awakened to a sense of this barbarous, needless cruelty, and 7,000 names are already enrolled members of the Anti-foot-binding Society—another practical proof of the sympathetic power of the Gospel. Its representatives were the first to expose and declaim against the diabolical practice.

Conference at Dusseldorf.

THE Evangelical Alliance meetings, which recently took place at Düsseldorf, were held at the halls of three different denominations. The principal speakers were Lieut.-Colonel von Knobelsdorff, Pastor O. Stockmayer, Pastor Jellinghaus, Professor Stroeter, Director Millard, Inspector Mandel, Inspector Schewe, Mr. Herbert R. Francis, and Rev. Albert Swift.

The friends who had arranged the meetings are full of praise to God, who has answered our prayers and blessed us as never before. Many who had attended previous conferences testified that they had never experienced a unity of spirit such as was enjoyed at Düsseldorf. The work of the Holy Spirit was visible among us, breaking the self-life of many Christians, and impelling them to live for God only. Mr. Francis stayed a few days longer, and gave us three lectures on the Tabernacle, with the help of his well-known model.

Obituary.

DR. A. K. H. BOYD.

This well-known St. Andrew's cleric and litterateur recently went to Bournemouth to recruit after an attack of illness. He was already receiving benefit from the change, when by an unhappy mistake he swallowed some carbolic acid lotion instead of a sleeping draught. The result was fatal, as he succumbed to the poison after a brief period of physical agony. For a long period Dr. Boyd had been a conspicuous figure in the Scottish ecclesiastical world, and made a considerable reputation by his chatty volumes of reminscences respecting people he had met. Not many months ago he made his last appearance on a London platform, when he spoke at the Mansion House, in a meeting in connection with the R.T.S. centenary celebration.

MR. C. B. GLENESK.

The death has lately occurred, at his residence in Scotland, of Mr. Charles Black Glenesk, for nearly fifteen years a missionary on the Congo. Mr. Glenesk, who is a native of Aberdeen, was home on furlough for the benefit of his health. He was about to return to his work on the Congo when he caught a chill, which developed into pneumonia, to which he succumbed. He was born in 1861, and served his apprenticeship as an engineer with Mr. J. M. Henderson, Aberdeen. Subsequently he studied at the Harley House Missionary College, and was one of a band of volunteers who went out to Africa to form the Livingstone Mission on the Congo, which was afterwards taken over by the American Baptist Missionary Union. On the first occasion when he was home on furlough he was married, and soon returned to Africa with his wife. He is survived by his widow and a family of four.

REV. ALEXANDER ISRAEL MCCAUL.

Past and present theological students of King's College, London, will sincerely lament the unexpected death of their beloved tutor and friend, Rev. Alexander Israel McCaul, M.A. His lectures and instruction were always given in such an interesting and kind manner that he won the affection of those whom it was his office to teach. He was "given to hospitality," and students were continually made welcome at the rectory of St. Magnus, which witnessed much pleasant social intercourse, enlivened by music, to which he himself gleefully contributed. The late Rector of St. Magnus will be greatly missed at the beautiful church at London Bridge, where he steadfastly maintained a Puritan simplicity of worship, and faithfully preached the Gospel with marvellous clearness. He will be most sorely missed by missions to the Jews, with which he was intimately associated, both by inheritance and choice; and at home and abroad, and probably in every diocese of the Church of England, there are clergymen who will sorrowfully learn that King's College, London, will know no more their trusty friend who helped them so effectually in the study of the Old and New Testaments, and Latin, and Greek, and Hebrew.—The Record.

The Aldersgate Mid-day.

ON Monday last Mr. Charles Cook, in the course of a helpful address on the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," alluded to the pitiful condition of the prisoners detained in European and African gaols, and gave some interesting reminiscences of his occasional labours among them. In Moscow forty-thousand prisoners pass annually through one gaol, and Mr. Cook urged the need of giving them spiritual teaching and supplying them with Scriptures. He had been able to distribute Bibles in Italian prisons, the books being placed in the official library catalogues, so that any prisoner could call for a copy. In one instance, a member of the Senate, imprisoned for a political offence, was point blank denied the use of the book, by a priest-librarian. He subsequently brought the matter before the notice of the Senate, and the result was the passing of a law to the effect that the prisoners should be supplied with the book they desired, and that in the event of delay the librarian's salary should be stopped.

In Sweden an especially dreadful interest attached to the female prisons on account of the large proportion of young persons under sentence for infanticide. The condition of French and Spanish prisoners was one of great darkness. As to the North African gaols, those of Morocco were most revolting, since prisoners were simply abandoned to starvation, the Sultan having declared in explicit terms that he found that to be the cheapest method of getting rid of the criminal population. Mr. Cook concluded with a reference to the "leasing-out" system in vogue in Southern Georgia and other of the States, by which women especially were subject to unspeakable indignities.

Cheering news of successful Gospel effort was given by various speakers. Mr. J. T. Isaac referred to the probable establishment of a medical mission at Zanzibar, and Mr. Baker, the Philadelphian blind singer, brought good news of Mr. Leonard Weaver's mission at Earlham Hall, Dalston.

Soldiers' Homes, Bangalore. — Miss A. Nangle has issued in pamphlet form her paper on the Soldiers' Homes, read at the Bangalore mission Conference. She gives graphic accounts of the work which is conducted on aggressive Gospel lines, and states her need of good books for the library and suitable literature for distribution in hospital and barracks. Address at the Homes, Bangalore, India.

Houses.

The Weigh House.—In all towns there are public weighing-houses, where carts of coal or brick can be weighed. A strange custom is still observed in Travancore. The Maharajah seats himself in one huge scale and the other is heaped with gold, which is added to, while the priests chant their Vedic hymns, until the Maharajah rises high in the air. He is then adored and the gold is distributed among some fifteen thousand Brahmins. We, too, must sit in the scales and have our actions weighed one day. God will try our life and we shall be found wanting, but our trust is not in our poor selves, but in Him, who is our substitute, and who is worthy (compare Dan. v. 27, with Rev. v. 9). Even the greatest men on earth, however admired and adored, will be found wanting when weighed against the pure gold of God's law (please carefully read Psalms cxix. 127, and Proverbs viii. 19, where "fruit" means "the Word of God," "the law of God"). Gold must be weighed against gold (read Song of Solomon v. 11 and 15, where our Lord Jesus Christ is described as gold). In Psalm xlv. 13 the believer is described as robed in a golden garment, because, wrapped in the righteousness of Christ, clothed in that precious robe, we need not fear the scales of Judgment.

The Storehouse.—Recently I inspected an immense warehouse, and I wondered whether some of the goods at the back would ever again see the light of day. But I was told that though they were hidden for a time, they would all be brought out one day. We think that our sins will be forgotten, and that they will lie hid and never rise to reprove us. But they are only at the back of the storehouse of memory. They will reappear; the only safe way is to confess them to Jesus, and He will take the burden right away. Then they will disappear.

The Engine House.—In all the great mills there is a building where night and day the fire burns and the great arms of the engine shake the walls. This is the power which drives the machinery. If this be out of order the looms stand idle, the hands are out of work, and the masters gain no profit.

So with our hearts. It is the engine of our bodies. If it is healthy we shall be healthy, too; and if it is sick, we shall suffer. Much more if our souls are sick does everything go wrong. When a child's heart is not beating for Jesus, his thoughts are not right, his temper and actions go wrong, his tongue shows the state of his heart, and Jesus is not being honoured, and the cause of Christ suffers. Remember the seat of the mischief is the Engine-House (St. Matt. xv. 18, 19), and you should speak to some one who understands about these things and who loves Jesus, and tell them your trouble. Above all, pray to your Saviour, and He will show you his will about you.

The Customs House.—In Liverpool, where a very large number of ships from all the countries of the world, from China and Peru, from Lagos and Ceylon, come every day, we have a big Custom House. Each ship which comes in has to pay so much money on the tea, coffee, and some other things they carry. This money is spent by the Government on the country and on us.

Now, in the same way, we should pay duty. God sends us ships. We have many things given to us. You have toys and money and books. Begin a Customs House, and take some of them, and give them to Jesus. If you give a part of your money to the missionary societies you are giving it to Jesus, and, if you give some of your books and toys to poorer neighbours and sick little friends, you are also giving them to Jesus.

The Gate House.—There are five gates to your heart and conscience—eye gate, ear gate, mouth gate, touch gate, and taste gate. Ask Jesus not only to keep the citadel, your heart, but also to set a watch at the five gates, that the enemy may not come in by them.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 166).

Find the following texts, giving chapter and verse, and where possible say by whom and to whom they were spoken:—

1. To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.
2. A light to lighten the Gentiles.
3. We would see Jesus.
4. My sheep hear My voice, and I know them and they follow Me.
5. Enter ye in at the straight gate.
6. Ye are the light of the world.
7. He that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.
8. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.
9. Abide with us.

When you have found the above texts, take the first letter of the first word in each text and arrange these letters in such a way as to form another complete text in themselves, and say where this is to be found.

(Children under ten do any four questions, between ten and thirteen any seven.)

Personal.

Gladys Hussey.—Many happy returns of your birthday. If you turn to the "Young People's Page" of The Christian for January 5, you will find your question answered.

Olive and Sidney Robertson.—School lessons must not be neglected, but try and do your "Searcher" as often as you can, as you will find it very useful when you are older.

Eva Young.—The clocks were counted correct when complete texts or complete parts of texts were found for the hours. The texts were not, of course, all identical with those given in the "answer" clock.

Edith Badham.—Your answers to the hidden texts were correct. No marks or prizes were given for them.

Rose Butler.—The "star" is only given for a tidy or careful paper, and is not awarded. Thank you for your interesting letter.

Mary Glass.—I think "Mary Glace" must have been a misprint.

Katie Brown.—It is always a pleasure to welcome new "Searchers." I hope you will be a diligent little "niece."

Margaret Macphee.—I am glad to know that you are liking your new school, and can find time to do the "Searcher" again.

M. Clay, Ethel Davidson, Ethel Morgan and Leonard Ewin.—I am sorry you have been ill, and hope you will soon be quite well.

Edith Wilkins.—We have so much to get into the page week by week that although I should like to grant your request I find it impossible to do so.

Dorothy Rashley.—Many happy returns of your birthday. You enjoy quite a distinction in being born on the 29th of February; you have fewer birthdays than years.

☞ "Nieces and nephews" who do not find their names in the weekly lists are either incorrect or have broken some rule, such as omitting their name, age, etc. Douglas Shepherd, Ronald Studd and Gladys Bates, please take note.

Miss Sharman's Homes.—A correspondent sends to us the following unwelcome news:—"Your many readers who take an interest in Miss Sharman's work among orphans will be sorry to hear that there is an outbreak of whooping-cough in the London home, and that 100 of the children are in bed with this distressing complaint. Miss Sharman has herself been laid aside the past fortnight with a severe attack of influenza and bronchitis."

Evangelistic.

Gipsy Smith in Cardiff.

THIS well-known evangelist has concluded a ten days' mission in Cardiff, under the auspices of the local Free Church Council. It is with hearts full of grateful praise that we place on record the great blessing which our God has graciously poured out upon this town.

Over 600 persons have publicly testified to their decision for Christ.

The council secured the use of the Poole Hall, the largest in the town, and at the first meeting the building was not only crowded long before the commencement of the service, but many hundreds were unable to gain admission. This has been the case every night through the mission. The Spirit of God sent home the preacher's messages, and hundreds flocked into the inquiry room asking, "What must we do to be saved?"

One day Mr. Smith spoke specially to Christians, taking as his topic the words, "Slay utterly." None of those present can ever forget that address. To use the words of a brother minister, "It was terrific." Consciences were aroused, hearts were searched, shame was awakened, and with hot tears of sorrow many members of churches confessed they were not right with God.

The afternoon meetings were times of great blessing. From a congregation of a thousand at the first meeting the numbers increased, until on the last day the huge building was crowded to excess. Day by day the message of life was spoken and sung by Mr. and Mrs. Evans, of Liverpool (Mrs. Evans being Gipsy Smith's sister). May God continue to use and bless these friends, and whether they give their testimony by speech or song, may the richest blessing of God rest upon them!

DAVID SHEPHERD,
Secretary of the Free Churches Council.
PASTOR W. T. DEE,
Member of the Executive.

Mr. C. Inglis in Bristol.

THE mission conducted by Mr. Charles Inglis at Stokes Croft Chapel, Bristol, from February 12 to 23, will long be remembered as a wondrous time of refreshing from the Lord. For some weeks previous there had been much prayer for blessing. The spirit of self-forgetfulness, of unity and love, which was manifested throughout the mission by the church members as they strove together for the furtherance of the Gospel, was a stimulating sight. The mission may be said to have actually commenced on Saturday, the 11th, when a large company of workers gathered to welcome Mr. Inglis and to give themselves to united prayer. The spirit of earnest expectant prayer which prevailed on that occasion was an indication of the copious showers of blessing presently to be vouchsafed. The gracious awakening of the unsaved commenced on Sunday afternoon, when Mr. Inglis addressed the women's meeting. Not a few came out on the Lord's side.

Each Sunday evening the chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity, the schoolroom being also crowded with the overflow, many even then being unable to gain admission. Mr. Inglis addressed both meetings. Some of the week evening meetings were likewise so crowded that a number of Christians vacated their seats to make room for the throng of strangers, and then retired to the classroom to plead with God to bless the word. The earnest appeals of the evangelist for immediate decision were heart-searching and irresistible. The enquiry-rooms were crowded each evening with persons of all ages between eight and seventy-five, some being completely broken down, anxiously enquiring, with tears, how they might escape from the wrath to come. Many backsliders, too, were restored. The Sunday school largely shared in the blessing.

The afternoon Bible readings were very largely attended, the body of the chapel being filled, and, during the second week, crowded. The opening up of the Scriptures proved most helpful to Christians.

A striking feature of the mission was the interest taken in it by Christians of all denominations — Churchmen, Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Exclusive Brethren, and city missionaries being in constant attendance, and readily acknowledging the blessing received. The good news spread into the country districts, bringing many from a distance; these, receiving blessing, went home to tell their friends the great things the Lord had done for them, and thus induced others to come. A. D.

Mr. HENRY VARLEY, after some weeks' work in New Orleans, is now preaching in Georgia.

Major COLE has been evangelising at Granville, Ohio, where his labours have been much crowned.

Mr. D. L. MOODY has recently been at work in Arizona and California. He is to preach at Yale University in the middle of April.

A very gracious movement has been going on for some time in connection with the work in the Christian Institute, Motherwell. During the past two months many have been awakened.

Mr. HARRISON has been preaching and Mrs. Harrison has been singing during the Sundays in February at the St. Giles' Christian Mission. The word was blessed to Christians, and some were led to Christ.

Mr. CANNING has been conducting a fortnight's mission at Grangemouth under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. There has been a good deal of interest. The Gospel has been faithfully preached, and from the beginning there have been tokens of definite blessing.

Mr. JAS. EYRES, of Liverpool, has conducted during the past month very successful Gospel services at Long Stratton and Hempnall. A number professed to decide for Jesus Christ. This effort was carried on by the Harleston and Long Stratton District Free Church Council.

Mr. ARTHUR KLEIN, who has recently conducted a mission in Newcastle, where the city was moved in a way that has not been seen for many years, has commenced a series of services in South Shields in the Theatre Royal. Immense crowds are being drawn by the Gospel message.

Special meetings for men have lately been held, in connection with the Oldham Y.M.C.A., by Mr. A. K. YAPP, travelling secretary for Lancashire. The attendance and interest increased as the mission proceeded, and much blessing was realised, An "Out-and-Out Conference" was held, which helped many to a closer walk with God.

At a special mission conducted at Haswell, co. Durham, by Mrs. THOMLINE, of Hawick, the village was greatly stirred. With deep religious fervour the people thronged in large numbers to hear the simple Gospel message. The meetings grew in interest and attendance, and some remarkable revival scenes were witnessed, many professing conversion under circumstances which caused wide spread interest and thanksgiving in the vicinity.

Mr. WILLIAM HILL, a Scotch evangelist who spent six years in the Lord's work in South Africa, lately held a ten days' mission in Cawnpore—and a blessed time it was. There were Bible readings each morning attended by Christians, and all were much helped. The Gospel meetings in the evenings were wonderful. The stolidly indifferent and the worldly were made to think. Amongst those who have professed conversion are one who was well nigh despaired of, a Roman Catholic couple and a score of high school girls, besides young men both from civil and military life.

J. T. ROBERTSON, Methodist E. Pastor,
M. E. Parsonage, Cawnpore, India.

Hampshire Village Mission.—The tenth annual report of this pronouncedly Protestant and evangelistic work tells of much good work in colportage by means of mission vans. The evangelists search out the most needy out-of-the-way villages and hamlets, visiting each house with Bibles and Christian books for sale, and distributing free Gospel books, and tracts, and personal conversation, and engaging in direct effort to win souls for Christ at fairs and markets. Blessing was manifested at the visit to Epsom during race week, both among the gipsies and the pleasure-seekers. Address Mr. John Charlton, Mission Depôt, Fareham, Hants.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

WE direct attention to the striking communication by the venerated Dr. Griffith John, of Hankow, which we print on a succeeding page. In a brief note to ourselves Dr. John says:—

I can only hope that some of your readers will catch the fire which is burning in my own soul, and which has driven me on to write the letter.

Which hope we most earnestly re-echo.

A correspondent writes:—

Will you call the attention of parents, and all who have the care of young people, to the books of preparation for the Holy Communion which are being given to confirmation candidates by many clergymen, who, judged by the Sunday services in their churches, would be considered "moderate" men? Parents who send their children to pronounced Ritualists for instruction of course know perfectly well what they will be taught; but those who allow them to attend classes in connection with "moderate" Churches may very probably get a surprise. Especially would I urge parents who have children away at school, and principals of boarding schools, to insist on knowing what is taught in the confirmation classes, and to examine the books given.

There is no more insidious means of instilling false doctrine than the use of books in this semi-authoritative manner. We hope parents will give good heed to our correspondent's warning.

The Church of England is making rapid strides in voluntaryism. Canon Burnside's statistical tables of the voluntary offerings for 1898 show that Anglicanism is well able to stand the test put upon all the Free Churches—of self-maintenance. More than half a million sterling was raised last year over and above the amount raised in 1897, the total amounting to £7,506,355. Church extension received £56,000 as its share; home mission societies, £30,000; foreign missions, £236,000; church building, £190,000. If the free-will offering system were properly developed, and Churchmen were trained in the grace of giving, the Church of England could listen complacently to the cry for Disestablishment. Thrown on her own resources, she would realise her true strength.

The illness of the Pope and his subsequent recovery have been made into occasions, both in the Anglican pulpit and in the secular press, for those panegyrics which have recently come with monotonous regularity whenever the slightest chance has presented itself. Canon Robinson, in his very first sermon in St. Margaret's, spoke of him as the greatest bishop in Christendom, whose jurisdiction over this realm we are sworn to renounce, but whose largeness of heart and longings after unity had won him respect from Englishmen which had been denied his predecessors for 300 years.

When we remember that the Pope's longings for unity have meant simple absorption into the Romish Church, we are constrained to ask whether each of his predecessors for the last 300 years has not been beset by the same longing? The present Pope is different simply in the conciliatory manner in which his longing is expressed. But there is no title to increased respect here on the part of Englishmen. This denial of all religious liberty is a title to a very different feeling.

The debate on primary education last week in the House of Commons re-emphasised a fact which is being forgotten in the Ritualistic dispute—that there are 8,000 parishes in this country where the only schools to which Nonconformist parents can send their children are managed by Church authorities, and in which Anglican, and, in many cases, Romanist, doctrines are taught. These schools are mainly financed by the State, and so belong to the nation. It is a crying injustice that they should be removed from public control, and be made use of to indoctrinate the rising generation of Englishmen and Welshmen with ideas against which the constitution of Church and State, and often the deepest convictions of the parents are a standing protest. Those who win over the children of to-day will have the men and women of to-morrow on their side.

The Council of the Evangelical Alliance has published an invitation to all its branches and members to join in prayer to God, on the first day of the approaching Peace Congress, that He would over-rule all its deliberations and decisions for his glory. We cordially agree with this appeal so far as it goes, and trust that the spirit of the invitation may extend to Christians throughout the world. Judging by Mr. Goschen's recent speech on the navy estimates, England would diminish her programme for naval extension if other great naval powers would consent to do the same. May not the Universal Church be urged to intercede before God now, that when the delegates come together in conference this same spirit may pervade them all? This would afford additional hope that some practical issue may result from the convention.

Mr. Gorst's charge against the agricultural labourers of England that they were "absolutely indifferent to what their children were taught, either in religious or secular subjects, and the majority of them went neither to Church nor to chapel," has been keenly resented and stoutly contested by those who are acquainted with the labouring classes of the country districts. Doubtless, it is true of certain neighbourhoods that there is much religious indifference among this particular kind of working-man; but to bring the accusation in so sweeping a manner against the whole class is to do them a crying injustice, and to discourage those who are working so hard amongst them. In the northern district, in many parts of the Midlands, and in Cornwall and Devon, there is a sturdy type of religion among this class; and in Wales the bulk of them are deeply religious. These are by no means indifferent to what their children are taught, either in secular or religious subjects.

The "Muscat incident" sounds another note of alarm as regards the perilous methods of modern diplomacy. The difference between the account of the incident given by the French Foreign Minister and Mr. Brodrick's in the House of Commons amounts in many points to a flat contradiction. The sentiments of both the French and the British nations are so explosive just now that it is most unfortunate that such differences of statement should be possible concerning the same transaction. It is clear that the rival ministers were anxious to make the affair seem a victory each for his own country. There is a grave danger in such methods of carrying on important and delicate negotiations. A plain unvarnished statement of facts should be possible on both sides. The interests of peace can never be served by attempts to score points over a friendly nation, especially as such attempts leave public opinion on either side of the Channel in a state of painful bewilderment.

A number of correspondents have written us in strongest protest against the action of the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph in starting a Sunday edition. It is a gratuitous departure for which no kind of necessity exists, and is sure to awaken indignation in the minds of a large section of the public. Some correspondents urge that Christian individuals and associations should cease to take in the daily edition. The innovation is but one more token of the God-dishonouring tendency to do away with the sanctity of the day of His appointing. The Sunday Daily Telegraph will specially deal with politics, literature, art, music, the drama, and sport . . . as well as careful description of the latest French and English novelties in dress, millinery, and the doings of society at home and abroad. Every Sunday an instalment of a new, powerful, and dramatic novel—a story of passion and pathos.

Full reports of racing, cricket, football, &c., &c.

Ample particulars of law and police cases and Stock Exchange transactions.

Then, to add insult to injury, so far as the Christian community is concerned, the proprietors announce further that

London churches and London chapels will find their place in the columns, to make the new issue essentially a journal for the home and family.

"Find their place" indeed! Surely it is time that Christian opinion should evince some practical expression against this degrading prostitution of public journalism. Let all readers of the Daily Telegraph who endorse our view write to the proprietors expressing their sorrow at this dragging of holy things into the dust. The people of this country rightly resisted the attempt to issue in London the New York Herald for seven days a week, and that venture did not succeed. We need to pray that this shameful attempt may likewise fail.

The start of the bicycling season should be taken as an opportunity for impressing upon all young people the claims of the Lord's Day for loyal observance. The arguments in favour of Sunday cycling—that it is healthful and invigorating, that it takes its votaries into elevating and beautiful surroundings, that it has no low associations—may be valid enough in their application to other days. But as regards the first day of the week they are fallacious, in so far as they ignore the claims of the soul for prior attention. The rush and distraction of modern life leave small opportunities during the week for the culture of the higher nature, and this makes a spiritual use of the Sunday more imperative than ever. The most healthful recreation becomes an instrument of evil and ruin when it is made a substitute for the exercises that educate the young in "godliness."

There are bright days occasionally granted to us at this season of the year, when Nature seems to yearn and strive towards her annual awakening. The trees are bare, the meadows sere and brown; but the birds feel the instinct of the spring-time, and sing prophetic songs of coming happiness and plenty. There is a spiritual mood in which the soul, pent in the dry and monotonous round of daily toil and care, is likewise quickened to expectancy of coming blessing. Bright thoughts of God's fulness and grace come unbidden, and the heart swells with the foretaste of renewed and deepened life. We should be on the watch for these promonitions of Divine blessing; we should cherish them by prayer and earnest waiting upon God. Then in his good time there will come seasons of "refreshing from the Lord."

There seem to be many indications that such a springtime of Divine favour and deepened spiritual life is about to descend upon the Churches of our land. The attendance all over the country at special missions is most encouraging. Large halls are crowded, and the Revival wave seems gradually but surely rising. One of the incidental but important results is the recovery of the Protestant sentiment on its proper basis of Evangelical faith. While the Romanist heresy is absorbing public attention, the forces that alone can effectually meet and overcome it are thus slowly but surely gathering strength and volume. Here is a call for prayer and for renewed confidence in the future of evangelical religion.

Another encouraging sign of the times is found in the extraordinary success of the Free Church Catechism, which has now run into a tenth edition, and entered far on its second 100,000 copies. The sale is constantly increasing, and it seems to be adopted in Nonconformist schools and colleges for examination and study purposes. In Canada and the United States it appears to be creating as great an interest as in this country. The Catechism, in spite of some imperfections, seems to be meeting a deeply-felt want for more definite lines of doctrinal education. The vagueness and unsatisfactoriness of recent religious teaching are very clearly shown in the extraordinary success attained by this simple summary of the Christian faith. Everywhere men are realising that religion is more than a sentiment, that it needs adequate form and careful expression in doctrinal propositions. The protest against creeds as such has thus died down of its own accord.

Students of missions will welcome the first two volumes of Mr. Eugene Stock's History of the Church Missionary Society: Its Environment, its Men, and its Work. (6s. per vol. net. C.M.S. House.) Those who come to the pages expecting great things will not be disappointed; for the history touches far wider interests than a simple account of the proceedings of the society would do. Another volume will bring the story down to date, and will include indices and other supplementary matter. The work deals with many important and otherwise unrecorded developments in Church and State within the period of the last hundred years. Pending a more detailed notice of this great undertaking, we have sincere pleasure in indicating it as an admirable narrative of noble endeavour in the name of Christ.

The question has been raised in the columns of The Christian Intelligencer (New York) whether the sense of sin is as great in the consciousness of men now as in other days. Till sin is a burden grievous to be borne, and the sense of it becomes acute, there can be no fleeing from the "wrath to come" to the infinite shelter of the Cross of the Divine Christ. In the preaching of to-day, however, we do not hear enough of the enormity of sin—its fearful separation from God and its final punishment. We are convinced a need exists of insisting upon this, so that men may see from what it is that Christ saves, and behold in its full glory the supreme love of Christ in giving Himself a ransom for the sins of the whole world.

Many definitions of sin have been given, but nothing simpler or more impressive can be found than that in Isaiah: "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." We sin when we go our own way. Sin is self-will; true religion is doing God's will. Self-will may be defiant, boastful, loud-tongued; or it may be quiet, subtle, deceitful. It may even assume the garb of devotedness to God's honour, as when Saul persecuted the Church, and thought he was doing God service. It did not occur to him to ask whether he was doing God's will, yet only by doing the will can we do the service. Doing a service is the way of pride and self-sufficiency; doing the will is the way of humility and self-surrender. Self-pleasing in religion, turning to our own way, is the very essence of sin: it is in the sight of God precisely the same as self-pleasing in any other thing: it is enthroning self, and ignoring God. Happy is the man who can say, "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies."

At the annual meeting of the London Wesleyan Mission, Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., called special attention to John Wesley as a social reformer, and urged upon Methodists the duty of educating their people to a "lofty ideal" in this respect. The stimulus and power for work amongst the poor are to be found in living fellowship with the present Christ. Those who have found the healing of the Cross for themselves, and have caught the spirit of the Saviour's life, "who went about doing good," will follow best in his steps. The danger is lest the social work should have precedence of the spiritual. The order should be "first, that which is spiritual." Our Lord Himself lived in unbroken fellowship with his Father; hence his manifold ministries.

In an article to Harper's Weekly, Mr. Arnold White draws a gruesome picture of the incidental effect of education in emphasising the sense of misery among the poor, and so in promoting discontent. In spite of good trade, imperial expansion, and many improved aspects of life, this feeling is growing.

> From the cheap lodging-houses, from the railway arches, from the over-crowded tenements, rises an ever-increasing volume of inarticulate and unquenchable revolt against the intolerable conditions of life.

The difficulty is to get reformers and churches to join in a common plan of betterment. Every great movement is hampered by a lack of co-operation among those who could help it on. While politicians and others are thus divided, it is the duty of all who love their fellowmen and believe in the Gospel of Jesus Christ to bring it to bear on the seething mass of tried and tempted life in our great cities, and to point the way whereby all may escape from the debasing effects of poverty and dismal surroundings.

A "bitter cry" is rising in America—not from the slums, but from the schoolrooms. Boston, according to the Ladies' Home Journal, has been shaken by a solemn protest from the city physician against the ruinous manner in which children are overworked. The cry is that an immense number of young girls are being driven into premature graves, while others are condemned through overstrain to an after life of weakness and uselessness. The teachers also find the pressure almost unbearable, and many are unable to go to church because they are too tired, or because their work must be completed on Sundays to be ready by the following day.

The vanity of parents in urging their children to overstudy for the sake of "diplomas" is also mentioned as largely responsible for the terrible state of affairs that exists. Academic distinctions and diplomas may be bought at a price too high, both to teachers and taught. Life is more than learning, as it is more than bread, and they who make undue haste to be learned may sin against their highest interests as truly as those who make haste to be rich.

To those who are interested in the sobriety of our soldiers and seamen, it is worth remembering that in the American navy the canteen is no longer allowed on board ship. Temperance advocates will welcome this decision with unqualified satisfaction. Secretary Long's instructions are expressed in these words:—

> "After mature deliberation, the Department has decided that it is for the best interest of the service that the sale or issue to enlisted men of malt or other alcoholic liquors on board ships of the navy, or within the limits of naval stations, be prohibited."

We can but pray that ere long the officers of the Admiralty will see their way to issue a similar prohibition for Her Majesty's Navy.

The Free Library movement of our own day is of inestimable value. In no fewer than six townships in Pennsylvania, where the employés of Mr. Andrew Carnegie live, he has founded institutes of this nature; while for others in America and some in Scotland a considerable sum has also been devoted, amounting in all to some eight million dollars. While we rejoice in these means of education brought within reach of the people, a peril has to be guarded against lest the Bible be superseded by the novel. For thrilling narrative, vivid biography, graphic history, inspiring poetry, there is no book in the world to compare with the Word of God. Other books, of course, have their right place and time; but as a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path, the Bible must be the first teacher of morals and religion and life for all time to come.

The cry is often raised that life is full of monotony, and that there is "no new thing under the sun." That there is such an element in human experience we may well be thankful. Were it not so we should be burnt up and exhausted by excitement. The routine duties of life, also, are the important duties; were it not for these the world would fall into utter disorder. The real trouble is not monotony of work, but monotony of feeling, and here we are largely our own masters. By looking at the ideal side of our daily duties, by a wise observation of the newness and freshness which is intermingled with the customary, and by cherishing a humble and grateful spirit, there are few lives so afflicted with sameness but that they will blossom into praise, as the spring flowers out of the greyness and monotony of winter.

Godless Civilisation.

By Rev. T. G. SELBY.*

LAMECH'S song of exultation (Gen. iv. 22, 23) over the new arts springing up within the families of which he was the patriarch breathes the spirit of contempt towards God, the Maker and Judge of men. . . . These brass and iron weapons will be effectual substitutes for God, and replace the unwelcome tokens of his guardianship!

Human nature is ever the same till God puts a new spirit into it, and Lamech's temptation is fatally common at the present time. We are in daily peril of making our civilisations a stop-gap for a God whom we do not greatly desire or love. We have many points of likeness to those early empire-founders who aimed at independence of the spiritual and the Divine. We are not so far away as we think from the archaic tower-builders who imagined they could make themselves judgment-proof. We turn weary, longing eyes to our arts and sciences, and expect at their hands blessings which should be sought on our knees from God alone.

Our rosiest hopes, our most intent anticipations set the face towards scientific discovery. The world will be transformed by a new illuminant, a cheap motor, a flying machine, a man with an original patent in statecraft. Not a few of our thinkers rank civilisation before Christianity, and esteem it to be more vital to the world's progress than the belief in God and in God's holy and loving Son. The golden age will come, millennial jubilations ring through the air, when the programme of annexation is complete, and the network of an ingenious civilisation covers the five continents of the globe. . . .

In this snatch of old world song we have an illustration of

MIGHT REJOICING AGAINST RIGHT.

The first Jingo music hall was the tent of an antediluvian patriarch, and Lamech is the prototype of the Chauvinists and fire-eating politicians of London, Washington, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. "If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold." The boast is echoed in a ditty hugely popular years ago . . . The pride of might against right still asserts itself through all the developments of modern life. The first uses to which men put the forces of a new civilisation are often selfish, brutal, unbrotherly. Skilled chemists and engineers are occupied with the problem of how to increase the power of one nation against another. The greatest railways now projected are strategic; new submarine cables are to provide alternate means of communication in case of war. Our diplomatists are always on the alert for fresh occasions of aggrandisement. Wherever we go, it is in the temper of Lamech, and we clear native tribe after tribe off the face of the earth.

And the domestic side of our civilisation is not all that could be wished. Whilst poverty and suffering are alleviated in some directions, they reappear like unlaid ghosts. A strike occurs, and the manufacturer threatens his hands with new machinery that will make their service unnecessary. One man is employed in the place of ten, and nine join the casuals at the dock-side, or pass into the workhouse. And labour uses the resources of civilisation to organise itself through half a continent, and the battle waged by the sons of toil does not want for zeal or rancour. It sometimes looks as though the watchword of our western civilisation were Lamech's vengeance of seventy times seven, rather than Christ's forgiveness of seventy times seven. . . .

It should never be forgotten that our civilisation is not worth giving to the nations of the world unless we can pervade and animate it by the Spirit of Jesus Christ. We can never expiate a moral injury inflicted on a race or a nation by the boons of a meretricious civilisation. It is a little thing to take clocks, musical boxes, and calico shirtings to a negro tribe if we decimate it with vitriol distilled in Holland or Great Britain, and carried under our flag. It is a little thing to give India railways, irrigation works, equal justice, relief in the dark days of famine, while our system of excise tends to spread intoxication among races that once were total abstainers. If the keeper of a dram-shop had allured your sons to debauchery, the madhouse, and the grave, you would not feel much gratitude to the brewer who owned the dram-shop even if he acted as arbitrator for you in a money dispute, opened a drinking fountain in your village, and started a 'bus service to the railway station.

Civilisation has still to be snatched out of the hands of the murdering progeny of Cain and put under the control of the children of the kingdom. It does not always make for purity, temperance, righteousness, and brotherhood; and the sense of power it breeds may tempt anyone of us to forget his responsibility to his neighbour and to God. . . .

BEWARE OF ALL ALTERNATIVES FOR GOD.

Neither through the wit of man nor in the hidden forces of nature can we find the benediction which his hands alone can bestow; least of all can we find it in Lamech-like tempers of retaliation. Live simply, peaceably, believingly, and never let the magicians of modern civilisation with their marvellous legerdemain, come between yourself and God. Dedicate to his service the new powers of an ever-enlarging knowledge. Take heed lest the sense of God become indurated or overlaid. The pride of brute science may be your ruin, as it was the ruin of the line of Cain and his boastful, aggressive descendant.

* From The Unheeding God. A vol. of discourses. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) In these sermons Mr. Selby shows all the characteristics of a true preacher—clear vision of the principles that ought to dominate personal and national life, and unswerving courage in applying these principles to the circumstances of his age. To the cultured style of the professor he adds the directness and warmth of the evangelist. To other preachers these pages will be found replete with helpful and practical suggestion.

On Bible-Marking.

APART from theory or system, the practice of Bible marking has grown rapidly during recent years. It is nothing exceptional to find the working Bible of an evangelist overrun with oblique and perpendicular lines, associating striking words or phrases; and having margins covered with references and points arranged ready to hand for the building up of addresses or discourses. We have seen Bibles that have been so burdened with notes as to hinder their ready use, and others in which the marking has been immature and injudicious. To bring a printed volume to this condition is a splendid exercise no doubt, but none the less does it frequently involve a measure of disappointment in the end.

Instruction of a systematic character will often save from such disappointment; and many Christian workers have testified to having followed with profit the suggestions given many years ago in a pamphlet on this subject by Mrs. Stephen Menzies. We welcome a re-issue of this work in substantial book form, with the title, How to Mark Your Bible. (Paper, 1s.; cloth, 2s. Partridge & Co.) From these pages the beginner in Bible marking may form an idea of what kind of marks are likely to prove of permanent value, and he is furnished with some useful hints and explanations.

By no means, however, is he left to apply the rules alone, for Mrs. Menzies gives a marvellously full series of marks for the entire Bible, in the form of "railway" connections, marginal references, and groups of jottings. Here is seed ready for the sower, ammunition for the Gospel conflict; the groupings are specially good, and will serve admirably as skeletons for Bible readings and evangelistic addresses. We trust many will secure this book; and not be satisfied with transferring it to the margins of their Bibles, but take its contents as typical of further results that may be secured in repayment of personal and independent study of God's Holy Word.

Thoughts for Parents.

FRIENDSHIP.

"Thine own friend and thy father's friend forsake not."—Prov. xxvii. 10.

SHOW your children that you are their best friend, as well as assert it. As your boys and girls grow up put off to some extent parental authority, and make them your confidants as to business, plans, &c.; let them feel you regard their co-operation and even advice as worth having.

Teach your children that friendship is one of God's most precious gifts, not to be lightly entered into. Encourage them to make friends, and give them opportunities of meeting. Watch carefully the companions they choose, and discourage fickleness; teach that "a man that hath friends must show himself friendly."

Friendship is more or less at the basis of every other relation in life. One of the best things that can be said about parents is that they are the friends of their children. Lay much stress on the friendship of Christ as a guard and guide for the young.

Frances S. Hallowes.

The Nature of Life.

THE largest meeting held this year by the Victoria Institute took place at its house, Adelphi Terrace, London, this month, to hear one of its new members, Professor Beale, F.R.S, the President of the Royal Microscopical Society, give an address descriptive of the results of forty years' work as a professor of physiology and of microscopical research in regard to matter. In doing so, he described how all organisms, including man himself, in the earliest stage of development, were represented by a very minute particle of living matter, from which numerous particles, also living, were derived; these proceeded to take up different positions, grow and form. All living forms were once living matter, or bioplasm, and owed their peculiar structure and properties to the vital power of living matter by which they were formed; and at all periods of life the senses—touch, taste, &c.—and all muscular and nerve action—secretions, &c.—depended on the vital power of bioplasm. During the living state, the matter of the living particle was altered according to a definite and pre-arranged plan and purpose.

He concluded as follows:—"Having long thought over the evidence I have been able to obtain as regards the nature of life during the past forty years—from the study of the actual living matter, the bioplasm, its characters, arrangement, and its relation to tissue as existing during its life, and shortly after death, in the case of organisms of very different orders, in various conditions of vital activity, in health and disease, with the aid of very high magnifying powers (up to 5,000 linear)—I now feel it a duty to publicly advocate the doctrine of the constant operation in all life, throughout the whole living world, of Vital Power—Power as distinct from all forces, potencies, and properties belonging to or derived from any kind, or resulting from any physical or chemical state, of cosmic matter.

"I have failed to discover any facts which would tend to cause a thoughtful student of Living Nature to hesitate as to the existence of Vitality, and so far I have been unable to discover or frame any hypothesis which could be advanced as a reasonable explanation of the facts of any kind of living matter without admitting the influence of Infinite Power, Prevision and Wisdom. All my efforts to obtain evidence which in reason could be regarded as adequate to account in some other way for the facts, have entirely failed.

"Looking from a purely scientific point of view only, it seems to me that the cause of all vital phenomena from the very beginning of life—in the present state of our knowledge can only be referred to the direct influence of an Almighty Power; and I feel confident that each succeeding advance in natural knowledge will be found to be, in the words of the Victoria Institute motto, 'Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam.'" An animated discussion followed, in which many took part.

Work among Soldiers.—In connection with the military barracks at Fulwood, Preston, Miss Margaret Kelly is undertaking to open a prayer-room and conduct much-needed aggressive religious work. Miss Kelly writes that there is an open door for visitation of sick soldiers. Much encouragement is afforded by a few worthy Christians among the men, and there is evidently an opportunity of accomplishing much good as soon as the work can be properly established. Address, Lancaster House, Fulwood, Preston.

III.—NEVER LONELY AGAIN.

TWO months passed. Every visit to the girl seemed much like the last, except that she saw sin ever to be more and more sinful, but could not see that cleansing could come in any way.

I was spending a day with a friend in the west end of the city, who had arranged to have a farewell party with some missionaries going abroad. I had been with this friend all day, and we were looking forward to the evening when the expected party would gather. About two hours before they were due to arrive I had a great longing in my heart to go and visit Nellie, as I had a strong feeling that if I went and had a talk with her, she might decide for Jesus. So I left my friend's house for awhile, and went along to Nellie's home.

It was in the winter-time, and when I opened the door, I found Nellie sitting beside the grate, which held only a few red cinders. She did not so much as turn round when I entered, and seemed utterly wretched. I went forward to her and put my arms round her neck and kissed her cheek. She turned round quickly, and said passionately:

"Dinna dae that! Oh, dinna dae that!"

When I asked her if she did not like anyone to kiss her, she said, "It's awfu' to hae a body care for ye just ainee in your life, and then never again."

She seemed too overcome for words, and had a proper cry, when her heart seemed as if it would burst.

After a little talk, in which I again tried to show her how much greater the Saviour's love was than any I could give her, she said:

"Weel, ye see, I ne'er did onything in my life in the way o' working, an' if I cam' to Christ an' was a Christian, there's naething I could dae to earn a leevin', for, ye see, I never WROUGHT FOR AN HONEST PENNY."

I had often thought of this difficulty, and, as I had had the assurance in my heart that Nellie would one day be brought to Christ, I had been talking it over with a lady, who had wanted to do something for me some time before. I had asked her if she would take Nellie into her home, and train her as a servant, if once she came to Christ. This had been promised me, and so I could tell Nellie this afternoon about the friend who would take her and train her, and perhaps keep her in her own home.

"Aweel," she replied, "that micht be; but what wad I dae aboot claes, for ye ken I've naethin' but rags?"

As this was my first experience of needing money which I did not possess myself, I thought for a few minutes before replying, and then I said, "Oh, Nellie, I am sure that, if God could show you that there was salvation for you in Christ, and if He could make you believe this, and accept his offered gift, He would be able to send us the money which would be needed for your clothes."

We then had a talk together as to the cost of the things that would be necessary, if Nellie ever got to this her first place. As she required a complete outfit, I decided that the cost would be five pounds at least, at which she smiled incredulously, and said, "That's just aboot as impossible as the ither thing; you couldna get the five pounds, nor yet could I be saved."

We talked on till my time was nearly up, when I said I would require to leave her. She became so miserable that I waited a little past my time. In prayer together we asked God to open her eyes that she might see there was a Saviour as able and willing to save her as she was desirous to be saved, and on rising from our knees I asked her to tell me what was her greatest difficulty in the way of coming to the Saviour. It was this, she said, that it would be "an awfu' thing to think o' her coming if Jesus wadnae be wanting her after a', and if she was coming when she wasna' wanted."

I tried to assure her that Jesus did want her and would make her welcome when she came: and amongst other things I quoted the text, so familiar to most of us that we can scarce realise how it would affect us on hearing it for the first time, especially if we were eager to be saved, "Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out." I repeated it slowly to her three times, watching her face the while, and I could easily see she was greatly impressed with the thought that such a verse as that should be in God's word. She asked me if "not being cast out" meant that we would be "ta'en in."

"Yes," I said, "that is just what it means—being taken into the fold of the Good Shepherd, which is the opposite of being cast out."

"Oh!" she exclaimed, eagerly, "are ye sure that's how the verse is written?"

I handed her over a Testament which I had been using, and pointed out the place. She slowly spelled out the verse word by word, as that was the only way she could read. As she finished it, and realised that it was written word for word as I had given it to her, she just said:

"It's gey kind o' Him sayin' that, and nae doot He'll be meanin' it when He says it, and I'll just come."

"Nellie," I said, do you mean that you come to Jesus just as you are, and that you take Him to be your Saviour?" She answered, "Yes!"

We knelt down in the little room, and Nellie prayed in words like these: "O God, I'm just a sinfu' lassie, but You have put it doon in your word that whaever comes to You, You'll tak' in, and no' cast oot. Wad Ye tak' me, for I've come; wad Ye just tak' me in, for Jesus' sake." Then she added "Amen," saying, hadn't we to say that when we finish praying to God?

When we rose from our knees, I asked her what she thought God had done for her, and her glad reply was: "Oh, He's ta'en me in—just

WHAT HE SAID HE WAD DAE."

As the girl had been so ignorant, I was afraid she might trust to anything I had said. I had many a time heard people say; "Yes, I'm saved, for Mr. So-and-So told me I was saved," and I wanted to be sure that Nellie would never say to anyone that she was saved because I had said so. So I asked again:

"Nellie, are you sure that God has taken you in?"

She looked up quite astonished, and her face was not a little clouded as she said to me: "Are ye dootin' Him yersel'; after a' ye've telt me aboot Him! I wadna hae thocht you wad hae dooted His word. I couldna hae ony doot aboot it after what He said."

As I put my arms round her for the second time that evening, I said, "No, Nellie, I have no doubt about it. I am as sure as you are that Jesus has taken you in, and just before I leave we will just again thank Him for all the messages He has sent, and for his goodness in opening the blind eyes to see the light which comes shining from the throne."

So we parted that night. For the first time Nellie had the abiding Friend within, and would never feel lonely again.

Orphanages in Armenia.—A well-informed correspondent writes to The Times:—"Advices received in London from Constantinople confirm the reports as to the serious character of the steps taken by the Turkish Government in closing orphanages. The British and United States Governments are understood to be in full agreement as to the steps which are to be taken in the event of the Porte further postponing the withdrawal of the order closing the Protestant orphanages for Armenian children. These institutions, although supported by British, American, German, Swiss, and Swedish benevolent committees, are under the direction of the United States Presbyterian missionaries in Asia Minor. Sir N. R. O'Connor and Mr. Strauss have already made energetic representations to the Grand Vizier, but without effect. The situation is, unfortunately, complicated by the measures adopted by Archbishop Azarian, the Armenian Catholic Patriarch, to influence the Sultan against the Protestant missions, on a frivolous pretext that the directors harbour revolutionary agents and spread sedition. The manifest success of the orphanages has also aroused the cupidity of certain Armenian officials at the Porte, who have been excluded from participating in their financial control."

Rome and the Scriptures.

A Contrast.—3.

By MAJOR G. MACKINLAY.

COMING now to the subject of the worship of saints, the English Roman Catholic catechism (p. 29) states that "we should pay to angels and saints an inferior honour or worship; for this is due to them as the servants and special friends of God." And yet the Lord Jesus said to Satan, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve" (Matt. iv. 10). Twice did the Apostle John fall down to worship an angel (Rev. xix. 10 and xxii. 8, 9), but on both occasions the abrupt command was given, "See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren . . . worship God." There was no permission to allow inferior worship—in fact, any worship was distinctly forbidden, and in no part of Scripture can we find any sanction for it.

On the subject of seeking the aid of departed saints, we have this searching question, "Should not a people seek unto their God? On behalf of the living should they seek unto the dead?" (Is. viii. 19 R.V.). Not only do Roman Catholics but they collect and treasure up their mortal remains of bones, hair, and other frail relics, and handle them with reverence. The Jewish law declared a man unclean for seven days who touched a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave (Num. xix. 16); and in another place it is ordered that a man defiled by contact with a dead body must not eat the passover at the regular time, but must partake a month later after being cleansed (Num. ix. 10, 11).

Romanists are not content, however, to seek the aid of the dead, or even of their mortal remains, but they descend to invoke the aid of inanimate images against which God's people were so repeatedly warned. The terrible satire of the prophet Isaiah (chapter xliv.) is well worth the careful attention of all earnest Roman Catholics. The maker of an image takes a tree and burns part in the fire, and warms himself, "and the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image; he falleth down to it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, 'Deliver me, for thou art my god'" (Is. xliv. 17). How many so-called saints are by devout Romanists looking at images! And although the worshipper may say, "Thou art my saint," instead of, "Thou art my god," the meaning is similar, and just as much is expected from the Romish saint as from the heathen god.

It is often said that images are only aids to devotion, and that they only assist in fixing the attention on those whom they represent. This was exactly what was said to me years ago by a Hindoo fakir in a native state on the borders of India: the idols were nothing in themselves, only helps to the worshippers, and though the less instructed and ignorant may regard them as something more, they are not really so, he said. I have asked Spanish believers whom I have known personally, if they had formerly really thought that the images could hear and help them, and they have assured me that they really thought they could do so, and they looked upon them as much more than mere representations.

SOON AFTER THEIR CONVERSION,

A Spanish woman, who had in her house a number of images of saints, as is usual in her country, took to searching the Bible, and became much shaken in her trust in them; so she put a curtain in front of the glass doors of the cupboard in which they were kept, so that she might not see them; but still she was unwilling to part with them altogether. At last, however, clearer light came, and conscience would not allow her to keep them any longer.

After prayer, and with much deliberation, she took them out of the cupboard and into her kitchen, in which a fire was burning brightly. Then she took up the first image, and calling it by name, as if it were able to hear and understand her, she said, "I burn thee because God has commanded me to do so," and immediately threw it into the glowing coals before her, watching it all the time and almost expecting it to spring out and revenge itself upon her. However, it burnt away quietly, and was consumed. Then she took out one after another of the rest, acting towards each in the same way, until at last only one, the most sacred one of them all, remained. This also she finally took up and committed to the flames, where it also was burnt up. Then, lifting her eyes upwards, she devoutly and obediently exclaimed, "And now, Lord Jesus, I have none but Thee." She knew practically the meaning of the Lord's title of a jealous God, who will not share his honours with another.

Protestant Outlook.

THE subject of Confession is being discussed in daily and weekly newspapers throughout the country. A typical letter in the Daily Chronicle ended in the following terms:—

Absolution, or the authoritative assurance of pardon from without, can only be given by a priest. The Church of England commits this power of absolution to each priest when he is ordained, and to no one else.

Lord Halifax declares that during the month of February 1,035 persons joined the English Church Union, and during the first ten days of March 330, making a total of 4,386 during the past seven months. From this it would appear that the High Church ranks are closing up in readiness for coming conflict.

Her Majesty's Government having declared that a return made of the confessional boxes that are used in the Church of England would be "a useless and unnecessary inquiry," there is no alternative (writes a correspondent) but to appeal to Protestants everywhere to assist in unmasking those who are breaking the law. There are in every city, town, and village in England Protestants who, if appealed to, will give the particulars required.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, speaking last week at a meeting of the Council of the Church Defence Committee, said that just now attention is a good deal more occupied with what was within the Church than with any attacks from without. He could not say that he very much feared the ultimate result; but he deprecated the heat which was being engendered in the controversy, and which, he was afraid, would not help them in the slightest degree. What the Committee had to do was still to endeavour with all their powers to teach the people of England the real history and position of the Church.

There have been several controversial lectures in the neighbourhood of Acton. The last contribution to the discussion was a lecture in the Central Hall by Pastor F. B. Monti on "Why I left the Church of Rome." By many quotations the lecturer showed the discrepancies between the Word of God and the teaching of the Romish Church, the discovery of which shook his faith in the so-called "infallible" system. A description of the great mental struggles through which the lecturer passed was received in a sympathetic manner by the large audience.

An organisation, entitled the Imperial Protestant Federation, has been formed in order to provide a means of concentrated action on the part of all existing Protestant bodies; and to stir up public opinion for the purpose of returning to Parliament, at the next general election, a strong Protestant party determined to uphold the Reformation Settlement in the Church and Constitution; and to maintain Protestant supremacy in all departments in the British Empire. The hon. sec. is Mr. E. H. Garbett, 8, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

The Council of the Church Association has issued a reply to the manifesto of the English Church Union; and copies may be had from its office, 14, Buckingham Street, Strand. Dealing with priestly centralisation, which simply means Popery, the document recalls the words of Lord Halifax in the E.C.U. Gazette of May, 1886: "Is there a single instructed Christian who would not prefer Leo XIII. to the Privy Council?" The circular asks for active interest in the Church Discipline Bill of 1899, which comes on for second reading in Parliament on May 10.

This measure will provide a lay judge of the first rank; will prevent bishops from denying justice to any man; and will secure a final appeal to the Crown, on the merits of each grievance complained of.

On the question of Church Courts, and advocating "the final appeal to the laws of our country," "An Essex Vicar" writes to The Times:—

We read in history, and our own experience tells us, that spiritual and ecclesiastical courts are not the surest road to justice, even for spiritual persons and in spiritual causes; and we feel secure in the knowledge that behind their imperfections and prejudices and inexperience there stand tribunals in which evidence will be weighed and justice administered by trained and impartial judges. I trust that neither rebellious Ritualists nor weak-kneed bishops nor compliant statesmen will deprive us of what is to us no bondage, but the surest guarantee for freedom.

Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, M.P., speaking at Hull on Wednesday last week, said on this subject:—

So long as the Church is established we must insist on the Queen's supremacy, and uphold the authority of the Civil Courts and of Parliament. But what we wonder at is how long it will be ere earnest and honest and good men in the Church discover how much better is liberty than privilege, and find the best solution of this great difficulty in the practice of a free Church in a free State!

In the first of a series of articles on "Confession in the Church of England" a correspondent of the Leeds Mercury says:—

Confession is practised in the Church of Rome. Her priests are confessors; they are trained to hear confessions—to discriminate in human weakness; they are pledged to secrecy. Her organisation has provided for every exigency of this article of faith; the form of it is prescribed; it is instilled into the mind of the young; and her adherents, of all ages and of both sexes, are admonished—nay, commanded—to make use of it as a means of grace and eternal salvation. But it is obvious—if only by the lack of a form to be observed—that no provision has been made in the Church of England for the act of going to one of its ministers, kneeling down before him, revealing to him one's conduct of life, and receiving from him exhortations, penance to be performed, and finally absolution. If, therefore, the Church of England is beginning to do what the Church of Rome does and has done, no other conclusion will be drawn than that the Church of England is trending towards the Church of Rome.

Speaking at the Spring Conference of the Church Association and National Protestant League at Bolton, Archdeacon Taylor declared that the Reformers, the men who drew up the first and second Prayer-books, held the Zwinglian doctrine regarding the Lord's Supper, and were dead against both transubstantiation and consubstantiation. The present-day Ritualists, he contended, hold the Roman doctrine all but in name, and the plain line of defence for Protestants in this controversy was to hold the spiritual presence only, and have no compromise with either transubstantiation or consubstantiation. On the subject of Church government, the Archdeacon said that in an unestablished or non-national Church it was entrusted to those who were chosen by the Church for that purpose, but in the National Church of England the chief government belonged by statute law to the Queen, as representing the nation, and to those who were appointed by her, as were the bishops.

The Famine in Persia.—Deacon Abshalom Sayad sends particulars of the continued famine in Persia. Deaths from starvation are reported from Oroomiah, and children are crying for bread. Whole families are in a most pitiful condition. Some financial help has been forwarded direct to Rev. W. A. Shedd, of the American Missions at Oroomiah, and any friends who desire to aid in the matter may communicate with Deacon Sayad, 10, Drayton Park, London, N.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow Me."—John x. 27.

I.

REVIEW OF THE GOSPEL.

WRITTEN after the other Gospels. A.D. 80-90.
Its Author.—John, son of Zebedee and Salome. Matt. iv. 21.
Language.—Greek, the then universal language.
Place.—Most probably Ephesus.

Having the other Gospels before him, John omits much which they give, and records what they omit.

Matthew's Gospel was primarily addressed to Jews; Mark's to Romans; Luke's to Greeks; John's to believers in Christ. The fourth is emphatically the Christian's Gospel.

The object of the Gospel is stated in chap. xx. 31. "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that, believing, ye might have life through his name."

Elder scholars may be encouraged to study in order to prove that that object has been fulfilled.

II.

REVIEW OF THE CHAPTERS.

Get the scholars to memorise these.

Chap. i. The Incarnation of the Son of God. Lamb of God. First disciples.
Chap. ii. Cana. Water turned into wine.
Chap. iii. Nicodemus. The need of a new heart.
Chap. iv. Samaritan woman. Nobleman's son.
Chap. v. Bethesda cure.
Chap. vi. Feeding 5,000 with five cakes and two fishes.
Chap. vii. Feast of Tabernacles.
Chap. viii. Freedom by the truth.
Chap. ix. Man born blind healed.
Chap. x. The Good Shepherd.

III.

REVIEW OF MIRACLES.

1. At the wedding, providing wine (Cana).
2. Many miracles not recorded (chap. ii. 23).
3. Healing the nobleman's son (Cana).
4. The paralysed man cured (Jerusalem).
5. Feeding 5,000 (near Bethsaida).
6. Blind man receives sight (Jerusalem).

IV.

REVIEW OF CHRIST'S CONVERSATIONS.

1. With the disciples (chap. i. 35-51).
2. With the Jews, when he cleansed the Temple (chap. ii. 18-22).
3. With Nicodemus, in the night (chap. iii. 1-21).
4. With the woman of Samaria (chap. iv.).
5. With the Jews, after the miracle wrought on the Sabbath (chap. v.).
6. With the multitudes, after the miracle of feeding (chap. vi. 22).
7. At the feast of Tabernacles (chap. vii.)
8. With the Pharisees (chap. viii. 12).

V.

REVIEW OF CHRIST'S WORDS ABOUT HIMSELF.

"I saw thee"—revealing his Omniscience—(chap. i. 48).
"Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (chap. ii. 19).
"I . . . am He" — i.e., the Messiah (chap. iv. 26).
"I seek not mine own will" (chap. v. 30).
"I receive not glory from men" (chap. v. 41).
"I am come in my Father's name" (chap. v. 43).
"It is I, be not afraid" (chap. vi. 20).
"I am the Bread of Life" (chap. vi. 35).
"I am come down from heaven" (chap. vi. 38).
"I am the Light of the world" (chap. viii. 12).
"I do always the things that are pleasing to Him" (chap. viii. 29).
"I must work the works of Him that sent Me" (chap. ix. 4).
"I am the Door" (chap. x. 7).
"I am the Good Shepherd, the Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep" (chap. x. 11).
"I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish" (chap. x. 28).

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, March 19. Numbers xxx.

THAT vows should stand, unless disallowed by those that had a right to be consulted, is the burden of this chapter; and it is a very important position, else our religious life must suffer.

When once a man has given himself to God, he can never be quite as he was before. He cannot withdraw from the position which he has taken up, and sink to a lower and more indifferent one, without grievous condemnation. He has recognised God's claims; how can he disallow them? He has presented himself at the altar; how can he dispose of what has been made over to the service of the Most High?

But, in some cases, men find themselves prevented from carrying their vows of consecration into the practical form on which they had set their hearts. They had desired to be ministers of his Gospel or missionaries, but have been withheld by family considerations.

One young man, for instance, told me recently that he had greatly desired to go to the foreign field; but his father and mother died and he was left with two sisters to educate, and for their sakes he must needs turn to commercial life. Surely cases like this may be classed with those that were annulled and disallowed under the old covenant. There need be no self-condemnation with respect to them.

In God's sight the life which is diverted from its chosen course to do the pressing duty of the hour is as much his own as it would have been beneath the banyan-trees of India, or on the plains of China.

Do not always be looking at your consecration, or at the special direction your life may be taking, but upon God, to whom you desire to be yielded and surrendered. Cast on Him the responsibility of taking all, and leave with Him the prerogative of deciding in what special direction your gift of yourself shall be expended. Surely He has a right to do what He will with his own.

MONDAY, March 20. Numbers xxxi.

In reading such a chapter as this, we must remember that the Bible is the record and story of the gradual reclamation of Israel from the level of the nations around, and its preparation to become one of the great spiritual forces of the world. That process could only be a prolonged one. And it was only by very slow degrees that the gross cruelty and licence of the times could be eliminated. Our Lord distinctly said that Moses allowed certain things because of the hardness of heart of those with whom he had to deal (Matt. xix. 8). Many times the Master said, "They said of old time thus and thus, but I say unto you." If you want to find God's ultimate will about our treatment of our enemies, you must turn to the words of Jesus and his Apostles.

The first steps of the Divine method in the refinement and purification of the children of Israel are obvious in the putting to death of the women who might introduce the vices of the heathen into the homes of Israel, in the rigid rites of purification to which the warriors and their spoils were subjected, and in the dedication of a fixed proportion to the service of the Levites. Time was thus given for passion to cool, and for righteousness to assert itself.

Let us ponder the Divine sentence that whilst all must be sanctified, yet that discrimination must be used in dealing with the material. Whatever could stand fire must go through it; but if the fire would destroy it, then it must go through water. God will not expose us to an ordeal too searching for us to sustain. He knows our frame, and remembers we are dust. He will substitute water for fire. If we cannot bear the baptism of flame, He will plunge us into that of water. "Like as a father pitieth. . . ."

TUESDAY, March 21. Numbers xxxii.

These three tribes never entered into the national life, as those did on the other side of the Jordan. They were further removed from the centre of religious worship, furnished first by Shiloh and then by Jerusalem. On them first the tide of foreign invasion broke, sweeping them and ther cattle into captivity. In Deborah's great song she rebukes Reuben for sitting among the sheep-folds to hear the pipings for the flocks instead of coming to the help of God against the mighty.

May we not see here the suggestion of peril to us all? The "much cattle" are a great hindrance to a resolute and blessed life. They keep men on the wrong side of the river of separation, for even if their owners appear to cross it their hearts are still with their cattle, and they will take the earliest occasion of returning to them. "It is hard for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye." The Brahmins say that the holy man dies to every other sin earlier and easier than he dies to the thought of and care for money.

Do not, however, think that riches are the only cause of failure in the religious life. With the deceitfulness of riches our Lord classes the cares of this life, which are the special heritage of those whose wealth is limited, and always below the water-line of comfort. Oh, to be indifferent to these things, leaving them with Jesus, as Potiphar left his affairs with Joseph, and knew only the bread he ate!

WEDNESDAY, March 22. Numbers xxxiii.

The record of ineffectual marches given here is full of pathetic interest and warning. If the stations mentioned in detail had been in a straight line for the land of promise there had been little room for regret. But they were not. They stand for journeys which need never have been undertaken. To and fro the tribes marched on the sands of the desert in an aimless zig-zag—just marking time while the bodies of the generation of murmurers fell in the wilderness and were carried to the grave, wrapt about with the desert sands as their winding-sheet.

Such is the doom of unbelief. To effect nothing, to be condemned to endless and useless toils, to miss the land of promise and perish at its threshold, to lie beneath the sad and lamentable epitaph, "Ye shall not enter into my rest." Let us beware, lest we be involved in this bitter fate, and look back at last on a life of aimless wanderings, instead of steady progress towards the mark of the prize of our high calling in Christ.

It is through unbelief also that we fail to drive out the remnants of our foes, the strongly-entrenched habits and propensities, by which we are often brought into captivity. Alas for us! If only we would unite ourselves fully with Him who died and rose again, we should find that sin would have no further dominion over us, and we should be more than conquerors.

There is entire deliverance or victory for us all in the Lamb that was slain and is exalted now as the lion of the tribe of Judah; but they are only ours in proportion to our faith, and this is also in the measure of our obedience. God has given us the last of rest, victory, and satisfaction (34); let us enter upon our inheritance.

THURSDAY, March 23. Numbers xxxiv.

Jesus Christ is our inheritance. In Him are the hills and valleys, the vineyards and oliveyards, the rivers and streams, of which Canaan's were only symbols and types. But in how great a contrast does He stand to that fair land, the limitations of which, as this chapter indicates, could be so clearly defined on the north, south, east, and west. In contrast to this, the Apostle tells us that the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of God's love pass knowledge, that his peace passeth understanding, that his joy is unspeakable, and his riches unsearchable.

But, as this chapter further suggests, the land must be divided. "Unto each of us is grace given, according to the measure of the gift of Christ." There is something special in Christ for me which cannot be taken by my brother—some special aspect of his character, or communication of his grace. Judah might not take Issachar's portion, nor Issachar Benjamin's. And as each inherited according to his own right, so with Christ. Each believer as a member of his body has a right to some special property in the love of his heart and the direction of his head.

Let us possess our possessions. A missionary told me of a rajah in India who owned a most beautiful and well-appointed house, but for some inexplicable cause lived in a miserable hut in the rear. Of how many Christians is this a type? Though all Christ is theirs, they are content with a mere fragment of his daily help.

FRIDAY, March 24. Numbers xxxv.

How careful God was for the Levites! Repeatedly we have a record of the careful dispositions He made for their comfort. They had surrendered all to become his faithful servants, and now He gave them all that was requisite whether cities for their families or suburbs for their cattle. It is Christ's repeated assurance that those who set themselves to secure their own well-being and wealth lose it, whilst those who renounce all for God, receive from his hands whatever they really need. The world is full of God's Levites. There are hundreds who are occupied with the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, with small thought for themselves, to whom He is adding all necessary things for the body and this life. Our prime consideration must be to live on his plan. He will find the provender.

Perhaps these words may fall under the notice of those who have stepped forth in faith after much prayer for direction, but they are sorely tried, and inclined to turn back. To these the message of God is sure: "Forget the things that are behind, and reach forth to those before." Do not renounce a principle of life to which God has clearly led you. He is only testing the integrity of your soul, to know whether it still follows hard after Him. If you believe not, He will still remain faithful, He cannot deny Himself.

SATURDAY, March 25. Numbers xxxvi.

Already the true position of women was becoming recognised. Instead of being given to whatever husband could pay to the parents the highest price, they were permitted to marry "whom they thought best" (v. 6). How much woman owes to the Bible! It is only necessary to travel in Eastern lands, and contrast the slavery of the poor women, or the seclusion of the upper-class women, with the position of women in Christian lands, to realise how much woman owes to Christ.

In the present case, the daughters of Zelophehad were able to take their property with them to their husbands. We should speak of them as heiresses. How often have noble women brought their husbands estates of spiritual worth and help! Think for instance of the blessings which accrued to Dr. Judson through his first and second wives. Let every Christian girl so cultivate the graces of her heart, and the gifts of her mind, that if God give her in marriage to some devoted servant of his, she may take over to him the wealthiest inheritance possible.

What a lesson this whole chapter is to those who, by their unbelief and worldliness, squander the sacred heritage of a holy name, transmitted from their ancestors!

It was very desirable that each Israelite should cleave to the inheritance of his fathers, and that the tribes should observe their respective limits. And it was his scrupulous obedience to this regulation which forbade Naboth's surrender of his vineyard to Ahab. In his courteous refusal, the good Israelite almost quotes the words of this chapter, "The Lord forbid it me that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee."

Letters from America.

A COLOURED REVIVAL.—MR. WHARTON, AN ENGLISH EVANGELIST.—THE MOURNERS' SEAT.

BEFORE we left England, I had seen Mr. James Wharton, of Barrow-in-Furness, who has several times visited the Southern States. He pressed me to go there, if the way were opened, when we next visited America. I omitted to say in my former letter that we are accompanied by Mr. Wintle. He is well known to our readers in connection with the Christian Mission, Pontymoile, Mon.

We arrived at Wilmington, N.C., on Feb. 18, and found Mr. Wharton in the midst of a very fruitful revival in connection with the Gregory Institute. Mr. Wharton is working under the auspices of the American Missionary Association—a Congregational body doing good work among the coloured people of the south. Mr. Wharton's method surprised and interested us. He had held some meetings before we joined him. They began at 7.30 p.m. with singing a few hymns, prayer, and reading; not in any formal order, but spontaneous and free, as in our mission halls. He spoke for about half-an-hour. He did not attempt to teach anything new, but the address on each occasion was based upon the conviction that they knew enough to save them, and that what is required of the evangelist is to lead into

"THE VALLEY OF DECISION."

Another principle is that the sinner must not only confess Christ after he has found Him, but must confess his sinfulness, and helplessness, and need before finding Him; as the hymn says,

"Sin and want I come confessing."

Accordingly, when the address was over, the invitation was given at once to come to "the mourners' bench," and one or more seats were immediately cleared for this purpose. Sometimes ten, twenty, thirty, came forward, mostly children from ten to fourteen, but many also of various ages up to twenty five, with occasionally a middle-aged man or woman. After kneeling for a few minutes one would begin a moaning prayer, "Lord save me," "God be merciful to me a sinner;" very soon the moan ran all along the line, and all were in tears. Sometimes a loud and urgent exclamation would break forth from one which moved all the rest.

DURING THIS TIME OF MOURNING, the Christians stood around singing such hymns as "Jesus is tenderly calling thee home," "Come, every soul by sin oppress," "Just as I am, without one plea." Sometimes very soon, sometimes after a longer interval, one would rise or spring from the kneeling attitude, throw up her hands, and keep on moving hands and feet in a way which could not but remind one of the man healed at the Beautiful Gate, who entered into the Temple, "walking and leaping, and praising God." One such kept repeating, "I know that my Redeemer liveth! He said to me, 'Go in peace and sin no more.'" Another said, "I'll never disown Him again. I do love Him. I do love Him. I'll fight for Him as long as I live!" A restored backslider said, "I feel the Lord has forgiven my sins, and brought me back to Him again."

My wife, in a letter to a friend, gives a more graphic description, than I have done, and I take the liberty of copying it:

"The response to the invitations to come to the mourners' seat was something marvellous. Without much pressure—in many instances without any—adults and little ones flocked to the front to kneel down. The most curious thing was their readiness to shed tears. Some of the little girls and boys walked up with a bold step and a smile on their lips, some even with mischievous twinkle in their eyes, but as soon as they knelt down they started to sob and moan.

"Some worked their emotion up to such a pitch of excitement that it seemed impossible to stop them. Then Mr. Wharton's voice, as calm as a summer breeze, bade them leave off mourning. Some obeyed instantly; others remained in an attitude of and while a number got up and sang, 'Oh how I love Jesus,' the rest continued to moan and wail. A pause might intervene—a moment of silence followed by a piercing shriek. Others follow the example, jump up, embrace each other, cry, shout, laugh. In the midst of entangled arms, knocking heads, gesticulating limbs, one feels giddy and lost. It is like delirium—a delirium of souls freed from their chains. It seems that their joy needs physical expression, and unless it finds it they do not realise their freedom. About 150 have thus come out, most of them more or less boisterously."

Comparisons are odious, and I will make no comparison between one method and another; but there is much to be said in favour of holding a convinced sinner to the one necessity of confessing sin and need, and then of yielding: surrendering to Him who "loved me and gave Himself for me," and then to "believe, and receive, and confess Him, that all his salvation may know." At this juncture they do not so much want instruction, as to be led to call on the name of the Lord, and to receive his promised salvation.

It was almost impossible to speak to these "mourners" individually, unless it were a teacher who knew one of her own scholars kneeling there. The evangelist would repeat passages of Scripture with or without remark, or hymns would be sung likely to help them. It was surprising how soon some came into the light, while others were left still mourning. One of such woke up in the night with the new peace and joy possessing her. To another it came while doing her work in the house the following day. Here, as everywhere, there were more girls than boys, more women than men, among the seekers. As Luther said, "It is a hard world for girls," and it is well that "when the dear Saviour bids them come in, they enter the open door."

Zenana and Medical Mission.

IN the town of Malegaon, Bombay Presidency, God gave us much work to do for Him the year before last during the famine among the women and children. Many of the women were widows with families dependent on them, and of these some became inquirers. In order to give them Bible teaching, we had to find work that they might support themselves. For this we needed a large capital, £200, but were only able to obtain about £33. Out of this had to come instruments, carts, and bullocks, &c., which of course swallowed up a great deal of our capital. The work has been carried on up to the present, but we find it is impossible to make it entirely self-supporting unless we have the means to buy in the materials for the women to work on while prices are low.

In time we hope to build a home for them, and then another difficulty which is before us of providing a dwelling place for them after baptism will be done away with. May God open the hearts of Christians to help us! Without this, as far as we can see, they must go back to slavery and heathenism.

Central American Mission.

IN 1888, when a pastor in Texas, I came to know of the spiritual darkness and destitution of the beautiful and fertile region lying between North and South America, and it became a conviction with me that God would surely have a controversy with the Christians of the United States should they continue to neglect the perishing millions so near their doors. Excluding British Honduras and the Mosquito Coast of Nicaragua, the only systematic efforts making for the evangelisation of the five republics were those of the Jamaica Baptists, represented by that devoted missionary, Rev. J. H. Sobey, at Port Limon, Costa Rica, and of one Presbyterian missionary at Guatemala City, Guatemala.

Failing to induce any of the Boards approached for that purpose to take up that work, I invited three Christian business men of Dallas, Texas, to meet for consultation and prayer. The meeting resulted in the formation of a mission council, with Mr. Luther Rees (who has since entered the ministry) as chairman, the writer as secretary, and Mr. E. M. Powell, as treasurer. Subsequently Hon. D. H. Scott, of Paris, Texas, became a member of the council, and is now its treasurer.

It was resolved to keep the mission strictly to evangelistic lines. This has been adhered to. At points where converts are secured churches or assemblies are gathered, in the expectation that gifts of government, pastor, &c., will develop out of the worshipping body, leaving the missionary to the work of evangelisation, counsel, and brotherly oversight. Upon no part of the work has the favour of God more manifestly rested. For example, Mr. Bishop, of Honduras, writes concerning the work just begun in a small village: "Eight are now baptized, but more are converted. Salvador, the shoemaker, is making rapid progress. The Spirit of the Lord is upon him, and he has already received the gift of teacher. He can be seen at many different hours of the day with his Bible and a few listeners."

At another point in Honduras work was begun in a village of devil-worshippers—perhaps the most ill-reputed place in the republic. Everyone warned the heroic missionary, Mr. Dillon, and his wife against going there. Now, after about two years, 149 out of an adult population of about 200 are baptized and are going on wonderfully. Only two have fallen away. Mr. Dillon succumbed to the climate, but his noble wife remained. She has her reward in the sobriety, spirituality, and industry of this church of converted demon-worshippers.

Twenty-three missionaries are now on the field. The great need is devoted young men who will go two and two to the remoter Indian tribes. This service would often be dangerous, because of climatic conditions. Mr. Robert Arthington, of Leeds, enabled the mission to conduct extensive explorations among these Indians, so that the mission is prepared with all information necessary to the wise and economical planting of missionaries in every tribe of this vast region. May we not count upon your readers to labour with us in prayer for men and money for this work?

Zenana Work.—The Master of Trinity College, Cambridge (Dr. Butler), presided at a meeting held at Stafford House, by permission of the Duke of Sutherland, on behalf of the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society. Dr. Butler said they wanted to make it more natural for the daughters of England to give their lives to the great cause represented by the Society, so that it might be said it was not only a few exceptional women who engaged in that work, but that there were hundreds of Christian women ready and willing to bear their part in ministering to their ignorant sisters in the East. If they were to look for God's blessing upon that part of missionary work, the carrying of the voice of the Gospel and the voice of skilled humanity to the women of India, it must be largely through the parents of England bringing an influence to bear upon their daughters. Addresses were also given by Miss Valpy and Miss Swainson on the Society's work in India.

A Week in Madras.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER.

THE approach to Madras by sea is very imposing. We sighted it in the early morning, and sailed into the harbour as a magnificent sunrise was causing the harbour lights on either side to pale. As usual in these Oriental ports, our steamer was immediately beset by a motley crowd of boats, rafts, and gigs, manned by almost naked and very vociferous natives.

On landing, we made our way past the post-office, the law courts, the Christian College, and other lofty and noble buildings, mostly in red brick, crowned with towers and minarets, and so to the home of Mr. and Mrs. McConaughy, with whom the week was very pleasantly spent.

Madras is the most modern of the three Indian capitals. It covers twenty-nine square miles, with an entire population of 475,000. The natives, mostly Telugus and Tamils, with about 17,000 Mohammedans, are packed very closely in the congeries of flat-roofed buildings near the harbour, known as the Black Town—and it is black morally, as well as in the appearance of its people. Europeans number between 3,000 and 4,000, including soldiers.

The missionary body, which numbers between 70 and 100 persons, is engaged in all kinds of agency on behalf of this vast native population, and schools, churches, mission centres, orphanages, hospitals, and colleges, abound on every hand.

A MEMORABLE SERIES OF MEETINGS, was held, which in the evenings have filled the great Victoria Hall. And though the morning hour, 7.15, was very early, and the English residents are scattered over a wide area, we had very encouraging and growing attendances morning after morning. Best of all, the Lord has worked with us, confirming his word with signs following.

Amongst those who have come in from the neighbouring mission stations have been Dr. and Mrs. Chamberlain from Arcot, Dr. and Mrs. Boggs from Secunderabad, Dr. Dowie, who wrote the story of the "Lone Star Mission," Dr. Ferguson of the Theological Seminary, Ramapatam, Dr. Jones of Madura, Dr. Harbison of the Lutheran church, and several Danish missionaries. It has been a most delightful experience to meet and talk with these honoured and devoted missionaries. So many have told me that they understand, as never before, many of the deeper aspects of Christian truth, have given themselves more entirely to God, and have learnt to receive the infilling of the Holy Spirit in deeper measure.

One vignette, which will remain long with me, was of Dr. Miller teaching in a large class-room, full of native students in the great Christian College, the upbuilding of which has been his life-work for thirty years. Another, of the aged Bishop of Madras, whom I met at the annual meeting of the Y.W.C.A., which I had the honour of addressing. And yet another, of a great audience of native young men in the College Hall, assembled on Sunday afternoon to hear an address on "The White Flower of a Blameless Life." This is a subject which sorely needs to be treated in this land, where vice is sanctioned as a part of religion; and it gives a conspicuous opportunity of exalting the keeping power of the Saviour.

THE Y.M.C.A.

But I hasten to speak of the wonderful work being done in connection with the Y.M.C.A., through the instrumentality of Mr. McConaughy, the secretary, in conjunction with Mr. Arbuthnot, the president, himself the son of a Christian lady well known for her maintenance of Protestant principles.

Mr. McConaughy was educated at the Theological Seminary, New York; was secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Harrisburg, from 1880-83, and then of the branch at Haarlem, where he came under the notice of Mr. Moody. When this sagacious general of the Lord's army took in hand the affairs of the Philadelphia Association—almost crushed with a floating debt of £7,000, and a mortgage of £200,000—he insisted, as one condition of his putting his powerful shoulder to the wheel, that Mr. McConaughy should be appointed secretary. On this being granted, Mr. Moody raised money enough to clear off the floating debt; and in the six years that he held office the secretary justified the confidence reposed in him by securing promises to cover the mortgage; and this in addition to his work of bringing the Association itself into the front rank.

Then changes and sorrow invaded his home-life, and made him more susceptible to Mr. Wishard's appeal, that he should give his life to Y.M.C.A. work in Bombay. He visited England, consulted Sir John Kennaway and Rev. F. Wigram, the unanimous verdict of all being that the work in India had the prior claim, and he finally landed in Madras December 29, 1889, to begin his very difficult enterprise.

From the first Mr. Arbuthnot threw himself into the work, and a little group of devoted men laid down these four principles, which are worthy of being recorded as a remarkable instance of

SANCTIFIED COMMON SENSE AND SAGACITY:

(1). That the privileges of the Association should be open to all young men without distinction of rank, race, or religion. It was understood, of course, that only Christians could be members.

(2). That the control should be vested in the active members, who must be in communion with some Protestant Christian Church,

(3). That the agencies connected with it should aim at building up the whole manhood of the members.

(4). That the work should be developed only so fast as local financial help permitted.

The results have amply justified this wise foundation-laying. Though the premises have been very shabby and inconvenient, the membership has reached the total of 521, of whom 429 are Indian, and 92 European. As to religion, 263 are Christian, 236 Hindu, 20 Mohammedan, one Parsee, and one Buddhist. On the spacious athletic grounds, in the lawn-tennis courts, I saw a European, a Eurasian, a Brahmin, and a Sudra playing in the same game. There is no fear, however, of the athletic or social overpowering the spiritual. Four Bible-classes, three Gospel meetings, devotional meetings, and other agencies are conducted weekly.

For some time the urgent need of new premises has been making itself felt; and I have had the great privilege of seeing how nearly the dream of nine years is realised in the splendid pile of new premises which is fast approaching completion, and forms a worthy compeer to the public buildings to which I have already referred and among which it stands.

So interested is the Governor, Sir Arthur Havelock, that he has arranged for a contribution on the behalf of the Government, amounting to about £1,600. With princely generosity, Mr. Wanamaker has contributed £7,000. Great Britain has contributed the ground, India the foundations, and America the superstructure. All the cost is raised except the amount needed to pay for the lighting. It is a perfect miracle of

WHAT FAITH AND PRAYER CAN ACCOMPLISH.

And this is the man, of whom I spoke in my article on Calcutta, who, when he was on a collecting tour in the United States, renounced a sum of £4,000 to enable Mr. Campbell White to secure his building. "He that loseth his life shall save it."

The building consists of four storeys. Below are the main hall, to hold 400 people, vestibule, and restaurant, flanked on either side with spacious stores, the income from which will be of considerable value. On the first floor the secretary's offices, with a number of large rooms for social and recreative purposes, including the gymnasium. On the next, the educational and Bible-class rooms, including one for lads. And at the top, with a magnificent view of the sea, and away to St. Thomas' Mount, a hostel in which about forty students can be accommodated, who will live there, under the superintendence of two godly graduates of some British university, who, it is hoped, will be induced to give up their lives to individual work among the 5,000 students of all nationalities in this great centre.

The building is to be opened in April, and already the flags of different countries are beginning to arrive. As we sat at tiffin to-day the British Standard arrived from Sir George Williams, through Mr. Putterill; Prince Bernadotte has sent the Swedish, Count Bernstorff the German; Mr. Wanamaker is sending the Stars and Strips. Where God's Spirit reigns we forget all national distinctions in one great love. Our Lord is the Prince of the kings of the earth. Citizenship in the heavenly Jerusalem is the mighty bond of union. In Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond or free; but Christ is all and in all.

In closing this letter I should like to tell of

with a group of missionaries. Imagine a large bungalow, with its deep portico, standing in a spacious garden filled with palms, bamboos, cactuses, and other tropical trees and plants. After chatting a little in the portico, seated in comfortable rocking-chairs, we adjourn to breakfast in the pretty inner apartment, where the turbaned bare-footed servants served the successive courses as we sat around the table tastefully decorated with flowers and a pattern of coloured beads laid on the white tablecover. The conversation started with the inquiry as to how many of them had met with elect souls, like Cornelius or the eunuch, who had been previously prepared by God's Spirit for the teaching of the Gospel preacher. Then one tells of a whole family—grandfather, father and son—whom he had met in Delhi, and who, through the reading of a Bible apart from missionary influence, had become Christians. Another, of a young Brahmin, who to beguile his sickness took up a Bible left at his house three years previously, and through reading it found the Saviour, and after great persecution was baptized. Another, of the headman of a village, who through a Bible was led to despise idols, and secretly one night threw the idol of his village into the river, to his people's great dismay when they visited the temple on the following morning. Another, of nineteen men who came for baptism on one occasion from their distant houses, and who had become Christians through a copy of the Gospel according to Matthew.

Dr. Rudisill, the superintendent of the American Episcopal Methodist Mission Press, then told us of the perfecting of printing machinery, which will enable him at the end of the year to print daily 100,000 portions of Scripture in small booklet form at the price of 1,400 for a rupee. Thus mines are being laid throughout the land, by which the hoary systems of idolatry are being disintegrated, as the ice of the polar regions by the genial influences of the spring.

As I write these words a letter comes in from a beloved and honoured friend: "I can find no words to tell how much your mission to Madras has been owned of God. I shall always remember your visit, so far as I am personally concerned, with much thankfulness." Words like these are ample repayment for all that this tour has cost, and fill one with thanksgiving. We are now within a fortnight of our return, and one's heart leaps towards one's beloved work at home.

The Pietistic Movement in Germany is described under the head of "Historical Revivals" in the March issue of the United Presbyterian Magazine. The writer is Rev. Dr. Grieve, of Forfar, and he admirably describes a movement which must ever be attractive to spiritually-minded Christians. In some concluding words Dr. Grieve draws the following lesson: "May we, in our Church defence and Church extension, in our anxiety for correctness of creed, in our Bible criticism and counter-criticism, be preserved from neglecting the requirement of a vital Christianity, and from losing hold of the one thing needful—a personal contact of our life with Christ, lest haply, should the dividing sword of the Spirit fall among us, we may be found fighting on the wrong side of the battle!"

The Barry Dock Gospel Tent, we regret to learn, has been totally destroyed by the gales and the storms. A new one will be needed for the spring and summer work. The superintendent of the Mission is Mr. G. E. Coultas, Barry Dock, South Wales.

The Great Awakening of 1740.

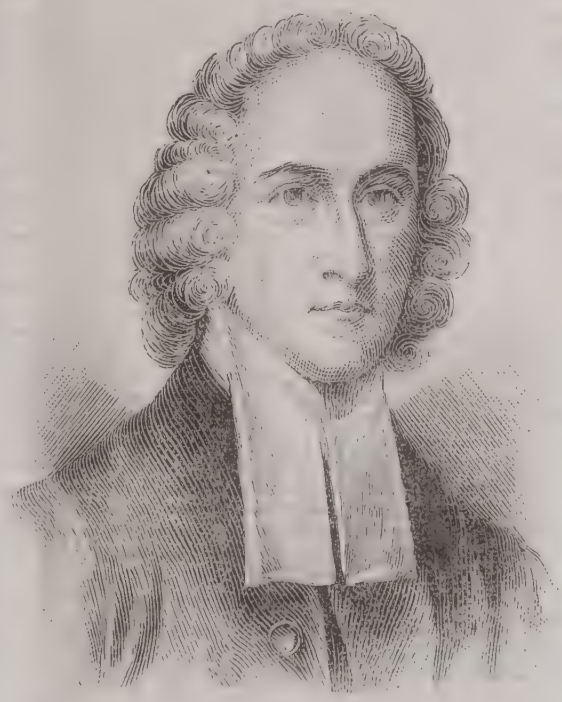
JONATHAN EDWARDS.

"THE Great Awakening of 1740" is the name given to the revival of religion in New England in that year, when George Whitefield paid his first visit to that part of America. Wonderful things, however, had taken place during all the years between 1734 and 1740, and it is only just to the workers who preceded Whitefield, and then co-operated with him, that their labours should be known.

The first among them in point of time, the chief in point of ability and power, was JONATHAN EDWARDS, of Northampton, in Massachusetts. Both his father and his grandfather were Presbyterian ministers. His conversion, which took place at the age of seventeen, when he was a student at Yale College, was a very clear and decisive experience. It had been preceded by two ineffectual times of serious thought and outward amendment. His mind had been full of objections from his childhood to the doctrine of God's sovereignty, but after his change they all passed away. His peculiar turn of thought on this deep and tremendous subject had a vital connection with the power he subsequently wielded in preaching to formalists and self-righteous souls.

Edwards remained at College for two years after his conversion, and then, at nineteen years of age, he went to New York to be the minister of the English Presbyterians. The eight months he was there was a time of solemn heart-searching and earnest dedication of himself to God. Then he returned to college again for his M.A. degree, and held a position as tutor for two years. In 1727, in his twenty-fourth year, he was ordained as colleague to his grandfather at Northampton, the place with which his name will always be associated. When his grandfather died he became sole pastor, and held the position for twenty-three years.

The condition of the churches was, at this period, very unsatisfactory, confessedly unregenerate persons being admitted to Church membership, and the difference between the Church and the world becoming scarcely distinguishable. Spiritual discipline was neglected, and growing laxness of morals was invading the churches. Occasional revivals and the preaching of sound doctrine had somewhat stayed the process of decay. The influence of Edwards brought about at first a gradual amendment.



But the great awakening commenced in 1734 by his preaching a series of sermons on "Justification by Faith alone," sweeping away entirely those false hopes of salvation which his hearers had built upon their own doings. Men were made to see that God has not appointed anything for them to do before coming to Christ by faith, and that He is under no obligation to grant them any spiritual favour. Edwards says that in December, 1734, "the Spirit of God began extraordinarily to set in and wonderfully to work among us; and there were very suddenly, one after another, five or six persons who were to all appearance savingly converted, and some of them wrought upon in a very remarkable manner."

One of these converts was a young woman who had been a leader in frivolous living. Edwards, who knew nothing of the change that had passed over her, was surprised at the account she gave him of her experiences, but was afraid that such a conversion might bring odium upon the whole work and hinder its progress. "The event was the reverse to a wonderful degree." The news of it came like a flash of lightning upon the hearts of the young people all over the town, and upon many others. Many went to talk with her concerning what she had met with, "and what appeared in her seemed to be to the satisfaction of all that did so."

Immediately a great and earnest concern about religion and the eternal world became universal in all parts of the town, and among persons of all degrees and all ages nothing was talked of but the things of God. Edwards says that the minds of people were wonderfully taken off from the world; it was treated by them as a thing of very little consequence. They served to follow their worldly business more as a part of their duty than from any disposition they had to it. "It was then a dreadful thing amongst us to lie out of Christ, in danger every day of dropping into hell; and what persons' minds were intent upon was to escape for their lives and to fly from the wrath to come."

The work of conversion was carried on in a most astonishing manner, and increased more and more. Edwards says that souls came by flocks to Jesus Christ. From day to day, for many months together, might be seen evident instances of sinners brought out of darkness into marvelous light. His delight in the work is apparent in these words:—

Our public assemblies were then beautiful; the congregation was alive in God's service, every one earnestly intent on the public worship, every hearer eager to drink in the words of the minister as they came from his mouth. The assembly in general were from time to time in tears while the word was preached; some weeping with sorrow and distress, others with joy and love, others with pity and concern for the souls of their neighbours. Those amongst us that had formerly been converted were greatly enlivened and renewed with fresh and extraordinary incomes of the spirit of God, though some much more than others, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Many that had before laboured under difficulties about their own state had now their doubts removed by more satisfying experience and more clear discoveries of God's love.

Edwards hoped that more than three hundred were converted in Northampton in half-a-year; they were of all ages, from the child of four years old to the man of seventy. He received eighty at one communion and sixty at another. It is said that in every case the change came upon the sinner's mind, instead of being wrought by him.

As exaggerated language was no doubt used by some of the converts, it is well we should know what Edwards himself thought of it. In some cases their sense of the excellency of God's justice in their condemnation, and their approbation of it, was such that they "almost called it a willingness to be damned," but he thought that this language must have been used without any clear idea of its import, and must have meant only that "salvation appeared too good for them," and that the glory of God's justice ought not to be sacrificed for their sakes.

This revival, which sprang up through the labours of the pastor of the place, soon spread all around, and some twenty-six other towns shared in the blessing. The work excited widespread interest, and when Edwards, at the request of Dr. Colman, of Boston, sent him an account of it, he had it published, and forwarded it to Dr. Isaac Watts and Dr. Guise in London, who repeated the good news in religious assemblies. This finally led to Edwards writing a "Narrative of Surprising Conversions," which was published in London and extensively circulated in England and Scotland, doing great good wherever it went.

There can be no doubt that the man so signally used of God was a remarkable man in many respects. Of his keen metaphysical power, all know who know anything of the history of thought; but all his great treatises were directly related to the work of God, that on "Religious Affections" being the result of the revival. But he was gifted also with a vivid imagination and great depth of feeling. He was, moreover, a saint whose soul was white with the light of God and in whose heart was treasured much of the Divine love. Let these sentences serve as an illustration of the manner of his hidden life.

"Sometimes only mentioning a single word caused my heart to burn within me; or only seeing the name of Christ, or the name of some attribute of God. The sweetest joys and delights I have experienced have not been those that have arisen from a hope of my own good estate, but in a direct view of the glorious things of the Gospel. When I enjoy this sweetness it seems to carry me above the thoughts of my own estate. It seems at such times a loss that I cannot bear, to take off my eye from the glorious, pleasant object I behold without me, to turn my eye in upon myself and my own good estate." J.P.G.

Armenian Orphans.

IN a semi-annual report of work among orphans in Marash, Miss Salmond says:—"We feel that in a special sense these are God's children; He has saved them from death, and has in a marvellous way raised up kind friends, through whom they are housed, clothed, and fed. They are also being trained in homes and at school in those principles that make for uprightness, truthfulness, and honesty. The return the children make for all this is that in each home love reigns. We seldom hear of quarrelling with one another. Obedience to the house-mother is prompt, and each one does his or her appointed work neatly and orderly.

"Our industrial work is prospering—shoemaking, weaving, tailoring, &c. We want tools and money for this department, and soon we hope to have carpentry and other useful things in operation. The girls are being qualified in domestic arts, also plain-sewing, knitting, lace-making, and embroidery, and we have just engaged a Koordish woman to come and teach them to make rugs, which we trust will sell. The health of the children is good as a rule, though we have had some severe cases of fever, and two have passed away."

Blackgang Mission (I.W.).—The annual report of this useful work is a record of progress. The opening of the new hall has been the event of the year, and the various branches of the mission have been stimulated to still more satisfactory and thorough work. A deficit of £75 remains to be repaid beyond the loans which have been permanently arranged for. Communications may be sent to Mrs. E. M. S. Smith, 4, Cliff Terrace, Blackgang, I.W.

Bible Study by Correspondence.—With a view to the promotion of Bible Study, and to affording help to those desiring it, Rev. G. and Mrs. Soltau have organised a Bible School. Local secretaries will undertake the correspondence with head-quarters, and with the students in his or her district. Generally speaking one book in the Bible will be taken each month. But when the book is very long, two months will be allowed. Sets of questions will be issued on the selected book for study, at the beginning of each month, as aids to study. A fee of 2s. 6d. per annum by each member will cover postage and printing expenses — central and local. Further particulars may be had from Mr. Soltau at 37, Pyrland Road, Mildmay, N.

Other Lands.

Central China in 1898.

By Dr. GRIFFITH JOHN, Hankow.

I HAVE been in the habit for some years of sending a sort of annual letter to The Christian. I have many friends among your readers, and I want to keep in touch with them, and deepen their interest in our work. I am also much indebted to some of them for valuable contributions sent to me from time to time for the propagation of the Gospel in these parts, and I want to show my gratitude by giving them some information about the progress of the work.

The year 1898 will be remembered by us in Central China as the most prosperous we have ever had. The Central China Religious Tract Society has been holding its annual meeting. They have always been bright and enthusiastic, but the meeting of this year was the most enthusiastic of all.

The history of this Society is a very remarkable one. The society was formed in 1876. In that year its circulation was only 9,000 copies. In 1883, only seven years later, it was 340,000. The circulation went up year by year till, in 1889, it reached a mark that astonished the most sanguine among us. In that year there were distributed in all China, by the different tract societies in China, 1,287,227 publications, of which 1,026,305 were issued by the Central China Religious Tract Society. Thus in one year this society sent forth more than a million of tracts in response to definite orders sent in from all quarters.

Its circulation has been keeping up ever since in a wonderful way. With two exceptions its annual circulation since 1889 has been more than a million, and the drop in these two years is to be ascribed to riots and other temporary causes. The circulation for the last ten years has been 10,943,283, for the last five years 6,108,728 and for the last year 1,470,699. Its circulation for the twenty-three years of its existence has been 13,207,044. That is something wonderful in the history of missions, and a something of which the society may be justly proud.

To fully appreciate this immense circulation, we must bear in mind the fact that all our tracts are sold. True, the payment is only a part of the cost, and there is a loss on every tract sold. Still the part payment amounts to a substantial sum, and is in a measure a guarantee that the books are preserved and read. The Chinese will not readily destroy what they have given money for. We must bear in mind also that our circulation covers an immense area. Our tracts are to be found not only in the eighteen provinces, but also in Manchuria, Mongolia, Korea, Siam, Tonquin, Australia, the Straits Settlements, California, British Columbia, and and almost all places where the ubiquitous Chinaman is to be found.

THE CHIEF AIM OF THE SOCIETY

from the beginning has been to meet the religious need of the Chinese people. Other societies may have other aims, and we wish them all Godspeed as long as they keep the mental and moral elevation of the Chinese in view. China needs light for all conceivable subjects, and the more you pour in the better. Some of our tracts contain valuable information on scientific subjects; but with us this comes in as by way of illustration and allurement mainly. The grand theme is God and his redemptive love. What the Chinese need above all else is the knowledge of God in Christ. Other things are important and desirable; but this is China's great need.

Bearing this in mind, we have gone in for influencing the masses. We do not despise the higher classes, neither do we neglect them. We have books specially prepared for them. But our eyes are generally fixed on the masses, and our chief aim has been to move them. Hence the style of our books, though thoroughly good and idiomatic, is characterised by simplicity, lucidity and definiteness. We never sacrifice the meaning to the style in order to please the vanity of the Confucian scholar or win his commendation. In all things our grand aim has been to make known to the millions of China, in a language that cannot be misunderstood, the Gospel of the Grace of God. "Talk," said Mr. Gladstone on one occasion, "about the question of the day! There is but one question, and that is the Gospel. It can and will correct everything needing correction." There are many things in China needing correction; and it is our firm conviction that the Gospel alone can correct them, and that the Gospel will correct them.

The highest proof I can give of the value of our publications is the fact that God has owned them by making them the means of salvation to many. Instrumentally they have given to the Church in China very many converts, and not a few evangelists and preachers. There are even churches in China to-day that owe their origin to the reading of tracts sent forth by this society. Not long since I received a letter from a missionary in the province of Chekiang, giving me the following interesting bit of news:—"I need scarcely tell you that here in Chekiang we are finding the Hankow tracts very useful in our work. In our church at Sin-Chang Hien we have ten or twelve members who owe their conversion, under God, in a great measure to the reading of one copy of your 'Catechism of Christian Doctrine.' That is the most acceptable praise, is it not?"

UNFORTUNATELY WE ARE IN DEBT, and, what is worse, our stock has been reduced to the vanishing point. This is a very serious matter, for it means to us that we shall have to suspend operations unless the debt is cleared and the depôt replenished. Our present condition is to be ascribed to the vastness of our operations, and this is to be ascribed to the increasing demand for our books. The demand for Christian literature, both religious and secular, is growing rapidly, and will continue to grow as the years roll on. Were our resources multiplied tenfold we should soon want every cash of it.

The year 1898 was to the National Bible Society of Scotland, whose headquarters are at Hankow, an exceptionally prosperous one. The circulation for 1897 was: Whole Bibles, 112; Testaments, 8,680; portions, 275,745: total, 284,537. That was an advance on all preceding years. Last year, however, the circulation rose to a much higher figure. Its circulation for 1898 was: Whole Bibles, 169; Testaments, 19,008; portions, 420,785: total, 440,062. If we add the circulation of the Bible Society to that of the Tract Society, we shall have for the year 1898 a united circulation of 1,910,761. What a magnificent piece of work! It is impossible to think of it without praising God.

The London Mission in Central China has also been holding its annual meetings. I do not hesitate to say that we have not had meetings so full of interest from the commencement of the mission in 1861 till now. The year 1898 will be an ever memorable one in the history of this mission. It will be remembered as the year in which the London Missionary Society committed itself to

THE EVANGELISATION OF HUNAN.

This time last year we sent home an appeal on behalf of Hunan. We asked for two men, and now we are rejoicing in the fact that the men have been found and that the means of support have been amply supplied. One of the two, Dr. Peake, is on his way to China; and the other, Mr. Greig, is here on the ground.

Mr. Peng Lan-Seng, our evangelist in Hunan, has accomplished a great work in that province already. He has managed to start a work at eight important centres, at each of which there is a little company of Christians meeting regularly for worship. I hope to visit Hunan in March, accompanied by Mr. Greig, and establish a mission at Yobhou, an important city situated at the mouth of the Pungting Lake.

But we shall want more than two men for Hunan—we must have ten at least. I am praying for this, and I have the faith to believe that my prayers will be answered, and that speedily.

The year will also be remembered as the year in which the Society committe d itself to an educational scheme of vital importance to the mission in Central China. Last year we sent a scheme to the directors, which included primary schools for boys and girls, high schools for both sexes, and a college for the training of ministers and evangelists, with a department for medical students. To-day we are rejoicing in the fact that the scheme has been substantially adopted by the Board, and that we can look forward with confidence to a grand development in this particular line of things in connection with the society's work in these parts. In three months hence we hope to see the scheme fairly started.

The year will be remembered by us as a year of remarkable

INCREASE IN CHURCH MEMBERSHIP.

We have not had a year so prosperous in this respect since the establishment of the mission, though there has been steady progress from the beginning, and though the accessions of the preceding two or three years were unusually large. The accessions in 1896 were: Adults, 337; non-adults, 97; in all, 434. In 1897 the accessions were: Adults, 485; non-adults, 128; in all, 613. In 1898 the accessions were: Adults, 660; non-adults, 149; in all, 809. Had we gone to Hunan, there would have been 200 more accessions at least, and the increase of the year would have been over 1,000. God has done great things for us, whereof we are glad.

Here I would add that the remarkable ingathering of last year is to be ascribed, under God, mainly to the efficiency, earnestness, and assiduity of our native brethren. We may have done much by way of teaching, guiding, inspiring, and helping them in various ways; but they are the men by whom the work of ingathering has been done. Whilst speaking of native helpers, I would not forget the important service rendered by private members of the Church, many of whom have been working with all their might for Christ. Just as we cannot do without our evangelists and preachers, so the evangelists and preachers cannot do without them.

Thus the year 1898 was a good year to the London Mission in Central China. I cannot look back upon it without gratitude and joy. The other missions working at this important centre have all shared in the blessing.

WHAT ABOUT THE FUTURE?

Our prospects, it appears to me, have never been so bright as they are now. Our power for work is greater now than it ever was before. I remember the time when I was alone, or one of two, in Central China; we are now a strong band of workers. I remember the time when there was not a single convert in the whole of Hupeh; now we reckon our converts by the thousands. I remember the time when our native helpers could be reckoned on the fingers of one hand; we can now boast of scores of preachers, evangelists, and teachers, who are actively and earnestly engaged in propagating the truth and building up the churches.

Not only is our power for work greater, our opportunities for work will be vastly greater in the future than they have been in the past. Hankow itself, as the central terminus of several great railway systems, is destined to grow immensely in size and importance. There will be no place like it in the whole of China. With the construction of these railway systems will come the full and complete opening of the empire, and every part of it will be within easy reach of, and in vital touch with, this magnificent centre. Then, the Chinese mind was never as open to the light as it is now.

Recent events have revealed a widely-spread discontent with the present order of things, and a determination that the old in China shall pass away and give place to the new. The year 1898 has shown us that China is really waking up from her long sleep, and that there are men among her sons to whom the welfare of their country is dearer than life itself. The reform movement will render the year 1898 an ever-memorable year in the history of China.

And the movement is not dead. Though some of the reformers are dead, the cause for which they died is not dead. It still lives and must grow in strength and influence. It has received a check, it is true; but we need not be alarmed on this account. Burke said of the British nation, "Its antagonists are its best helpers." This is often true of movements as well as of nations. Their antagonists are their best helpers. They help them by attracting attention to them and developing their strong points. This is the light in which I regard the check which the reform movement received last year. It will only develop the strong points of the movement, and stimulate it to more vigorous action. There can be no doubt that the Chinese are now turning to the west for instruction and guidance as they have never done before, and that the missionary's opportunities of influencing the nation as a nation are greater to-day than they ever were before. I have now felt so hopeful of the conversion of China as I do to-day. The day is dawning; the light has been kindled, and it must spread till all is luminous.

Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day
Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain's top.

A Letter from India.

IT is to me a pleasure to be again on the great mission field in India, the country which has perhaps the highest claims on Great Britain, for it is virtually our own, given us, no doubt, that we may have the honour to fill it with the light of life.

This winter we have been greatly favoured by visits from Dr. Fairbairn and Rev. F. B. Meyer. These winter visitations are most desirable and promotive of great good to the Anglo-Indians of this great Empire, and it is to be hoped that they may be followed up from time to time by a succession of God-inspired speakers who will have fresh and forcible messages from God to the people of India.

The opium question is one of burning interest both to India and England. Some one said that the official effort made to justify the continuance and promotion of this nefarious traffic by the late Opium Commission was the filling up of the measure of inquity of this crying curse, and that the Nemesis of retribution would soon follow, in one way or other. True enough this has come to pass with something like a swift vengeance by a most rapid reduction in the opium revenue to the Indian Government. In the year 1881 the opium reveuue was Rs.8,451,279 (10 rupees equal to £1 at par); in 1889 it went down to Rs.5,964,404; in 1894 it sank to Rs.4,750,954, and in 1897 it was reduced to the sum of Rs.3,922,546. Here we have a falling off in a few years of over £4,000,000!

I have lately visited the opium-growing field of Malwa, in Central India, and from official records there I found that some eight years ago no less than 40,000 chests of opium were exported to China from Malwa, while now the number hardly reaches 20,000, each chest containing 140½lbs. of the drug. Formerly the opium revenue to Government from the Malwa native states was about £2,000,000, while now it is hardly £1,000,000.

What is the cause? First of all, the significant failure of the poppy crop. The same quantities are sown, but the plant is deficient in juice, and will not yield the usual quantity of the drug, which mystery is beyond the ken of the most scientific officials. While poor China is now the pitiable victim of the opium plague, while the "Celestial" Empire is tottering to a final fall and the Indian Government as well is suffering for want of Imperial revenue, shall England escape the judgment of a righteous God? The ultimate responsibility is with the reigning power in England, for if the Secretary of State for India would but issue the order, the wicked traffic could be shut up at once and this black blot wiped away.

Anyhow the deadly traffic is dying out, and unless our rulers are quick, they will not have the satisfaction to show their disapproval of the evil on which the hand of God has put the seal of condemnation. Thomas Evans.

Protestantism in France.

AN interesting communication comes from Pastor C. W. Cremer, whose work in France is well-known to our readers. He tells of a movement towards Protestantism in the department of the Corrèze. In consequence of the gross neglect of the people by the Romish priest and a vain appeal to the bishop, the inhabitants of the village of Madrange betook themselves for spiritual guidance to the sacristan of the little church who had received enlightenment through the study of the scriptures. Mr. Cremer, who is now in England, says:—

"At last they thought of the Protestants, and wrote to a former agent of the Société Evangélique requesting that a pastor might be sent to them. The society sent first a colporteur, next its agent at Brive, M. Fallourd, who was received with every demonstration of joy, and 400 persons assembled in a few moments before the church door. The Gospel preached there was listened to by the poor people with breathless attention and deep emotion. This was the beginning among the people of Madrange of a very decided movement, which is now spreading throughout the neighbourhood.

"The Société Evangélique has received from Madrange a petition, signed by 153 persons (representing a population of 580), who declare that they have abjured Romish errors, and desire the ministry of a Protestant pastor. From other places have come requests, some of them signed by the mayor of the locality, for Protestant services. Strenuous efforts have been made by the Romish clergy to regain their hold upon the people; but they have used means more likely to estrange the respectable class still further from them.

"If possible, two workers should be sent at once to Madrange to assist M. Fallourd, who is terribly overweighted, having his charge at Brive to serve, at a distance of four hours' journey, in addition to all the daily increasing work opening up at and around Madrange. The cost of such workers would be between £100 and £200 yearly—and for help to meet this I appeal to the Christians of England. The address of the Société Evangélique is 32, Rue de Vaugirard, Paris."

Blind Girls of Jerusalem.

ABOUT two years ago a small home for blind girls was opened just outside Jerusalem by Miss Lovell. It was a work of faith, as the lady had but scant funds in hand; and since then she has been reduced, on one occasion, to her last coin.

A lady who recently visited Jerusalem writes:—We found Miss Lovell recovering from a few days' fever, attacks of which she has been having for some months. These leave her in a very prostrate condition, and she sadly needs another English lady to help her in the work. Her only helper at present is a bright Syrian girl, trained as teacher in one of the schools on the Lebanon.

Miss Lovell has the burden of supporting ten blind girls, one of whom does all the housework. She teaches the children to read English and Arabic in the Braille type—the Arabic she has herself adapted to the system—and it seemed to us quite wonderful that a girl of nine years should be able to read English in this way so well, after but a few months' instruction.

It is important that any suitable helper should have sufficient income to support herself. The treasurer of the work is Rev. J. R. Longley Hall, C.M.S. Jerusalem.

Life in the Holy Land.

THE well-known lecturer on Eastern life and customs, Mrs. Mountford (Miss von Finkelstein), is again in England, and has resumed her interesting engagements. On Wednesday, March 8, she lectured on "Life in the Holy Land," illustrating her subject by men, women, and children dressed in oriental costume. She dealt with village and country life, and said it was most important that people should be familiar with these, otherwise our Saviour's words might be misunderstood and their full significance lost.
